There he uſed to meet with William Coberley, and John Spicer to confer with them: Theſe Three agreed the Sabbath following to go to the Pariſh Church, where ſeeing the People to follow the Proceſſion, and to worſhip the Idol, they exhorted them to leave the ſame, and to turn to the living God: Afterwards the Prieſt going into the Pulpit, where he prayed for the Souls in Purgatory, &c. John Maundrel ſpeaking to him ſaid, That Purgatory was the Popes pinfold, which his other Two Friends affirmed alſo: For this, by the command of the Prieſt, they were put into the ſtocks; Then had before a Juſtice of Peace, who ſent them to Salisbury to the Biſhop, Doctor Capon; The Biſhop examined them of their Faith, and caſt them into Priſon: When they were brought to a public hearing, they were examined about the Sacrament of the Altar? &c. They answered, That the Popiſh Maſs was abominable Idolatry, and injurious to the Blood of Chriſt, &c. For this they were condemned, and ſo delivered to the Sheriff; whereupon John Spicer ſaid, Oh Maſter Sheriff, now muſt you be their Butcher, whereby you will make your ſelf guilty of innocent Blood. When they came to the place of their Martyrdom, they kneeled down and prayed together; Then having ſtript themſelves to their Shirts, Spicer ſaid, This is the joyfulleſt day that ever I ſaw; and ſo in the flames they chearfully gave up their Souls to God.

William Coberley, John Spicer,

Their Martyrdom,

Preſently after Robert Drake, and William Tims, Miniſters; Richard Spurg, Thomas Spurg, John Cavel, and George Ambroſe, Tradeſmen, all of Effex, were apprehended, and ſent up to London to the Biſhop of Wincheſter, who ſent them to Priſon, where they lay almoſt a year till after the Biſhops death; and Doctor Heath ſucceeding in the Chancellorſhip of England, Four of theſe Men being weary of Priſon, petitioned Heath for their enlargement. Hereupon Sir Richard Read was ſent to the Priſon to examine them; Before him they confeſſed that they had not been at Church ſince the Engliſh Service was taken away. Robert Drake was alſo examined, and William Tims, who answered boldly according to the truth, and ſo ſhortly after theſe Six perſons were brought forth before Biſhop Bonner in his Conſiſtory.

Robert Drake, William Tims, Richard Spurg, Thomas Spurg, John Cavel, George Ambroſe, Martyrs

The Biſhop began with Tims, and told him that he was the ring-leader and ſeducer of the reſt, &c. Then ſaid Tims, My Lord, I marvel that you dare begin with a lie; For there are none of theſe, but before their impriſonment held the ſame opinions that they do now, ſo that they learned not their Religion in Priſon; And for mine own part, I never knew them till we met in Priſon; How then could I be their Teacher? The Biſhop then asked him if he would ſubmit to the Catholick Church, otherwiſe he ſhould be condemned for an Heretick: Then ſaid another of the Priſoners, My Lord, you judge us according to your own luſt, but if you will judge us according to the Holy Teſtament of Chriſt, which is the word of Truth, we will ſtand to it; This ſo angered the Biſhop, that he called him buſie Knave, and bid him hold his Tongue; Then ſaid Tims, My Lord, I doubt not, but I am of the Catholick Church whatſoever you judge of me: But as for your Church, you your ſelf have formerly renounced it, and by your Oath promiſed never to conſent to the ſame; contrary to which you have now ſubmitted to the Popes Authority, and therefore all of you are falſly forſworn and guilty of perjury; Yea, you have both ſpoken and written earneſtly againſt the Popes power, and yet you now burn Men that will not acknowledge it.

Tims courage

Bonner. where have I written any thing againſt the Church of Rome?

Tims. My Lord the Biſhop of Wincheſter wrote learnedly againſt it in his Book De vera obedientia, to which you prefixed an Epistle, inveighing largely againſt the Bishop of Rome, reproving his Tyranny and falshood, calling his power false and pretended, &c.

Indeed, said Bonner, my Lord of Winchester wrote a Book against the Supremacy of the Popes Holiness, and I prefixed a Preface before it, but this we did because of the perillous world that then was; For then it was treason to maintain the Authority of the Pope, and therefore fear compelled us thereunto: But since the coming in of the Queens Majesty, we have acknowledged our faults; Do thou also as we have done.

My Lord, quoth Tims, that which you then wrote was agreeable to the holy Scriptures; But that which you now do is against the word of God, as I can well prove. After other such like conference, the Bishop fell to intreating, and perswading them earnestly to revoke their Errors, and to conform themselves to the Church of Rome: To which Tims answered, The See of Rome is the See of Antichrist, and therefore to that Church I will not conform my self, nor once consent unto it. The like said all the rest; whereupon the Bishop proceeded to their condemnation, and delivered them over to the secular power.

His godly Letters.

Out of Prison Master Tims wrote many godly Letters to his Friends in Hockley, and elsewhere, in one of which he hath these passages. I give hearty thanks to GOD for you, that he hath given you such loving Hearts to CHRISTs Gospel, and to his poor afflicted Flock: Remember, I beseech you, what I have taught you, and then I doubt not, but we shall shortly meet together with a most joyful meeting; I am now going to the Bishops Coalhouse, but I hope I shall not long tarry there, before I be carried up to my dear Brethren and Sisters, that are gone before me to Heaven in a fiery Chariot; Hie you after me, I have tarried a great while for you; and seeing you are so long making ready, I will tarry no longer; you shall find me singing merrily, Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God of Sabbath, at my journeyes end; Therefore now, my dear Hearts, make hast, and loiter not by the way, lest night overtake you, and so ye be shut out with the Foolish Virgins; And now in witness that I have taught you nothing but the truth, I here write my Name with my Blood, for a Testimony unto you, that I will seal my Doctrin with the rest: And thus fare you well, and God defend you from Antichrist, and all his Ministers, the false Priests, Amen. Continue in Prayer; Ask in Faith, and obtain your desires.

Shortly after in the flames they quietly and joyfully resigned up their Spirits unto God.

John Harpool, and Joane Beach.

John Harpool, and Joane Beach, being brought before the Bishop, were examined of the like Articles, and persevering in the truth, were condemned, and suffered Martyrdom together in the same fire, at Rochester in Kent.

Mr. John Hullier.

Also Master John Hullier, Minister, first brought up in Eaton School, and then in Kings Colledge in Cambridge, suffered under Thurlbey, Bishop of Ely, for the sincere preaching of the Gospel.

Christopher Lyster, John Mace, John Spencer, Simon Foy, Richard Nichols, John Hammond.

At Colchester these Six persons Christopher Lyster, John Mace, John Spencer, Simon Foy, Richard Nichols, and John Hammond, were examined by the Bishop, and sent up to London to Bonner, who examined them of sundry ordinary Articles; To which they answered according to the truth: And when neither by flattery nor fear, they could be brought to recant, he condemned them, and so delivered them to the secular power: Then were they sent to Colchester, where they ended their lives to the glory of Gods Holy Name, and the great encouragement of others.

Hugh Laverock, John Ap-Rice, and one blind cured by Martyrdom.

Hugh Laverock, an old lame Man, and John Ap-Rice, a blind Man, being accused by some of their Neighbors to Bishop Bonner, were sent for, and by him examined about the Sacrament of the Altar. To which Hugh Laverock answered, that he would stand to his first Answer, and that he could not find in the Scriptures that the Priest should lift over his Head a Cake of Bread: Then the Bishop asked Ap-Rice, what he said to it? Who answered, The Doctrin which you teach is so agreeable to the world, and embraced of the same, that it cannot be agreeable to the word of God, neither are you of the true Church; For you make Laws to kill Men, and you make the Queen your Hangman. Then did the Bishop denounce the Sentence of condemnation against them, and delivered them to the temporal power, and so they were carried in a Cart from Newgate to Stratford-Bow.

When they were chained to the Stake, Laverock threw away his Crutch, and comforting Ap-Rice, said unto him, Be of good comfort, my Brother, For my Lora of London is our good Physician, he will heal us both shortly; Thee of thy blindness, and me of my lameness: And so patiently suffering the pains of the fire, they resigned up their Spirits unto God.

About the same time Katherine Hut, Joane Hornes, Elizabeth Thackvel, and Margaret Ellis, were sent up to Bishop Bonner out of Essex by Sir John Mor-dant, and Edmund Tyrel, Esquire: The Bishop received, and examined them, especially about the Sacrament of the Altar; To which Katherine Hut answered, I deny it to be God, because it is a dumb God, and made with Mens Hands: The like said all the rest, whereupon they were condemned, and being carried into Smithfield, they there joyfully suffered Martyrdom.

Katherine Hut,
Joane Hornes,
Elizabeth
Thackvel,
Margaret Ellis.

In my first Part, mention is made of a blind Boy, that came to Bishop Hooper at Gloucester a little before his Martyrdom: This poor Boy being shortly after apprehended, and cast into Prison, was at last brought forth before the Chancellor of Gloucester, who examined him whether he believed Christs Body to be really present in the Sacrament of the Altar? To which he answered negatively. Then said the Chancellor, who taught thee this Heresie? The Boy answered, Tou, Master Chancellor, when in yonder Pulpit you taught us, that the Sacrament was to be received spiritually by Faith, and not carnally and really as the Papists teach. But said the Chancellor, Do thou as I have done, and thou shalt live as I do, and escape burning. The Boy answered, Though you can so easily dispense with your Conscience, and mock God and the World, yet will not I do so. Then said the Chancellor, God have mercy upon thee, for I will read the Sentence of condemnation against thee. Gods will be fulfilled, said the Boy. So the Chancellor condemned him, and another called Thomas Croker, delivering them over to the secular power, by whom they were both burned, constantly, and joyfully yielding up their Spirits into the hands of God.

A blind Boy.

Thomas Croker.

About the same time Thomas Spicer, John Dennis, and Edmund Poole being apprehended for not coming to Church, and receiving the Sacrament, were carried before Dunnings, Chancellor of Norwich, who assayed by all means to turn them from the truth; But when he could not prevail, he condemned them, and delivered them over to the Sheriff, Sir John Silliard, who burned them at Beckles in Suffolk: At the Stake when they had made their prayers, and said the Belief, fire was put to them, and in the flames they praised God with such an audible voice, as was wonderful to all that heard them. Hereupon Robert Bacon willed the Tormentors to throw a Fagot to stop the Knaves Mouths, as he called them: But these good Men not regarding his malice, confessed the truth, and yielded their lives as a testimony thereunto constantly, and very joyfully.

Thomas Spicer,
John Dennis,
Edmund Poole.

Their Martyrdom.

Papish cruelty.

A great Persecution was raised up at the same time, against many godly persons of Winson and Mendlesham in the County of Suffolk, who by the rage of their Enemies were forced to leave their Houses, and Estates, and to fly for their lives.

A great Persecution.

There was an honest poor Man of Maulden, called Gregory Crow, who with his Man and Boy was going over into Kent to fetch Fullers Earth: But by the way, meeting with a storm, his Boat was driven upon the Sand, so that it sunk, and the Men were forced to hold upon the Mast: At which time Crow seeing his New Testament in the Water, caught it up, and put it into his Bosom: The tide being gone, they were left upon the Sands at least Ten miles from the Land: There they made their prayers together, that God would send some Ship that way: For within half an hour, it would be flood: In which time they found their their Chest wherein was Five pound Six shillings Eight pence: But Crow cast it into the Sea, saying; If the Lord will save our lives he will provide us a living, and so they went up the Mast where they hung by the Arms, and Legs for Ten hours together, in which time the Boy was so weary, and beaten with the Sea that he fell off, and was drowned.

The Water being gone, and the Sand dry, Crow said to his Man, Its best for us to take down our Mast, and when the Flood comes to sit upon it, and so it may please God to bring us to some Ship that may take us in: This they did, and rid upon the Mast Tuesday night, Wednesday, and Wednesday night, in which time the Man was so tired out with hunger, watching, and cold, that he died. Then was Crow left alone, who being driven up and down in the Sea, prayed to God for help, but durst not sleep lest the Sea should beat him off: When he was almost spent, his Flesh being sodden with the Water, and his Mouth and Eyes almost closed up with salt, behold the providence of God! A Ship that was going for Antwerp, the Wind being not good, was driven out of the way, whereby they spied something afar off in the Sea; But supposing it to be a Fisher-Boy, they steered from it: This Crow seeing, held up his Cap, and shook it above his Head, whereby at length they were moved to go to him, and so they took him in: When he came into the Ship, though half dead, yet careful of his New Testament, he pluckt it out of his Bosom, and gave it to them to dry. The Ship-men were very careful of him, and at last recovered him, and carried him to Antwerp; where the People, hearing of his miraculous deliverance, came to see him; some giving him Clothes, and others Money, so that he was no loser by his dependance upon God.

William Slech being Prisoner in the Kings Bench for the truth of the Gospel, died there, and was buried in the Back-side of the said Prison.

Thomas Harland, John Oswald, Thomas Avington, Thomas Read, Thomas Whood, Thomas Mills, Martyrs, William Aderal, John Clement, died in Prison.

A young Man, Eleven Men, and Two Women. Popish cruelty.

Constancy.

A great persecution.

Thomas Flier murdered.

Thomas Parret, John Norrice, Martin Hunt, died in Prison.

Roger Bernard.

William Slech being Prisoner in the Kings Bench for the truth of the Gospel, died there, and was buried in the Back-side of the said Prison.

At Lewis, in Sussex were burned Thomas Harland, John Oswald, Thomas Avington, and Thomas Read, for their constant adhering to the truth.

Shortly after them were burned in the same place, Master Thomas Whood, Minister, and Thomas Mills for the same cause.

In the Kings Bench Master William Aderal, Minister, and John Clement, dying were buried in the Back-side of the Prison.

A godly young Man, Servant to a Merchant, suffered grievous persecution, and at last was burnt at Leicester.

Presently after Eleven Men, and Two Women, were condemned by Bonner, and sent to Stratford-Bow to be burnt. The Sheriff divided them into Two parts, and went to the one, and told them that their Fellows had recanted, wishing them to do the like, whereby their lives might be saved: To whom they answered, That their Faith was not built on Man, but on Christ Crucified. When he could not prevail with them, he went to the other part, telling them that their Friends had recanted, desiring them to do the like, and not wilfully to cast away themselves: But they answered, as the other, that their Faith was not built on Man, but on Christ, and his sure Word. Thus seeing that he could prevail with none of them, he carried them to the fire. There they prayed earnestly unto God, and went joyfully to the Stake, embracing, and kissing it, and so cheerfully yielded up their Souls to God.

About the same time a great Persecution was raised in the Diocess of Litchfield, by Doctor Bane, the Bishop thereof, whereby many were forced to do penance, and amongst the rest one Thomas Flier of Utoxiter, was slain by a desperate Papist.

In the Kings Bench Thomas Parret, John Norrice, and Martin Hunt, died in Prison for the truth, whereof the latter was famished to death, and were all buried in the Prison-yard.

At Saint Edmundsbury, Roger Bernard being brought before Doctor Hopton, the Bishop, was examined whether he was shriven at Easter? To which he answered, That he had not confessed his sins to the Priest, but he had confessed them.

them to Almighty God, who he hoped had forgiven them. The Bishop told him that he must confess them to the Priest: To which he answered, That by Gods grace he would not do it. Then the Bishop called him Heretick, &c. Bernard answered, That it grieved him not to be called Heretick by him; For so his Fore-fathers had called the Prophets, and Confessors long before him. After some other conference, the Bishop bad the Jailor take him away, and lay Irons enough on him; For he would tame him before he had done. Then went divers Priests to him, who with flattering, and enticing words, sought to pervert him from the truth: And when that would not prevail, they threatned him with stocking, Whipping, and burning: To whom he answered, Friends, I am not better then my Master Christ, and the Prophets, whom your Fathers served after such sort; And I for his Names sake am content to suffer the like at your hands, if God shall so permit, trusting that he will strengthen me in the same, according to his promise, in spite of the Devil, and all his instruments. Then carried they him to the Bishop, who condemned him, and delivered him to the secular power.

Speech.

Adam Foster of Mendlesham in Suffolk was apprehended by Thomas Monse and George Rivet for not coming to Church, and carried before Sir John Tyrel, who sent him to Norwich to the Bishop; But it pleased God, that immediately Monse was stricken by God with a grievous disease, and died shortly after: And Rivet not warned thereby, but persisting in his ways, had a great swelling in his Legs, which grievously vexed, and troubled him, and at length falling into a fearful disease, he died most miserably, and in so impatient a manner that it terrified all that heard thereof.

Adam Foster.

Gods judgment on Persecutors.

Robert Lawson being also apprehended for not going to Church, was by Sir John Tyrel sent to the Bishop, and so all these Three godly Men being condemned, were to be burnt at Bury: At the Stake they made their prayers unto God, and died with much chearfulness: About the same time one John Fortune, a godly and zealous Professer of the truth, was made away by the Bishop and his Ministers.

Robert Lawson.

John Fortune murdered.

John Carelesse of Coventry, Weaver, was there imprisoned for the truth; But in the Jail he so carried himself, that the Jailor would sometimes let him go abroad upon his word, he returned at the hour appointed to Prison again: At length by a Writ, he was removed to London, and imprisoned in the Kings Bench, whither came one Doctor Martin to examine him, betwixt whom there passed such like communication.

John Carelesse.

Martin. What is thy name?

Carelesse. My name is John Carelesse.

Martin. It will appear by that I have done with thee, that thou art a true careless Man indeed. Where wast thou born?

Carelesse. At Coventry.

Martin. How camest thou hither?

Carelesse. By a writ I was sent hither by the Lord Chief Justice.

Martin. I wish thou wouldst play the wise Mans part: Thou art an handsome Man, and its pitty but thou shouldst save that which God hath bought.

Carelesse. I thank your Mastership, and I put you out of doubt that I am most sure, and certain of my Salvation by Jesus Christ: So that my Soul is sore already, what pains soever my Body suffer here for a time.

Martin. Yea marry. For thou art so predestinated to life, that thou canst not perish in whatsoever opinion thou dost die.

Carelesse. That God hath predestinated me to eternal life in Christ I am most certain: And even so I am sure that his Holy Spirit, wherewith I am sealed, will preserve me from all Heresies, and evil opinions, that I shall die in none at all.

Martin. Let me hear your Faith about Predestination?

Ppp

Carelesse.

Careleffe. I believe that Almighty God, our most dear, and Heavenly Father, of his great mercy, and infinite goodness through Jesus Christ, did elect, and appoint in him before the foundation of the world was laid, a Church which he doth continually guid, and govern by his grace, and Holy Spirit: So that not one of them shall finally perish.

Martin. Why? who will deny this? Pray thee, Careless, prove thy self a wise Man, and do not cast away thy self wilfully.

Careleffe. The Lord knows I would gladly live, so that I may do the same with a safe Conscience.

Martin. Thou art a tall Fellow, and mayest do the Queen good service in Ireland; wilt thou go thither, and serve Her Majesty there?

Careleffe. Wheresoever I am, I am ready to do her Grace the best service I can with Body, Goods, and life: And if she, or any under her require me to do any thing contrary to Christs true Religion, I am ready also to do service in Smithfield, as my Bed-fellow, and other Brethren have done: Praised be God for it.

Martin. By my troth thou art as pleasant a Fellow as ever I talked with, of all the Protestants, &c. And so after some other discourse they parted.

During this his imprisonment, he fell into some heaviness, and perplexity of mind; whereupon he wrote to Master Philpot, lying then in the Bishops Coal-house; From whom he received a consolatory Letter, which through Gods mercy, gave him great satisfaction. He wrote also divers other Letters during his imprisonment, which continued about Two years; At the end whereof he fell sick, and died, being thereby deprived of that Crown of Martyrdom which he so much longed after.

He died in Prison.

THE LIFE OF
Mr. JULINES PALMER.

Julines Palmer was born in Coventry, where his Father had been Major; He was carefully brought up in learning, and sent to Magdalen Colledge in Oxford, where he profited very much in the knowledge of the Arts and Tongues. At last he fell to the study of Divinity, recompensing his short time therein with the greatness of his diligence; And his late coming to the knowledge of the truth, with his earnest, and zealous progress in the same. He was of a civil behavior. Of manners courteous, of countenance chearful, of speech pleasant; quick-spirited, yet humble: Apter to be deceived than to deceive: A great contemner of reproaches, and injuries: Using to say, That none were to be accounted valiant but such as could despise injuries. In his studies he was indefatigable. He rose early, and went to Bed late: Getting so much credit in the Colledge, that he was chosen Fellow, and Reader in the same. At first he was addicted to Popery, and kept company only with such as were Enemies to the Gospel of Christ. Sermons he would not hear himself, nor by his good will suffer any of his Pupils to hear them, believing that they might be better occupied at home. The Preachers, and all such as were setters forth of sound Doctrine in King Edward the Sixths time, he despised; For which obstinacy he was oft punished by the Officers in the Colledge, sometimes in his Purse, sometimes in his Commons.

His Character.

Not long before King Edwards death, certain scandalous Verses were scattered abroad against Doctor Haddon, President of that Colledge: Whereupon Palmer was suspected, and examined about them: But he did not only stoutly deny them, but also gave such reproachful Language to the Officers, that upon further consideration, he was expelled the House. After this to provide himself a subsistence, he betook himself to teach Children in the House of Sir Francis Knolles, where he continued till the beginning of Queen Maries Reign, and then, when Visitors were sent to Oxford to expel Protestants, and to put Papists in their rooms, Master Palmer repaired to them, and acquainting them with his former expulsion for his zeal to that cause, he was by them again restored to his Fellowship.

He is expelled the Colledge.

After a while it pleased God, that he met with Calvins Institutions, and read it over: After which, meeting with an old companion of his in Pauls Church London, they looked upon a Rood that was lately set up: Whereupon Palmer said, Is this our God for whom we have so smarted? No, said the other, it is but his Image.

His Conversion.

His Image? said Palmer, I tell thee plainly, John Calvin, whose Institutions I have lately read, tells me plainly by Gods word that it is an Idol, and that the Pope is Antichrist, and that his Clergy is the filthy sink-hole of Hell: And now I believe it, for I feel it sensibly. Oh that God had revealed this to me in times past: I would have bequeathed this Roman Religion, or Irreligion rather to the Devil of Hell, whence it came. Believe me, I will rather have these Knees pared off, than I will kneel to yonder Jackanapes (so he called the Rood) God help me, for I am born to trouble, and adversity in this world.

His Zeal.

Thus God wrought in his Heart, that he became very inquisitive how the Martyrs were apprehended, what Articles they were examined of, how they behaved themselves at their death; Insomuch that he sent one of his Pupils to Gloucester to observe how Bishop Hooper demeaned himself at his burning: And himself being present in Oxford, when Ridley, and Latimer suffered Martyrdom, as he came back, he said to his Friends, Oh raging cruelty! Oh Tyranny tragical, and more than barbarous!

From that day forward he studiously set himself to find out the truth: Read Peter Martyrs Commentary upon the First of the Corinthians, and other good Books: And so through hearty Prayer, and diligent searching of the Scriptures, At length he believed, and imbraced the truth with great joy, and so profited in the same, that daily he declared it more and more in word and deed. Yea at length, through Gods grace, he grew up to such maturity, and ripeness in the truth, that he spared not to declare the same both in words, and actions: Hereupon he began to be first suspected, and then abhorred by the President, Master Cole, and others, who had formerly been his great Friends.

His Faith.

For which cause, finding that he could not with a safe Conscience be present at their Idolatrous services, he addressed himself to leave his fellowship; and to depart the House: And being asked by a Friend, how he would live when he was gone; He answered, Domini est terra, & plenitudo ejus; The earth is the Lords; and the fulness of it. Let the Lord work, I will commit my self to him, and the wide world.

A Prediction.

Before his departure, a great Papist that formerly had been his great Friend, meeting with him, and in discourse finding him zealous in defence of the truth, said unto him: well Palmer, well, now thou art stout, and stiff in thine opinion, but if thou wert brought to the Stake, I believe thou wouldst tell me another tale. I advise thee beware of the fire, for its a shrewd matter to burn: Truly said Palmer, I have been in danger of burning once, or twice, and yet, through Gods mercy, have escaped it, but I verily believe it will be mine end at last: welcome be it, by the grace of God: Indeed its an hard matter for them to burn that have their Souls linked to their Bodies, as a Thiefs foot is tied in a pair of Fetters: But if a Man be once able by the help of Gods Spirit to separate the Soul from the Body, its no more for him to burn, then for me to eat this piece of Bread.

He teacheth School at Reading.

Hypocricie.

Having left his Fellowship, it pleased God, who never faileth those that depend upon him, that he was presently after settled in the Grammar-School of Reading, where he was well approved of by those that feared God, not only for his learning, but especially for his earnest zeal, and profession of the truth: But Satan envying his proceedings, and prosperous success in the same, would not suffer him long to be quiet there: For he stirred up certain Hypocrites, who under pretence of zeal, to the truth, insinuated themselves into his secrets. He, good Man, suspecting no deceit, imbraced them joyfully, and acquainted them with all his proceedings: For himself having sincerely imbraced the truth, and being full of Heavenly zeal, he had an incredible desire by all means possible to encourage others in the profession of the same. These disssembling Hypocrites, watching their opportunity when he was abroad, rifled his study, seized upon his Books and writings, and amongst the rest, they found sundry arguments written by him, against the Popish proceedings, especially against their brutish Tyranny, exercised towards the poor Saints, and servants of God. Having gotten these things into their Hands, they threatened to return them to the Privy Council, except he would resign the School to one of their chusing, and presently depart out of the Country.

Thus

Thus was this innocent Man, by the malice of these dissemblers forced to quit Reading, leaving his Books in the Hands of his Adversaries, and a quarters stipend unpaid, and so he went to Evesham, where his Mother dwelt, hoping to obtain a legacy, left to him by his Father in her Hands. His mother having beforehand understood the occasion of his coming, when upon his Knees he craved her blessing, she said, Thou shalt have Christs curse, and mine, wherever thou goest. He amazed at this heavy greeting, paused a while, and then said, Oh Mother, your curse you may give me, which God knows I never deserved; But Gods curse you cannot give, for he hath already blessed me. Nay, said she, thou wentest out of Gods blessing, when thou wast banished for an Heretick out of Oxford, and now for the like knavery art driven out of Reading. Alas Mother, said he, you are misinformed, I resigned my places of mine own accord, and Heretick am I none; For I stand not stubbornly against any truth, but defend it to my power. Well, said she, I am sure thou dost not believe as thy Father, and I, nor as our Forefathers did, but as thou wast taught by the new Law, in King Edwards days, which is damnable Heresie. Indeed, answered he, I so believe, but it is not Heresie, but the truth, and not new, but as ancient as Christ, and his Apostles. Well, said she, get thee out of my House, and fight, and never take me for thy Mother more: As for money I have none for thee, thy Father bequeathed no legacy to Hereticks: Fagots I have to burn thee, and more thou gettest not at my Hands. Master Palmer for her curses returned blessings, and prayers, and so weeping abundantly, he departed from her: This so mollified her hard Heart, that she threw an angel after him, saying, Take that and keep thee a true Man.

He leaves Reading.

An unnatural Mother.

Master Palmer finding such entertainment from his Mother, knew not now which way to turn himself, but after a while he resolved privately to return to Magdalen Colledge, upon the confidence that he had in a Friend or Two in that House. When he had been there a while, he gate Letters commendatory for his preferment to a School in Glostershire, but as he went by the way thitherward, musing with himself, he resolved to go privily back to Reading, trusting that by the help of his Friends, he might recover his Books, and quarteridge. Hereupon he went closely thither, yet not so closely, but the viperous generation of Hypocrites had knowledg of it, and consulting together, suborned a cunning dissembler to go to him, to fish out the cause of his coming. This was easily effected, and the very night after, as he was in Bed, came the Officers with Bills, and Staves, requiring him in the Queens Name quietly to go along with them: And thus the young Man, betrayed by those Judases, was led away as a Sheep to the slaughter, and was thrust into a vile, deep, stinking Dungeon, where they left him hanging by the Hands, and Feet, in a pair of Stocks, so high that scarce any part of his Body touched the ground, and there they left him for Ten days. Then was he brought before the Major, and these dissembling Villaines charged him with Treason, Sedition, and supposed Murther, and Adultery. Master Palmer answered, That if any such hainous crimes could be proved against him, he would patiently submit to all kind of torments they could inflict: But, saith he, Oh cruel Blood-suckers, ye follow the practice of your progenitors, the viperous brood of Pharises and Papists: But be you well assured, that God Almighty sees all your cruel, and crafty packings, and will not suffer the outrageous fury of your venomous Tongues, and fiery Hearts to escape unpunished.

He is betrayed and apprehended. Popish cruelty.

He cheats himself.

The things which they alleadged against him, were, That he should say, that the Queen had not the Sword put into her Hand to execute Tyranny, and to kill, and murder the true Servants of God; That her Sword was blunt towards the Papists, but towards true Christians, it was too sharp: That he was a sower of Sedition, and a procurer of unlawful Assemblies; That they had found him alone with his Hostess by the fire in her Hall. Upon this evidence the Major sent him to the Cage to be a publick spectacle of ignominy to the Eyes of the world.

In the afternoon he was brought forth to his answer ; At which time, he did so mightily, and clearly enervate their evidence, and prove his own innocency, that the Major himself was much ashamed that he had given such credit to them, so that he sought means how to convey him privily out of the County. Yet in the interim he kept him in Prison ; whither a godly Man coming to him, said, O Master Palmer, you have deceived our expectations, For we hear that you suffer not for righteousness sake, but for your own demerits : To whom he answered, Indeed, Brother, these are the old practices of the Satanical brood : But assure your self, and God be praised for it, I have so purged my self, and detected their falshood, that henceforth I shall be no more molested therewith.

He is charged with Heresie.

His modesty.

Thomas Askin.

But his Adversaries fearing that if he should escape secretly, it would tend to their shame, and danger ; they now charge him with Heresie, which they had gathered out of his Papers stoln out of his study. Then was he again sent for before the Major, the Official, and some others ; where he was required to render an account of his faith. And so having gathered out of his own Mouth sufficient matter to intrap him ; they drew up Articles against him, and sent him to Doctor Jeffery, who then kept his Visitation at Newberry. But before his going, Master Rider of Reading, a godly Man hearing how cruelly he had been dealt withal in Prison, and almost pined for lack of necessities, sent secretly to him in the night a bowed Groat in token of his love, requiring to know what he lacked, and he would provide it for him: Master Palmer answered the Messenger, The Lord reward your Master for his benevolence towards me, a miserable object in this world ; But tell him, that God be praised, I lack nothing. The morning before he went to Newberry, one Thomas Askin, his fellow Prisoner in Christs cause, sitting at Breakfast, and seeing Master Palmer leaning in a Window very sad, asked him, why he came not to Breakfast ? because said he I have not money to pay for it. Come on Man, said Askin, God be praised for it, I have enough to pay for us both.

John Guin.

His confession with Doctor Jeffery.

When they came to Newberry, they were presently committed to the Blind-house, where they found John Guin, their faithful Brother in the Lord.

Shortly after Palmer was called before Doctor Jeffery, and other Commissioners ; where his Papers were shewed to him, and he asked, whether they were his Writings : Master Palmer looking upon them, acknowledged that they were.

Jeffery. Sayest thou so ? I will make thee recant them, and wring peccavi out of thy lying Lips before I have done with thee.

Palmer. I know that though of my self I can do nothing, yet if you, and all mine Enemies bodily and ghostly should do your worst, you shall not be able to bring that to pass ; neither shall you prevail against Gods mighty Spirit, by whom we understand the truth, and speak it so boldly.

Jeffery. I perceive you are full of words.

Palmer. Christ hath promised not only to give us store of words necessary, but with them such force of matter, as the gates of Hell shall not be able to prevail against it.

Jeffery. Christ so promised to his Apostles ; But I hope you will not compare your self with them.

Palmer. With the holy Apostles I may not compare, neither have I any affiance in mine own wit and learning ; Yet I am sure, this promise belongs to all such as are appointed to defend Gods truth against his enemies in times of Persecution ; And I am assured through his grace, that at this time it appertaineth unto me, as I doubt not to make it appear, if you will give me leave to dispute with you before this Audience in defence of all that I have written.

Jeffery. Thou art a Beardless Boy, and darest thou presume to challenge a Doctor ?

Palmer. Remember Sir, Spiritus ubi vult spirat. The Spirit breatheth where it pleaseth him ; and Out of the mouths of Infants, &c. And, Thou hast hidden hidden these things from the wife, and learned, &c. God is not tied to time, wit, place, or learning; and though your wit and learning be greater, yet your love to the truth, and zeal to defend the same, is not greater then mine.

After much other conference about the real presence of Christ in the Sacrament, and Infant-Baptism: The High Sheriff Sir Richard A Bridges, proffered him great preferment if he would recant his opinion: To which he answered, thanking him courteously for his offer; But said he, I have already in Two places renounced my living for Christs cause, and so by Gods grace will I be ready to yield up this life also, when God calls me to it.

Sir Richard A Bridges proffereth him favour if he would recant.

Presently after he, with his Two Brethren were condemned by Doctor Jeffery, and delivered over to the Secular Power.

Their condemnation.

About an Hour before they went to Execution in the presence of many, Master Palmer thus comforted his Fellows: Brethren, be of good cheer in the Lord, and faint not: Remember what Christ saith. Blessed are ye when Men revile, and persecute you for righteousness sake: Rejoyce, and be exceeding glad, for great is your reward in Heaven. Fear not them that kill the Body, and are not able to hurt the Soul. God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted beyond that which you are able. We shall not end our lives in the fire, but only change them for a better life; yea, for Coals, we shall receive Pearls, For Gods holy Spirit certifieth our Spirits that he hath even now prepared for us a sweet supper in Heaven for his sake which suffered first for us.

As they were singing a Psalm, came the Sheriff with many Men in harness to guard them to the fire. At the Stake they all fell down and prayed, and Master Palmer with an audible voice, pronounced the 31. Psalm. Then came to him Two Popish Priests, exhorting him yet to recant, and save his Soul: To whom he said; Away, away, tempt me no longer: Away, I say, from me all ye that work iniquity, for the Lord hath heard the voice of my tears. Then all of them putting off their clothes, went to the Stake, and kissed it. Then said Master Palmer, Good People, pray for us, that we may persevere to the end; And for Christs sake beware of Popish Teachers, for they deceive you. Hereupon an Officer threw a Fagot at his Face, so that the Blood gushed out in divers places; But the Sheriff was so offended at this, that he brake the Fellows Head. When the fire began to take hold of their Bodies, they lift up their Hands to Heaven, and quietly and chearfully as if they felt no smart, cryed out, Lord Jesus, strengthen us: Lord Jesus assist us; Lord Jesus receive our Souls, and so they continued without struggling till they had finished their course.

Their Martyrdom.

Popish cruelty.

Agnes Wardall.

About the same time there was in Ipswich, one Agnes Wardall, a Woman that feared God, and abominated all the Popish trash, and therefore desired rather with hard fare, and evil lodging to be abroad, then by remaining at home, to be in the tents of the ungodly: Her Husband also fearing God, was forced to flie from his own habitation, and to betake himself to a Marriners life.

This Agnes Wardall on a time came home to see her poor Children, which some Enemies of the truth having notice of, they presently went to the Constable, and told him of it: Hereupon he presently charged the watch (it being in the night-time) and sent every company to his place; They went also and beset the House round about. Then the Constable knocked Three times at the Door; At last a Woman spake out at a Window, asking who was there? Ah, said the Constable, are you so wigh, and would not speak before? what is the reason of it? Marry I will tell you, said the Woman: I am but a stranger here, and I have heard that Spirits walk hereabouts, and if a Man answer at the first or second call, he is in great danger. At this they laughed, and commanded her in the Queens Name to open the Door. Agnes was asleep at first, but being awakened by her Maid, and told of the danger, she got up, and put on her clothes, and so her Maid locked her up in a Press, and then went and opened the Door. The Constable asked her, who was in the House? None, said the Maid, but a woman that is a lodger here, and Two Children: Then searched they the whole House, and every corner corner of it; and one laying his Hand on the Press, said, This is a fair Press, for ought I know she may be in it; yet they went their wayes without breaking it open, and so searched the Yard, and Out-houses. In the mean time the Woman was almost smothered in the Press, and therefore called to the lodger to open the Press, which she could not do of a long while; yet at last, through Gods mercy, she opened it, and Agnes came forth all on a sweat, and as pale as Ashes; Then went she forth into the Garden, and creeping through the Pales, got into the Fields, and so shrouded her self in a Ditch amongst long Nettles; And thus through the power and goodness of God, was this his Servant delivered from the cruelty of her Enemies.

Peter Moon and his Wife.

The same year Bishop Hopton, and Dunnings his Chancellor, kept their Visitation at Ipswich; And in Suffolk there were divers Godly Persons, who were accused by their wicked and malicious Adversaries; Amongst which, one Peter Moon and his Wife, were charged for not coming to Church, and for neglecting other Popish Ceremonies. Moon was first examined, Whether the Pope were the supream Head of the Church? Whether the Queen were right Inheritor to the Crown? And whether Christs Body were really present in the Sacrament? And he being of a timorous disposition, answered so, as his Adversaries were satisfied; His Wife also by his Example, fell into the like dissimulation; whereupon they were dismissed: But when they came home, and began to bethink themselves what they had done; they fell into such sorrow, and trouble of conscience, that they were ready to despair; and Moon, seeing his Sword hanging in a Parlor, was tempted to have made away himself, but the Lord prevented it, and after upon their repentance was pleased to comfort them.

Catherine Cowches.
Guillemine Gilbert.
Perotine Massie.

Also about the same time there were Three Women in the Isle of Gernsey, accused for not coming to Church; Their names were Catherine Cowches the Mother, Guillemine Gilbert, and Perotine Massie the Two Daughters; These being examined by the Dean, and some other of the Clergy, were condemned for Hereticks, and delivered to the secular power. When they were fastned to Three Stakes, Perotine being great with Child, when her Belly brake by reason of the violence of the fire, a fair Man-Child fell out of the same, which was taken out of the fire, and laid upon the grass; And afterwards one took the Child, and carried it to the Bailiff, who adjudged it to be carried back, and cast into the fire, which was accordingly done.

Tho. Dungate.
John Foreman.
Mother Tree.
Thomas Moore.

At Greenstead in Sussex, Thomas Dungate, John Foreman, and Mother Tree were burned for their constant adhering to the truth

At Leicester, one Thomas Moore, being examined about Christs presence in the Sacrament, said, That Christ was in Heaven, and not in the Pixe, for which he was by the Bishop condemned, and burnt, finishing his life in the flames with much joy, and comfort.

Joan Waste, a blind Maid.

In the Town of Darby, there was one Joane Waste, who was born blind, who in the days of King Edward the Sixth, frequented daily Divine service, and Sermons, by means whereof it pleased God to convert her: And she, having learned to knit, got so much money as bought her a New Testament, which she would get some to read unto her; and sometimes she would give a penny, or Two pence to some to read certain Chapters to her: So that in the Reign of Queen Mary she had gotten many Chapters by heart, and was grown so well acquainted with the Scriptures, that she was able thereby to confute their Idolatrous practices: For this at last she was convented before Bishop Baine, and Doctor Draicot, his Chancellor: Before whom she was charged for denying the real presence of Christ in the Sacraments, &c. To which she answered, That she believed so much therein as the word of God taught her. She desired them not to trouble her being a poor blind Woman, but if they would proceed, she professed that with Gods assistance, she was ready to yield up her life in the defence of her Faith, in what manner they should please to appoint. The Bishop pressed her much with the argument of Gods omnipotency, mixing also many terrible threatnings threatnings of imprisonment, torments, and death; whereupon she said, My Lord, if before this company you will take it upon your Conscience, that the Doctrin which you would have me believe about the Sacrament, is true, and that at the dreadful day of Judgment you will answer for me therein, you shall know my further answer: To this the Bishop answered, That he would: But the Chancellor hearing him say so, said, My Lord, you know not what you do; you may not answer for an Heretick; whereupon the Bishop retracted his word: Then said the poor Woman, If you refuse to do this, I will answer no farther, but you may do with me as you please: Then they pronounced Sentence against her, and delivered her to the Bailiff of Darby; by whom she was shortly after burned, calling upon God for mercy as long as life lasted.

Her Martyrdom.

Presently after a godly and zealous Man called Edward Sharp, was condemned by the Bishop of Bristow; where constantly, and manfully persisting in the defence for the truth, he suffered Martyrdom.

At Mayfield in Sussex John Hart, Thomas Ravensdale, with Two others were condemned for the truth, and in the fire constantly, and joyfully yielded their lives for the Testimony of the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

Also John Horne, and a Woman died joyfully for the truth, being burned at Wotton Under-hedge in Glostershire.

Also in the same Town there lived one William Dangerfield, a very honest, and godly Man, who by his Wife Joane had Nine Children, and she now was lying in of the Tenth. William Dangerfield for his greater security had absented himself from home for a time, but hearing that his Wife was brought to Bed, he came home to visit her and his Children; which being known, the House was presently beset by his Popish Neighbors, and he being taken, was carried to Prison, and afterwards was so cruelly persecuted by the Bishop [Brooks] that his Legs were almost eaten off with the Irons. His Wife also, having lien in but Fourteen days, was carried out of her Child-bed, together with her Infant, and was put into the common Jail with Thieves, and Murtherers. Then did the Bishop send for the Man, and told him that his Wife had recanted, who was as well learned as he, and therefore perswaded him that he should not persist in his own opinion, but that he should recant also; and the better to induce him, he was suffered to go to his Wife, and had a form of recantation given him, and he promised to subscribe the same: But when he had told his Wife what he had done, and shewed her the recantation, her heart clave in sunder, and she cried out, Alas Husband, thus long we have continued one, and hath Satan so far prevailed with you as to cause you to break your vow, which you made with God in your Baptism: Hereupon the good Man, seeing how they had beguiled him, began exceedingly to bewail the promise that he had made to the Bishop, and made his Prayer to Almighty God, desiring him that he might not live so long, as to call evil good, and good evil: And shortly after he died, having lien in Prison Twelve weeks. Joane his Wife continued long in Prison, till her Infant through cold, and Famine, her milk being dried up, died: and she herself also survived not long, but ended her life in Prison.

THE LIFE OF
SIR JOHN CHEEK.

His preferment in the University.

He is made Tutor to
ward.

John Cheek being carefully brought up in learning was sent to Cambridg, where following his study hard, and having excellent natural Endowments, he so profited in learning, that he was first chosen Fellow of Saint Johns Colledg; Then the University Orator, and the Greek Reader in Cambridg: Afterwards he had the honor to be the first Regius Professor of the Greek Tongue in that University: By which means he grew so famous, that King Henry the Eighth committed his Son Prince Edward, being not at that time full Seven years old, to his tuition: His care in the education of that young Prince was such, that he not only instructed him in good Letters, but sowed those Seeds of Religion in him, which daily fructified (through Gods mercy) till he became famous, and an Instrument of beginning an admirable Reformation in the Church, of England, as you may read at large in his Life, in my Second Part of the Marrow of Ecclesiastical History.

Yea, by Sir John Cheeks means, the same saving truth was sweetly instilled also into the Lady Elizabeth, by those who, through his procurement, had the guidance of her younger years, and studies; amongst whom, one was William Grindall, a hopeful young Man of Saint Johns Colledg in Cambridg, who wanting other means, Sir John Cheek took him in his service, Anno Christi 1544. and and soon after preferred him to the Lady Elizabeth, with whom he continued, so long as he lived, in favor, and good esteem; And when he died, his place was presently supplied by Master Roger Ascham, who had been Master Cheeks Scholar whilst he was Fellow in Cambridg, and was his Successor in the Orators place in that University; A Man dear unto him for the similitude of his studies, but more, for his zeal to the true Religion.

Anno Christi 1551. King Edward Knighted Sir John Cheek, 1553. made him one of his Privy Council: But the King shortly after dying, Sir John Cheek was cast into Prison by Queen Mary, for favoring the title of the Lady Jane: Yet not long after getting his liberty, he amongst many others, fled into Germany; and lived in good credit in the City of Stratsburgh: But after a while, having obtained King Philips safe conduct to pass and repais by the means of the Lord Paget, he went to Bruxels to see the Queens Ambassadors: After which, as he, and Sir Peter Carew were bringing the Lord Paget on his way towards Antwerp, they were by the Provost Marshal apprehended, bound Arms, and Legs, and so tied in a Cart with Ropes, and carried to the Sea-side, where they were shipped, and thrust under Hatches till they came into England: Then was Sir John Cheek clapped up in the Tower close Prisoner, there was he put to a miserable choice, either to forego his life, or that which was far more precious, his liberty of conscience. No means, neither his great learning, his known integrity, nor nor the intercession of his Friends, and (among the rest) of Abbot Fecknam, a Man that could do much with Queen Mary, could prevail for his pardon at any lower rate than by recanting his Religion. This he was very unwilling to accept of, till his hard condition of Imprisonment, joyned with threats of much worle in case of his perseverance, and the many large promises made to his submission, with what other insinuating means humane Policy could invent, wrought so upon him, whilst he consulted with flesh and blood, as drew from him an Abrenuntiation of that truth which he had so long professed, and still, believed. Upon this he was soon restored to his liberty, but never to his comfort: For the sense and sorrow of his own Apostasie, and the daily sight of the cruel Butcheries exercised upon others for their constant profession of the truth, made such deep impressions upon his broken Spirit, as brought him to a speedy, yet through Gods mercy, to a comfortable end of his miserable life. He died in September in London, at the House of Peter Osburn Esquire, and his Body was interred in Saint Albans Woodstreet, Anno Christi, 1557.

A Bloody Commission

The next Moneth after there came out another Bloody Commission from the King and Queen, further to kindle the fire of Persecution, by reason whereof all the quarters of the Realm were full of Persecution, and the Prisons were stuffed with the Saints of God. And first, to begin with the Town of Colchester, where the wind of Persecution began fiercely to arise, insomuch as Twenty three Men and Women were apprehended in one day; Of which number one onely escaped; The other Twenty two were driven like sheep to London, ready to lay down their lives for the Gospels sake. Yet the Bishops being afraid to execute so many together, drew up a very easie submission for them, to which most of them subscribed, yet divers of them were afterwards apprehended again, and executed.

Three and Twenty Men and Women apprehended

Also about the same time Thomas Loseby, Henry Ramsey, Thomas Thirty, Margaret Hide, and Agnes Stanley, being sent out of Essex to Bishop Bonner, were examined, and standing stedfast in the truth, were by him condemned, and in Smithfield all of them in one fire, most joyfully, and constantly ended their lives.

Anno 1557. Stephen Gratwick was brought before the Bishop of Winchester, and after divers Articles objected against him, the Bishop asked him, if he would recant; To whom he answered, My Lord, my Faith is grounded more stedfastly then to change in a moment, yea, it is no process of time that can alter me, unless my Faith were like the waves of the Sea: Whereupon the Bishop condemned him; Then said he with a loud voice, Lord, lay not my Blood to their charge, if it be thy holy will; As he went back to Prison, he began to speak to the people; whereupon they cryed out, Cut out his Tongue; or stop his Mouth. Shortly after he, with William Morant, and one King were burnt together in Saint Georges Fields in Southwark.

In the Diocess of Canterbury, Joan Bradbridg, Walter Applebie, and his Wife, Edmund Allen, and his Wife, Joan Mannings, and a blind Maid, were examined before the Bishop, and by him condemned, and all of them burnt in one fire at Maidstone in Kent.

Also in the same Diocess, John Fishcock, Nicholas White, and Nicholas Par-due, with Four Women were imprisoned for the truth. Amongst these was one Alice Benden, who for a while was kept with the other in Canterbury Castle, but afterwards was by the Bishop removed into a Dungeon under ground, where none of her Friends could come to her; There she was fed with a half penny Bread, and a farthing Beer a day, neither could she get any more for her money; Her lodging was upon a little short Straw between a pair of Stocks, and a Stone-wall: There she lay Nine weeks, never changing her apparel, so that she fell into a pittiful condition: This made her grievously to bewail and lament her estate, reasoning with her self, why her Lord God did in so heavy a wise afflict her, and suffer her to be sequestred from her loving Prison-Fellows: In such extream misery and in these dolorous mournings she did continue till on a night, repeating that of the Psalmist: why art thou so heavy, O my soul? and why art thou so cast down within me? Still trust in God, &c. And Gods right hand can change all this, &c. She received comfort in the midst of her sorrows, and so continued joyful till her release. At last she was sent for to the Bishop; who asked her, if she would yet go to Church? promising favor if she would do it: To whom she answered, I am fully perswaded by the great extremity which you have shewed towards me, that you are not of God, your doings being so ungodly, and that you seek my destruction; withal, shewing how lame she was by reason of her ill lodging and diet, so that she was scarce able to move her self without pain: Hereupon the Bishop delivered her out of that filthy hole, and sent her to another Prison, till she, together with her other Fellows were brought forth, and condemned to the fire.

Their Martyrdom.

At the place of their Execution, they poured out their Prayers with so much zeal and affection to the Lord, that their very Adversaries could not but like it, and so preparing themselves for the fire, in the midst of the cruel flames, they comfortably resigned up their Spirits unto God. Bradbridges Wife, who was one of them, had Two Children, whose Names were Patience and Charity; and when she was condemned by the Bishop, she said to him, My Lord, if you will needs burn me, yet I hope you will then take and keep Patience and Charity: Nay, quoth the Bishop, by the Faith of my Body, I will meddle with neither of them both.

Richard Woodman and Nine more.

In the Town of Lewis were Ten faithful Servants of God put into one fire, of which number Richard Woodman was one: He was by occupation an Iron-maker, dwelling in the Parish of Warbleton, in the County of Sussex. The occasion of his first apprehension was this: There was one Fairbanck, the Minister of that Parish, who in the days of King Edward had often perswaded his People, not to credit any other Doctrin but that which he then preached: But in the beginning of Queen Maries Reign, he wheeled about, and taught the clean contrary: Whereupon Woodman admonished him to teach them the truth, and reproved his inconstancy: For this he was apprehended and carried before the Justices, and by them was committed to the Kings Bench; where he continued for a year, and an half, and then by Doctor Story was removed to the Bishops Coal-house: yet after some time he was released, and so enjoyed his liberty, the Bishop only enjoying him that he should be an honest Man, and a member of the true Catholick Church, founded on the Prophets, and Apostles, Christ being the Head of it.

Woodmans imprisonment.

His release.

Upon his delivery, the Papists reported that he had consented to the Bishop; But the contrary shortly after appeared: For he went from Parish to Parish, confirming, and strengthening the Brethren: Hereupon the Commissioners complained of him to Sir John Gage, the Queens Chamberlain, telling him that Woodman went about Baptizing Children, and marrying Persons, with many such lies, to make him the more odious: Upon this information, divers Warrants were sent abroad for his apprehension: But through Gods mercy, he had warning of the danger, and so kept himself out of the way.

His second apprehension.

Shortly after Sir John Gage sent Three of his Men to apprehend him: Woodman being at plough with his Servants, just in the way, as they were going to his House to seek him, they espying of him, arrested him, and told him that he must go with them to their Lord. This made his flesh to tremble on the sudden; yet he answered, that he would go with them; only he requested them that they would go with him to his House, till he had broke his fast, and changed his apparel; which they consented to. By the way he said in his heart: why am I thus afraid? They can charge me with no evil, and if they kill me for well doing, I shall be happy, &c. This much quieted his heart, though he was loth to part with Wife, and Children, and Estate: Yet, (saith he) as soon as I was perswaded in my mind to die, I had regard of nothing in this world; but was as joyful, and merry merry (I praise God) as ever I was in my life. This battel lasted not above a quarter of an hour, but it was sharper to me then death it self, for the time it lasted.

After Breakfast, he asked them for their Warrant, that so he might the better prepare himself for his answer: But they told him, that they had not their Warrant there: Then said he to them, It's strange that you should come to fetch me away without a Warrant, which makes me think you have none, but that you do it only to pick a thank with your Master. Indeed I have heard that there were some warrants out for me, but that they were called in again, upon a letter which I wrote to the Commissaries Court, wherein I informed him that I was falsely accused, with Baptizing Children, and marrying, which I never did, being no Minister, and therefore not appointed thereunto: wherefore satisfie yone selves, for I will not go with you, unless you carry me by force, and if you attempt that, do it at your own peril: And so he withdrew himself from them into his Chamber: Upon this they were so affrighted, that they presently went their ways. Woodman conceived that God had hereby opened a door for his escaping, yet went he after them, and said, Friends, if you have a Warrant, I desire you for Gods sake to shew it me, and I will go with you: But if you have none, I desire you to depart in Gods peace, and the Kings.

He refuses to go with them.

These Men went strait to fetch the Constable, and some others to carry him away by force; But before they came, he was gone, as God would have it: They searched every corner of the House for him, and in the night after they made another search, but to no purpose; yet afterwards he came home, and his Wife told him all things. Then he, presuming that great wait would be laid for him, told his Wife that he would hide himself in a Wood not far off, and so taking his Bible, with his Pen and Ink, he went into it, and lay there Six or Seven weeks, his Wife bringing him meat daily, as he had need. Afterwards a report was spread abroad, that he was seen in Flanders; whereupon they gave over seeking for him any longer. So when all was hushed, he went abroad amongst his Christian Friends, and afterwards went over into Flanders, and France; but thought every day Seven years till he was at home again, and therefore he returned as soon as possibly he could.

He hides himself in a Wood.

But as soon as his return was known, the Popish Clergy procured Warrants, and caused his House to be searched often: Thus he remained above half a year, sometimes abroad, and sometimes at home, doing his business openly, and yet his Adversaries had no power to lay Hands on him, his Hour being not yet come; But at last he was betrayed by his own Brother, his Father conspiring together with him; For he had left a good Estate in their Hands to pay his debts, and to provide for his Wife, and Children: Hereupon Richard Woodman sent some Friends to his Father, requesting him to come to an account with him, which he consented to, and the day and hour were appointed; But against that time his Father, and Brother had discovered his being at home, and so divers were appointed to apprehend him. When they came near the House, a Girl cried out to her Mother, that some were coming to take her Father; whereupon her Mother shut the Doors: And he hearing a voice, crept into a private hole. Then did his Wife open the Door, and they came in, and with a Candle, searched every corner of the House; but could not find him: But when they were gone out, a Traitor, to whom he had formerly shewed this secret place, asked them whether they had searched over the Window in his Hall: Then did they return to search there, but could find no entrance into it. But Woodman perceiving that the place was discovered, and that they would break it open, he set his shoulders to some Boards, and brake them down, and so leaped forth, and ran his way down a lane that was full of sharp Cinders, and being barefoot, the Cinders did miserably cut his Feet; so that seeking to escape them, he fell into a miry hole, by reason whereof, one that pursued him laid hold of him: Then carried they him back to his House, where his Father met him, and had him him remember himself; So I do, said he, I praise God. This day was appointed by God for me to be delivered into mine Enemies Hands, but woe be to him by whom I am betrayed, it had been good for him if he had never been born, if he speedily repent not. The Scripture is fulfilled on me: The Father shall be against the Son, and the Brother shall deliver the Brother unto death. Then they bound his Arms, for which he rejoiced that he was counted worthy to be bound for the Name of Christ. So he took his leave of his Wife and Children, and they presently carried him away to Christopher Bishop of Chichester.

Christ preferred before Wife, and Children.

The Bishop told him that if he would be reformed, he might enjoy his Wife, and Children &c. To whom he answered, I love my Wife, and Children in the Lord; And if I had Ten thousand pounds in Gold, I had rather forego it all then them: But yet I have them as if I had them not, and must not for their sakes displease God.

After other discourse, Doctor Story moved the Bishop to send him away presently to the Marshalsee; which he much rejoiced at, that so he might be amongst his Brethren, and old Prison-Fellows, which the Bishop perceiving said, Methinks he is not afraid of the Prison.

Their Martyrdom with Nine others. Ambrose died in Prison. Richard Lush.

Story. Bible, Bable, Bible, Bable. what speakest thou of the Bible? After much other talk, he was sent to Prison, and several times after sent for and examined, and at last condemned, and carried to Lewis in Sussex, where he, with Five other men, and Four Women were burned together in one Fire.

Simon Miller.

About the same time one Ambrose died in Maiden Prison who otherwise had been burnt for the truth: And one Richard Lush suffered Martyrdom under the Bishop of Bath and Wells.

There was dwelling in the Town of Linn one Simon Miller, a godly, and zealous Man, and a Man that much detested and abhorred all Idolatry. He going to Norwich, and seeing a multitude of People coming out of the Church, from their Popish service, asked aloud, where one might go to have the Communion?

Elizabeth Cooper.

The People wondered at his boldness. and shortly after he was apprehended, and carried before Dunnings, the Chancellor, who examined him of his Faith, and then had him to the Bishops House, where he was kept Prisoner: But by the connivance of his Keeper, he went home to Linn, where he continued till he had set his Household-affairs in order, after which he returned back to the Bishops House, and constantly abiding in the profession of the truth, was at last condemned and burned.

Their Martyrdom.

And there was burned together with him one Elizabeth Cooper, who having formerly made a recantation in Saint Andrews Church in Norwich, was exceedingly troubled in mind for the same, and could have no peace of Conscience, till, going into the same Church before all the people, she had retracted, and revoked her recantation; For which she was apprehended, and carried to Prison, and after condemned: When the fire came first to her, she a little shrunk, crying Ho: Whereupon Simon Miller put back his Hand to her, bidding her to be strong, and of good cheer: For, good Sister, said he, we shall have a merry, and joyful Supper: This so quieted her Heart that she stood very still, being glad to finish that work that she had before so happily begun: And so committing their Souls into the Hands of God, they ended their lives in the flames.

We heard before of Twenty two Persons sent up from Colchester, most of which upon an easie submission were sent home again by Bishop Bonner; amongst which were William Munt, of Much-Bentley in Essex, and Alice his Wife, and

Rose

Rose Allen her Daughter: These godly Persons after their return, abstained from the Popish service, and frequented the company of good People, and spent their time in reading, conference, and prayer: Which so angered Thomas Tie, Priest of the Parish, that he procured divers others to joyn with him in Petitioning against them to the Lord Darcie.

He wrote also to Bishop Bonner against them, so that they were fain to hide themselves from that storm that hung over their Heads for a while; But upon the first Sabbath in Lent, at Two of the Clock in the morning, one Master Edmund Tyrel, taking the Constables and divers others with him, beset Munt's House round about, and then called to him to open the Doors; which being done, Tyrel and his Complices went into the Chamber, where Father Munt and his Wife lay, willing them presently to rise, for they must go with him to Colchester Castle: Mother Munt hearing that, being very sick, desired that her Daughter might first fetch her some drink, for that she was very ill; Then Tyrel gave her leave, and so Rose Allen went with a Candle to fetch some: As she came back Tyrel met her, and bade her give her Father and Mother good counsel, and to advise them to be good Catholics: She answered, They have better Instructors then I, for the Holy Ghost doth teach them, I hope, which will not, I trust suffer them to err? What, said Tyrel, art thou of that mind still? Its time to look to such Hereticks as thou art. Sir, said she, After that way which you call Heresie, so worship I the Lord my God, I tell you the truth.

Tyrel. Then I perceive that thou wilt burn, Gossip, with the rest of the Company.

Rose. No Sir, not for the Companies sake, but for my Christs sake, if I be called to it, and I hope in his mercies if he call me to it, he will enable me to bear it.

Tyrel turning to his Company, said, This Gossip will burn; do you not think it? Then said one, Marry Sir, prove her, and you shall see what she will do by and by. Then this cruel Tyrel took the Candle out of her Hand, and held it so long under her wrist, till the very sinews crackt asunder: Then said Tyrel to her, what whore, wilt thou not cry? To which she answered, That she had no cause, she thanked God, to cry, but to rejoyce rather; And that he had more cause to weep, if he considered the matter well: At this he thrust her from him, saying, Ah strong whore, Thou shameless Beast, Thou Beastly whore, &c. Then said she, Sir, Have you done what you will do? Yea, said he, and if thou likest it not, thou mayest mend it: Mend it, said she? nay the Lord mend you, and give you repentance if it be his will.

Rose Allen Hand burnt.

This Rose Allen being afterwards asked how she could endure the pain of that cruel Burning: answered, That at first she felt some pain, but afterwards very little or none at all. Tyrel further searching the House, found in it one John Thurston, and Margaret his Wife, whom with the rest, he carried away immediately to Colchester Castle. These Five persons, with Five others, were often examined of their Faith, which they boldly confessed, and constantly adhered to, for which they were all of them condemned; Six of them were brought forth in the morning, viz. William Bungeor, William Purchas, Thomas Benold, Agnes Silver-side, Hellen Ewring, and Elizabeth Folks; And at the place of Martyrdom they kneeled down, and made their humble prayers to Almighty God; and then arose, and prepared themselves for the fire: Elizabeth Folks putting off her Petticoat, would have given it to her Mother, who kissed her, and exhorted her to be strong in the Lord; But the Executioners would not suffer her: Whereupon she threw the Petticoat from her, saying, Farewel all the world: Farewel Faith; Farewel Hope; and taking the Stake in her Hand, she said, welcome Love. As the Officer was nailing the Chain to the Stake, he missed his mark, and hit her a great blow with his Hammer on the Shoulder-bone; At which she lifted up her Eyes to Heaven, and with a smiling countenance prayed to God; and then proceeded to exhort the People

People again. When the fire was kindled about them, they clapped their Hands for joy in the flames; whereupon the Spectators cried, The Lord strengthen you; The Lord comfort you; The Lord pour his mercies upon you, &c. and so they joyfully yielded up their Spirits together. In the afternoon were brought forth, William Munt, John Johnson, Alice Munt, and Rose Allen, who after their Prayers to God, were joyfully tied to the Stake, calling upon God, and exhorting the people earnestly to fly from Idolatry, and so they suffered Martyrdom with joy. John Thurston aforementioned died in Prison, a constant Confessor of Jesus Christ.

George Eagles
over.

George Eagles, a Tailor by occupation, being eloquent, and of good utterance, gave over his calling, and applied himself to the prophet of Christs Church; and when he saw so many of Gods Saints persecuted and murdered for the truth, he wandred abroad into divers Countries, where he could find any of his Brethren, whom he earnestly encouraged and comforted, now tarrying in one Town, then in another, as occasion served; Lodging, sometimes in Houses, sometimes in the Fields, and Woods; and for his excessive pains in travelling about, he was called Trudgeover; when he lay abroad he spent most of his time in earnest and faithful prayer unto God; his diet was exceeding slender, so that for three years he drank nothing but Water.

His apprehen-
sion.

His abode was most about Colchester: But the Devil at last stirred up his Instruments to lie in wait for him, and Spies were sent abroad with a command to seize upon him wheresoever they found him, and to bring him either alive or dead. Yet he kept himself still in secret places, so that they could not catch him; Then did they procure a Proclamation in the Queens Name, that whosoever could apprehend him should have Twenty pounds for his pains. At length he was espied at Colchester, whereupon a great multitude pursued him; And he, to escape them, first fled into a Grove, and then into a Corn-Field, where he hid himself, and all his pursuers, despairing to find him were returned, but only one crafty Knave, who climbed up into a Tree, and sat there watching for him. Eagles hearing no noise, supposing all safe, rose upon his knees, whereby this Villain spied him, and coming down, laid Hands on him, and carried him Prisoner to Colchester, expecting the promised reward of Ten pounds, but never got but a very small sum of money, for the reward of his treachery.

He is condemned for Treason.

After he had been Prisoner a while at Colchester, he was carried to Chelmsford, where he spent the whole night in prayer, and from thence to London, where after he had been imprisoned a while, he was sent back to Chelmsford, there to be tried at the Sessions, being accused of Treason, for that he had assembled companies together, and though he defended his cause stoutly and boldly, making a full declaration of his Religion, and Faith before the Judges; yet the Indictment went on, wherein he was charged, that he prayed that God would turn the Queens Heart, or else that he would take her away; The first he confessed, but denied the second, yet was he condemned for a Traitor.

Much means was used to perswade him to confess that he had offended the Queen, and to ask her forgiveness; which he refused to do, and so was drawn on an Hurdle to the place of execution.

All the way he read upon a Psalm-Book, and at the place he prayed unto God, stood very constant till he was turned off the Ladder.

At his death this was remarkable; Two Thieves being to be executed with him, he exhorted them to embrace the truth, and to persevere therein; whereupon one of them scoffingly said, why should we doubt of going to Heaven, seeing this holy Man shall go before us, as our Captain in the way? we shall certainly flee thither strait, so soon as he hath made us the entry; But the other Thief reproved him for it, and gave good heed to George Eagles exhortation, earnestly bewailing his own wickedness, and crying to Christ for mercy; whereas the other, the more he was bidden to leave off his scoffing, the more perverse he was, and continued in his wickedness. At last coming to the place of Execution, the Penitent Thief upon the Ladder, exhorted the People to take heed to themselves, and to beware by his example of transgressing the Commandments of God, and and so humbly commending his soul into the Hands of God, he ended his life quietly and in a godly manner.

A Penitent Thief.

When the mocker came upon the Ladder, he likewise would have said something, but his Tongue did so fumble and falter in his Head, that he was not able to speak one word: He would fain have uttered his mind, but could not; Then one bade him say the Lords Prayer, but neither could he do that, but dreamed out now and then a word: This Spectacle much astonished those which took notice of Gods just judgments upon him, for his former mocking at so serious a matter.

Gods judgment on a Scoffer.

George Eagles being cut down before he was dead, was hacked, and mangled by one William Swallow, Bailiff of Chelmsford, his Body opened, Heart pulled out and so his Body divided into Four quarters, which were set up in several places. But shortly after Gods terrible judgment fell upon this Swallow. His Hair coming off his Head, his Eyes were so closed, that he could scarce see, the Nailes fell off from his Fingers, and Toes, and a Leaprosie overspread his whole Body, and his Estate so wasted that he fell into Beggary.

Gods Judgment on Persecutors.

Also one Richard Pott, that had vexed, and molested George Eagles, both in the Inn, and as he went to execution; it pleased God that not long after, he fell down in his House foaming at mouth, and could neither speak word, nor understand what was said to him, in which case he continued for Three or Four days, and so died.

About the same time there suffered at Norwich a godly, and constant Martyr of Christ called Richard Crafshfield, who being examined by Dunnings, the Chancellor, about the Sacrament of the Altar and such like questions, made a good confession of his Faith, and constantly adhered to the same, notwithstanding all the flatteries and threatnings used to pervert him, for which he was condemned, and delivered to the secular power; And a few days after was by the Sheriffs had to the Stake, where in the flames, he constantly, and comfortably ended his days.

Richard Crafshfield.

In the same moneth a Man called Frier, and the Sister of George Eagles, were burnt together in Rocheſter for the truth.

One Frier, and George Eagles Sister: Mistress Joyce Lewis.

Mistress Joyce Lewis was a Gentlewoman born, brought up tenderly, and delicately in her youth; First married to one Appleby, and afterwards to Thomas Lewis of Manceter in Warwickſhire: In the beginning of Queen Maries Reign, she went to the Maſs, as others did: But hearing of the cruel Martyrdom of Master Lawrence Saunders at Coventry, she enquired what was the cause of it: And being informed that it was for his oppoſing of the Maſs, she began to be much troubled in her mind, and reſorted to the Houſe of Master John Glover, (before mentioned) deſiring him to diſcover to her the faults that were in the Maſs, and of other things then urged as neceſſary to ſalvation.

Master Glover perceiving her troubled Spirit, and reſtleſs deſire to be informed of the truth, moſt diligently inſtructed her in the ways of the Lord, proving by Gods Word, that both the Maſs, and all other Popiſh inventions, were odious, and abominable unto God, reproving her alſo for her too great delight in the vanities of this world, which ſhe was too much addicted to: And it pleaſed God ſo to bleſs this his wholeſome counſel, that ſhe began to wax weary of the world, throughly ſorrowful for her ſins, and was much enflamed with a love to God, deſiring to ſerve him according to his Word, reſolving to abandon whatſoever was diſpleaſing to him. So that, when afterwards her impetuous Husband forced her to go to Church, ſhe turned her back upon the holy Water, which ſhould have been ſprinkled upon her, and manifeſted her deteſtation of the ſame; For which ſhe was accuſed to the Biſhop, and a Summoner preſently was ſent for her.

Her conversion.

The Summoner giving the Citation to her Husband, he was so incensed, that he bade him take it back again, or he would make him to eat it: The Summoner refusing the first, he set a Dagger to his Heart, and forced him to eat it up, and to drink after it, and so let him depart. Presently after, both he, and his Wife were sent for before the Bishop, and Lewis himself incontinently submitted, and begged pardon: And the Bishop was willing to accept of his submission, provided that his Wife would do the like also; But she stoutly refused, telling the Bishop that by her rejecting the holy Water, she had neither offended God, nor broken any of his Laws. This much enraged the Bishop, yet because she was a Gentlewoman, he was content to give her a moneths time to consider of it, taking Bond of her Husband, at the moneths end to bring her in again.

and constancy.

When they came home, she betook her self to earnest, and fervent prayer to God, and oft resorted to Master John Glover, who much encouraged her to stand to the truth, yet withal advised her to take heed of vain glory, and told her what it was like to cost her, and therefore she should be sure to be well grounded or else she would not hold out.

The moneth being expired, Master Glover, and some other Friends, perswaded her Husband that he should endeavor the perservation of his Wife, and rather forfeit his Bond then cast her into the fire: Her Husband answered, that he would lose nothing for her sake, and so delivered her up to the Bloody Bishop, by whom she was examined, and through Gods mercy, was more stout, and resolute then she was before death was threatened.

Her unkind Husband.

Incontinently she was sent to a stinking Prison, which was so noisom, that a Maid appointed to attend her, fell into a swoon. During her imprisonment she was oft examined, and being found unmovable, was at last adjudged for an Heretick worthy to be burned.

Popish cruelty.

Being asked by the Bishop why she would not be present at the Mass, and receive the Sacraments, she answered, Because she found them not in Gods word, otherwise, said she, I would with all my Heart reverence, esteem, and receive them: The Bishop replied, If thou wilt believe no more than is written in the Scriptures, thou art in a damnable condition: At this she was much amazed, and being moved by the Spirit of God, she told him, his words were ungodly, and wicked.

After her condemnation she was committed to the Sheriff, then newly chosen, who kept her in Prison all his year, and could by no means be forced to burn her, for which he was afterwards in great trouble; and hardly himself escape death.

Her behavior after her condemnation.

During all the time of her imprisonment, she behaved her self so holily, and unblamably, that all that observed it, did much bewail that such a Woman as she should be put to death. At last a Writ coming down for her execution, she sent for her Friends, consulting with them, how she might behave her self, at the time of her death, so as might bring most glory to God, edification to his Church, and so as might most tend to the shame of her Adversaries. As for death, said she, I fear it not, for when I behold the amiable countenance of Christ my dear Saviour, the ugly face of death doth not much trouble me: She also reasoned most comfortably with them out of the Scriptures about Election, and Reprobation.

feared.

The night before she was to suffer, some Priests sent to her that they were come to hear her confession; For they should be sorry that she should die without it. She returned answer, That she had made her confession to Christ her Saviour, at whose Hands she was sure to have forgiveness of her sins. As for the cause for which she was to die, she had no reason to confess that, but rather to praise God who counted her worthy to suffer death for his words sake: And as for that absolution, which they were authorized by the Pope to give her, she defied, and detested it from the bottom of her Heart.

The

The Priests having received this answer, well, said they, to morrow her stoutness will be tried; And so in great discontent they departed.

All the night she was wonderfull chearfull, and merry; yet with a certain gravity, so that the Majesty of Gods Spirit did wonderfully appear in her, which expelled the fear of death out of her Heart.

Comfort before death.

She spent her time in reading, prayer, and conferring with her Friends that came to comfort her.

About Three of the clock in the morning, Satan began to molest her; and to shoot his fiery darts against her, questioning with her, how she knew that she was elected to life, and that Christ died for her, &c.

Her temptations.

Those about her being made acquainted with it, bade her answer the Tempter in these words of Paul, which hath loved me, and given himself for me: Suggesting also that her vocation by the word was a manifest token of Gods love to her, especially Gods Spirit having wrought in her Heart, a love to God, and a desire to obey him in all things, &c. By this means, and especially by the comfortable promises of Christ, brought out of the Scriptures, Satan was put to flight, and she received much comfort.

Gal. 2. 20

At Eight a clock in the morning the Sheriff brought her word that she had but one hour to live in this world, and therefore, said he, prepare your self as it stands you in hand: This message so abruptly delivered, made her somewhat abashed: But a Friend standing by, said, Mistress Lewis, you have cause to praise God, who so speedily will take you out of this miserable world; and make you worthy to be a witness to his truth, and to bear record unto Christ that he is the only Saviour.

This so revived her, that she said: Master Sheriff, your message is welcome to me, and I thank my God, who accounts me worthy to lay down my life in his quarrel.

When the Sheriff came for her, one of her Friends desired him to give him leave to go along with her to the Stake, which the Sheriff granted, for which he was afterwards much molested by some enemies of the truth. At the Stake she prayed earnestly Three times, and especially that God would abolish the Idolatrous Mass, to which almost all the multitude, and amongst them the Sheriff himself, cried Amen. Then taking a Cup of Beer, she said, Drink to all them that unfeignedly love the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, and that wish the abolishment of Popery: Her Friends pledged her, and a great number of People, especially of Women, for which afterwards they were enjoined penance.

Her Martyrdom.

Being tied with a Chain to the Stake, she looked with an exceeding chearful, and ruddy countenance, and stood so patiently, that the people much lamented for her, and with tears bewailed the Tyranny of her Popish Adversaries. When fire was set to her, she neither strived, nor struggled, but with her Hands lift up to Heaven, she quickly gave up the Ghost. Some cruel Papist suborned some to rail upon her, and one was appointed to write down the Names of her Friends, yet God wonderfully preserved them out of their Hands.

There was one Ralph Allerton, who coming into his Parish Church of Bently in Essex, and seeing the People idle, or ill employed there, he exhorted them to go to Prayer, whereunto they consented: And Prayer being ended, he read unto them a Chapter out of the New Testament: For which, being informed against, he was forced to hide himself in Woods, and other solitary places; but at last being apprehended, he was sent to Bishop Bonner, who by his subtil persuasions, and flatteries, so prevailed with this poor Man, that he drew him to recant his former profession, and so dismissed him.

Ralph Allerton.

But this base cowardize of his, brought him into such bondage and terror of Soul, and Conscience, and so cast him down, that if the Lord had not been exceeding gracious to him, he had perished for ever; but the Lord looking with the eyes of mercy, after he had chastened him, raised him up again, giving him not only hearty, and unfeigned repentance, but also a constant boldness to profess his Name, and Gospel even to the death.

This was quickly discovered by his Adversaries; whereupon he was apprehended, and again sent up to Bonner, at which time ensued this conference.

Bonner. Ah Sirrah, how chance you are come hither again, I hope thou art accused wrongfully?

Ralph. Yea, my Lord, so I am, for I should be sorry to be guilty of such things as I am accused of.

Bonners prophaneness.

Bonner. By Saint Mary, it is well said, but let me hear what thou sayest?

Ralph. I desire to hear who are my Accusers? and what my accusation is?

Bonner. Wilt thou so? Before God, if thou hast not dissembled, thou needest not fear to answer for thy self; But tell me, didst thou not dissemble?

Ralph. If you will not produce mine Accusers, my Conscience constrains me to accuse my self; For I confess that I have grievously offended God, by my dissimulation at my last being before you, for which I am heartily sorry, as God knoweth.

Bonner. wherein didst thou dissemble?

Ralph. In that I set my Hand to a Writing, that I did believe all that the Catholick Church teacheth, &c. wherein I shamefully dissembled, in that I did not disclose my mind concerning the difference between the true, and untrue Church.

Bonner. Pray thee let me hear more of this gear; For I fear thou wilt smell of an Heretick anon. Which is the true Church as thou sayest? Is it not the Church of the Hereticks?

Ralph. I utterly abhor the Church of Hereticks, and the Church Catholick is that only which I imbrace, whose Doctrine is sincere, pure, and true.

Bonner. By Saint Austin, that is well said of thee: For by God Almighty, if thou hadst allowed the Church of the Hereticks, I would have burned thee: By our Lady, how say you Sirrah, which is the Catholick Church?

Ralph. Even that which hath received the joyful sound of Gods word.

Bonner. Thou sayest true before God; For that way which is taught in all Christendom, must needs be the true Catholick Church.

Acts 20. 29.

Ralph. My Lord, it's true, the Gospel hath been preached, and persecuted in all Lands, first in Jewry by the Scribes and Pharisees, then by the Roman Emperors, &c. and now also is the Apostle Pauls saying fulfilled, There shall come grievous Wolves among you, devouring the Flock.

Bonner. Now by the blessed Sacrament, thou art the rankest Heretick that ever came before me: Now by Saint All-hallows, thou shalt be burnt, thou whore-son Varlet, thou pricklunce Knaave, &c. And so after much more communication, he was sent to the Little-ease, and afterwards had Articles exhibited against him; to which he subscribed thus, Except it be proved otherwise by the holy Scriptures, I do affirm these Articles to be true. And so at last he was brought forth to his condemnation; where Bonner asked him what he had to say why Sentence should not be pronounced against him? To which he answered, You ought not to condemn me for an Heretick, seeing I am a good Christian. But go to, do as you have determined; For I see that truth is oppressed, and cannot find entertainment amongst you.

His condemnation.

James Austoo, and Margery his Wife, and Richard Roth, Martyrs.

Then did the Bishop proceed to condemn him, and delivered him over to the secular power, by whom he was shortly after burned at Islington, together with James Austoo, and Margery his Wife, and Richard Roth: All which persons joyfully yielded up their Souls to God in the midst of the flames.

We have heard before of Ten godly Persons that were burnt together at Colchester, at which time there were Two other good Women, viz. Margaret Thurston, and Agnes Bongier, that should have suffered with them, but it pleased God

God thus to prevent it. Margaret Thurston, a little before they were to suffer, found a great trembling in her flesh; whereupon she went apart to make her earnest Prayer to God for his assistance; And in the mean time came the Jailor; and whilst she stepped aside to fetch her Psalter, he took forth the other Prisoner, and left her behind.

A special providence.

The other called Agnes Bongier was left behind, because her Name was mistaken in the Writ: Agnes Bomyer, for Agnes Bongier: But when upon that occasion she saw her self separated from the rest of her other Prison-Fellows: Oh what pitious moan that good Woman made? How bitterly she wept? What strange thoughts came into her mind? How naked, and desolate did she esteem her self without them? And how was she plunged into care, and despair? It was pittiful, and wonderful to see; And all because she did not with them, give her life in the defence of the truth, which she was fully prepared, and resolved to have done; and accordingly had that morning sent away her little Infant, which had sucked on her during her imprisonment till then: Yea such an ardent desire had she to be sacrificed with them, that death seemed far more welcome to her than life.

Agnes Bongier troubled, because she escaped Martyrdom.

In this her great perplexity, a godly Friend finding her, asked her, whether Abrahams obedience in purposing to offer up his Son unto God, was not as much accepted as if he had offered him? To which she thus answered, I know that Abrahams will was as much accepted with God, as if he had done the deed, because he would have done it, if the Angel of the Lord had not stayed him. But in this I am unhappy, in that the Lord thinketh me not worthy of this dignity; and therefore Abrahams case and mine are not alike. Why, said her Friend, would you not willingly have gone with your company, if the Lord had suffered it? Yea, quoth she, withal my heart, and because I did it not, it is now my great grief, and trouble. Then said he, My dear Sister, I pray thee consider Abraham and thy self well, and thou shalt see that the case differs not at all. But alas, quoth she, there was a far greater matter in Abrahams trial, For he should have offered up his only Child; but so should not I. I know well, said he, that Abraham should have offered up his Son; And have not you, said the other, done the like by your sucking Babe? Consider also that whereas he was commanded but to offer his Son, you are heavy, and grieved because you offered not your self, which is more than Abrahams obedience, and therefore doubts not but it is accepted with God, &c. After this discourse she was somewhat quieted, and wholly employed herself in reading, and prayer, wherein she found much comfort.

Presently after came a new Writ, for the burning of these Two good Women. When they came to the place of execution, they fell down upon their Knees, and made their humble, and hearty Prayers unto God; and so rising up, they went joyfully to the Stake, and being chained to it, and in the midst of the flames, with great rejoicing, and triumph they resigned up their Spirits unto God.

Margaret Thurston, and Agnes Bongier, Martyrs.

There was dwelling at Laxefield in the County of Suffolk one John Noyes, a Shoemaker, and a godly Man, whome some of his Popish spiteful Neighbors agreed amongst themselves to apprehend, and accordingly going to his House, they found him going out of Doors, and One of them calling to him, asked him whither he went? He answered, To a Neighbors of mine: To whom the other replied, Your Master hath deceived you now, you must come, and go with us: Noyes answered, Take heed that your Master deceive not you. So they took him, and carried him before the Justices, who after examination, sent him to Eye-dungeon, and after he had lien there a while, to the Bishop at Norwich: There he was examined about the real presence of Christ in the Sacrament, &c. To which he answered, that he believed Christs Body to be in Heaven, and therefore not in the Sacrament: For which, Sentence was read against him by the Bishop. Afterwards a Brother in Law coming to comfort him him, asked him, Whether being to die so painful a death, he was not afraid of it, when the Bishop came to pass Sentence upon him? To which he answered, That he thanked God he feared it not at all. After this he was sent to Laxefield to be burned, and against the time of his burning, all the People in the Town had put out their Fires, only some smoak was spied in one Chimney; Whereupon the Sheriff and his Officers went to that House, and brake open the Doors, and so gat fire.

His Martyrdom.

John Noyes, when he came to the place of execution, kneeled down, and repeated the One and fiftieth Psalm, with some other Prayers: and being bound to the Stake, he said: Fear not them that can kill the Body, but fear him that is able to cast both Body, and Soul into everlasting fire. Seeing his Sister weep, and make moan for him: He bade her not to weep for him, but for her sins. Then took he up a Fagot, and kissed it, saying: Blessed be God that ever I was born to come to this. Then said he to the People, They tell you, that they can make God of a piece of Bread, but believe them not. Good People, bear witness, that I believe to be saved by the passion, and merits of Jesus Christ alone, and not by mine own good works. When the fire was kindled, he said: Lord, have mercy upon me: Christ, have mercy upon me: Son of David have mercy upon me, and so he yielded up the Ghost.

Cicely Ormes.

At the burning of Two godly Persons at Norwich, there was present one Cicely Ormes, who told them that she would pledg them of the same Cup that they drank of: For which she was apprehended, and carried before the Chancellor, who asked her, What it was that the Priest held up over his Head? She said, Bread: and if you would make it any better, it is worse. For this he sent her to Prison. Afterwards he sent for her again, and told her, that if she would go to Church, and hold her Tongue, she should be at liberty to believe as she listed: To whom she answered, I will not consent to your wicked desire therein, do with me what you will: For if I should, God would plague me for it. The Chancellor told her, that she was an ignorant, and foolish Woman, and that he had proffered her more favor then ever he shewed to any, but if she persisted in her wilfulness, he must condemn her. She answered, That she passed not for his threats, and that if he did proceed to it, he should not be so desirous of her sinful flesh, as she, through Gods grace, would be content to lay it down in so good a quarrel. Then read he the Bloody Sentence against her, and so delivered her to the secular power.

Her constancy.

Her former weakness.

Her recovery.

About a year before, she had been apprehended, but through weakness had recanted; after which she was never quiet in Conscience till she had utterly renounced all her Popish superstitions: And thereupon had gotten a Letter drawn up to certifie the Chancellor, that she repented of her recantation from the very bottom of her Heart, and would never do the like again whilst she lived: But before she could send this Letter, she was again apprehended, and dealt withal, as we have heard before.

Her Speech at death.

When she came to the Stake, she kneeled down, and prayed earnestly unto God: Then rising up, she said, Good People, I believe in God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, Three Persons and one God: This I will never recant. But I recant utterly from the bottom of my Heart, that I have ever been accessary to the doings of the Pope of Rome, and all his Popish Priests, and shavelings, whom I utterly renounce, and will never have to do with them again by Gods grace. And good People, I would not have you think, that I expect to be saved, because I offer my self here to death for the Lords cause; But I believe to be saved by the death, and passion of Jesus Christ: And this my death shall be a Testimony of my Faith to you all here present: Good People, as many of you as believe, as I do, pray for me. When she came to the Stake, she kissed it, and said, welcome the Cross of Christ: welcome the sweet Cross of Christ. When the fire was kindled about her, she said, said, My Soul doth magnifie the Lord; and my Spirit doth rejoyce in God my Saviour: and so casting up her Head, and Eyes towards Heaven, and holding up her Hands against her Breast, she there continued them till the sinews of her Arms brake, and then they fell down; and she yielded up her life unto the Lord as quietly as if she had been in a slumber, and as one feeling no pain.

Her Martyrdom.

In the Diocess of Chichester many godly Persons were persecuted, condemned, and burned for the truth.

About the same time, one Thomas Spurdance, a Servant of Queen Maries, was brought before the Chancellor of Norwich, who asked him, whether he had been with a Priest at confession? He answered, No, he had confessed his sins to God, who promiseth that if a sinner confesseth, and forsaketh his sins, he shall have mercy; And that, saith he, is sufficient for me.

Thomas Spurdance.

Chancellor. When did you receive the Sacrament of the Altar?

Spurdance. I will not meddle with it as you use it: The Sacrament of the Lords Supper belongs to Christs Church; But you are none of Christs members; For you teach Laws contrary to Christs Laws.

Chancellor. Do'st thou not believe that after the words of Consecration in the Sacrament of the Altar there is the same Body of Christ as was born of the Virgin Mary?

Spurdance. No; For that Body consisted of flesh, blood, and bones; and here is no such thing.

Chancellor. Thou art an Heretick; Thou deniest the Sacrament of the Altar.

Spurdance. If you will know how I believe: I believe, that if I come worthily, as God hath commanded me, to his holy Supper, I receive him by Faith, believing in him. But the Bread is not God: For God dwelleth not in temples made with Hands, neither will he be worshipped with the works of Mens Hands; Therefore you do very ill to make the People fall down, and worship the Bread.

Chancellor. Thou deniest Christs presence in the Sacrament.

Spurdance. The Servant is not greater then his Master: Your predecessors killed my Master Christ, the Prophets, and Apostles; and now you kill the Servants of Christ; so that all the righteous Blood, which hath been shed, shall be required at your Hands. After this he was examined by the Bishop, and when he could not be removed from his steadfastness, he was condemned, and burnt in Bury.

His Martyrdom.

There were Three godly Men, viz. John Hillingdal, William Sparrow, and Richard Gibson brought before Bishop Bonner, and by him examined about the Sacrament of the Altar, and such like things, and they making a good confession before him, and adhering to the truth, were by him condemned, and delivered to the Secular power, by whom they were carried into Smithfield, and after their Prayers made unto God, they were there consumed in the fire.

John Hillingdal, William Sparrow, Richard Gibson, Martyrs.

About the same time were brought before Bonner, one John Rough a Minister, and Margaret Mearing. This Rough was born in Scotland, and at the age of Seventeen, entred into the Order of Black Friars at Sterling, where he remained Sixteen years, and then the Lord Hamilton, Earl of Arran, taking a liking to him, procured him to be dismissed thence to be his Chaplain; with him he remained one year, during which time it pleased God to open his Eyes, and to give him some knowledge of the truth; and thereupon the Earl of Arran, being governor of Scotland, sent him into Ayre to preach there: In that place he remained Four years, and then was appointed to abide in Saint Andrews, where he had a Pension of Twenty pounds per annum, from our King Henry the Eighth. But at last Master Rough, considering the danger wherein he lived, and from his Heart abhorring the Idolatry, and Superstition of his Country, and hearing of the freedom of the Gospel in England under King

John Rough and Margaret Mearing.

King Edward the Sixth, he resolved to tarry no longer in Scotland, and therefore presently after the Battel at Muscleborough, he went first to Carlile, and afterwards to the Duke of Summerset, Lord Protector of England, by whom he had a Pension of Twenty pounds per annum granted him out of the Kings Treasury, and was sent to preach at Carlile, Barwick, and Newcastle. At that time he married a Wife, and was Shortly after called by the Arch-Bishop of York to a Benefice neer Hull, where he continued till the death of King Edward.

Master Rough flies into Friseland.

His return into England.

He is chosen
Pastor of a private Church.

His apprehension.

In the beginning of Queen Maries Reign, seeing the alteration of Religion, and the Persecution that was like to ensue, fearing his own weakness, he took his Wife, and fled into Friseland, dwelling at Norden, where he labored hard for his living, knitting Caps, Stockings, &c! But when he lacked Yarn to employ himself about, he came over into England to make provision, and arrived at London, and hearing of the Congregation of Gods Faithful People, that met privately together, he joyned himself to them, and after a while was chosen their Pastor, and continued most faithfully to perform his Office amongst them, teaching and confirming them in the truth of the Gospel of Christ. But at length, he, with Cuthbert Simpson, and others, by the craft and treachery of a false Hypocrite, and dissembling Brother, were apprehended at an House in Ipsington, where the Church purposed to assemble themselves according to their custom for Prayer, and preaching the Word: Then were they carried before the Council, and after divers Examinations, they sent Master Rough to Newgate, and transmitted his Examinations to Bishop Bonner.

and constancy.

Bonner minding to make quick dispatch, within Three days sent for Master Rough out of Prison, and examined him upon the usual Articles, as about the Sacrament of the Altar, &c. Master Rough answering to them according to the truth, was shortly after brought forth to his condemnation; At which time Bonner with many fair persuasions labored to withdraw him from the truth, and to draw him to make a recantation: But Master Rough justified his marriage, and said, That his Children begotten in Wedlock were Legitimate; That he detested the Mass, and other service used by them, and that if he should live as long as Methuselah, he would never come to Church to partake with them therein: Hereupon the Bishop proceeded to his degradation and condemnation, and so delivered him over to the Secular Power, who carried him back to Newgate.

Bonnors fury.

Whilest he was before the Bishop he told him that he thanked God he had lived Thirty years, in which he had never bowed his Knee to Baal; And that he had been twice at Rome, and there had seen that which he had often heard before; Viz. That the Pope was Antichrist: That he had seen him carried about upon Mens shoulders, and the false named Sacrament before him, and that the People shewed more reverence to the Pope, then to that which they accounted their God. Bonner hearing this, rose up in a rage, and said; Hast thou been at Rome, and seen our Holy Father the Pope, and doest thou Blaspheme him on this sort? And with that he flew upon him, and plucked off a piece of his Beard.

Margaret
Mearing.

Their Martyr-

At the same time when Master Rough was burnt, there was also burnt with him one Margaret Mearing against whom the Bishop having no particular charge, examined her upon the usual Articles; To which she answered in particular, adding that she would stand to the truth which she had professed even to the death; For saith she, the very Angels in Heaven do laugh you to scorn, to see the abominations that you use in the Church; Then did the Bishop condemn her, and so both of them ended their lives joyfully together in the fire.

Not long before Master Roughs apprehension, he went into Smithfield, to see the burning of Austoo before mentioned; And as he returned back, a Friend met him, and asked him where he had been? where said he? even where I would not for one of mine Eyes but I had been; For I have been to learn the the way. Also, Margaret Mearing, after the apprehension of Master Rough, hearing that one Sergeant was suspected to have informed against him, she went to his House, and enquired whether one Judas did not dwell there? To whom they answered, that there dwelled none such there. No, said she, dwelleth not Judas here that betrayed Christ? His name is Sergeant, and so went her way. Shortly after seeing Cluny the Bishop of Londons Summoner going to her House, she followed him in, and asked him whom he sought for? Marry for you, said he, and so apprehended her, and carried her away.

Cuthbert Simpson, who was apprehended with Master Rough, was Deacon of the same Church, a faithful and zealous Man, laboring incessantly to preserve the Flock from the Errors of Popery, and to secure them from the danger of Persecution; yea, the pains, travel, zeal, patience, and fidelity of this Man was admirable: And it pleased God that a few nights before Master Rough, and he were apprehended, that Master Rough dreamed that Cuthbert was taken by Two of the Guard, and that he had about him the Book, wherein were contained the names of all that belonged to the Congregation, wherewith being much troubled, he awaked, and told his dream to his Wife, and afterwards falling asleep, he again had the same dream, and awaking said to his Wife, O Kate, I cannot be quiet; I must get up, and go to my Brother Cuthbert: But whilest he was making himself ready, Cuthbert came in, and brought that Book of names, and accounts of the Congregation with him. Then Master Rough told him his dreams, and charged him that he should no more carry that Book about him: Cuthbert answered, dreams are but fancies, and therefore I will not lay aside the Book. But Master Rough straitly charged him in the Name of the Lord to do it; whereupon Cuthbert left it with Master Roughs Wife, and within Two or three days after was carried to the Tower.

Having lain there a few days, the Constable of the Tower, and Recorder of London sent for him, and examined him of those which came to the English Service; To whom he answered; That he would declare nothing. Then they caused him to be cruelly racked upon an Iron rack, and asked him if he would yet tell them; But he still answered them as before; Then was he loosed, and carried to his lodging again. The Sabbath following they sent for him again, examining him as before; But he still refused to answer. Then the Lieutenant swore by God, that he should confess, and so caused his Two Fore-fingers to be tied together, and an Arrow betwixt them, and then drew forth the Arrow so violently, that the Blood followed; and when that prevailed not, they racked him twice; and he still remaining constant, they sent him to his Prison.

Afterwards the Lieutenant came to him again, and asked him, Whether he would yet confess? He answered, that he had said as much as he would. Then was he sent to Bonner, At whose Hands said he, I received the Popes curse, for bearing witness to the truth of Christ.

Bonner before all the people said thus of him. You see this Man what a personable Man he is; and for his patience, if he were not an Heretick, I should much commend it: For he hath been Thrice racked in one day, and in my House he hath indured some sorrow, and yet I never saw his patience once moved.

The night before this blessed Martyr Cuthbert Simpson was condemned by Bonner, he lying in the Stocks in the Bishops Coal-house, a little before midnight, heard as he thought, one coming and unlocking the First, Second, and Third doors, and though he neither saw Torch nor Candle, yet he saw a great light in the prison; and he that came in said to him, Ah, and so vanished; This brought exceeding joy and comfort to his soul, as himself related to sundry persons afterwards.

Gods judg-
Persecutor.

The next day he was brought before the Bishop in his Consistory, and charged with sundry Articles; To which he made a clear and full answer; whereupon he was condemned. There were also condemned with him at the same time, one Hugh Fox, and John Devenish, who also were apprehended with him at Islington; And so these blessed Servants of Jesus Christ were burned together in Smithfield, finishing their lives with much constancy and joy.

About the same time, there was one William Nichols apprehended by the Instruments of Satan at Haverford-west in Wales, who was also condemned, and burnt there.

Presently after William Seaman, Thomas Carman, and Thomas Hudson, were apprehended in Norfolk: The Persecutor of them was Sir John Tyrel, who charged his servants to search for Seaman; one of which, named Robert Baldwin, was neighbour to Seaman, and one in whom he put much confidence, yet did this treacherous person, together with his other fellow, to gratifie their Master, search Seamans House in the night-time; and finding him at home, they carried him presently away to their Master: As they went on the way, a strange light fell from the Element betwixt them, and parted them: After which Baldwin, though at that time in his best age, never after enjoyed good day, but pined away till he died.

When he came before Sir John Tyrel, he asked him, Why he did not go to Mass, and receive the Sacrament, and worship it? Seaman answered, Because it was no Sacrament, but an Idol, and therefore he would not worship it: Then did Tyrel send him away to Norwich to Bishop Hopton, who after Examination, condemned him.

Thomas Carman was apprehended, for that he pledged Richard Crasbfield, at the time of his burning: For this cause, being examined by the Bishop, and adhering constantly to the truth, he also was condemned.

Thomas Hudson was by occupation a Glover, and it pleased God to enlighten him with the truth, he applied himself to learn to read, and profited much in the knowledge of the Scriptures, and considering the danger that he was in, he absented himself from his House, travelling from one place to another, as occasion was offered. At last he returned home to visit and comfort his Wife and Children: But perceiving that his abode there would be dangerous, he devised with his Wife, to make him a place amongst his Fagots to hide himself in, in which place he remained all day long, reading, and praying continually for the space of about half a year: At last came the Vicar of the Town to the Woman, enquiring for her Husband, and threatening to burn her, if she would not betray him to them: When Hudson understood this, he waxed every day more valiant, and zealous than other, continually praying, reading, and singing of Psalms, to the wonder of many, the people openly resorting to him, to hear his exhortations, and vehement prayers. At last he walked openly about the Town, inveighing against the Mass, and other Popish trumpery; And afterwards returning home, he fell upon his Knees, and spent Three days, and nights in praying, reading, and singing of Psalms. But the Constables being provoked by one of his Popish neighbors, went one morning to apprehend him.

prehension.

When Hudson saw them come in, he said: Now mine hour is come: welcome Friends, welcome, you are they that will lead me to live with Christ, for which I thank God, and the Lord enable me thereunto, for his mercy sake in Christ Jesus: For it had been long his desire, and prayer, that if it were the Lords will, he might lay down his life for the Gospels sake. Then they took him, and carried him to the Vicar, who was a Commissary, who asked him if he did not believe in the Sacrament of the Altar? Hudson answered, That it was wormes meat, and that he did believe in Christ crucified. Do'st not, said the other, believe the Mass to put away sins? God forbid, said Hudson, for it is a patched Monster, and a disguised puppet.

puppet. This so enraged the Vicar, that he stamped, fumed, and called him villain, &c. Afterwards he asked Hudson whether he would recant: The Lord forbid, said Hudson, I had rather die many deaths than so do so. Then did he lend him to Norwich to the Bishop, and all the way as he went, he sung Psalms, and was very merry: He lay in prison about a moneth, spending all his time in reading, and invoking the name of God, and so at last was condemned.

These Three godly persons being carried out to Execution together, when they came to the Stake, made their humble prayers to Almighty God: after which, being chained to the Stake, Thomas Hudson suddenly slipped out from under the Chain, to the wonder of many, divers fearing lest he would have recanted. His Two Friends at the Stake cried out to comfort him all that they could, exhorting him in the Bowels of Christ to be of good cheer, &c. But Hudson felt more in his Heart, than they knew of: For (poor Soul) he was full of grief, and heaving of mind, not for fear of death, but for lack of feeling his Christ: And therefore being much troubled, he went aside, and fell down upon his Knees, praying most vehemently, and earnestly to the Lord, who at last, according to his wonted mercies, sent him comfort: And then he arose joyfully, as a Man new raised from death to life, and said, Now I thank God, I am strong, and pass not what Man can do unto me: And so returning to his fellows at the Stake, they all joyfully suffered together, yielding up their spirits with much constancy, and comfort to the Lord.

Commissary Berry, which had a great hand in the death of these, and divers other godly persons, was a very vicious Man in his life and conversation, was a great swearer, and a Whoremaster, persecuting the godly, and compelling Men to Idolatry: But though the Lord had Leaden Feet, yet he had Iron Hands, and at last found him out by a terrible judgment: For on a Sabbath-day this Berry having made a great Feast, after Dinner went into his Chamber, and there continued with his Whore till even-song, and then went to Church and admistred the Sacrament of Baptism. But as he came out of the Church, he fell down suddenly to the ground, with an heavy groan, and never stirred after, nor shewed so much as one sign of repentance. About the same time also Dannings the Chancellor, a merciless Tyrant, died suddenly, as the other had done before him.

About the same time Joane Seaman, Mother to the said William, being about Sixty six years old, was cruelly persecuted by Sir John Tyrel, so that she was forced to forsake her House, and many times to lie in Bushes, Groves, and Fields: Thus she continued for some time, till her Husband, being Eighty years old, fell sick, which she hearing of, returned home, not regarding her own safety so much as the faithful performance of her duty to her Husband, whom she carefully attended, till it pleased God to take him away by death: Then by Gods providence, she fell sick, and shortly after departed this life in her own House, whereby she was delivered from the rage of her merciless enemies; yet such was their malice, that they would not suffer her to be buried with Christian burial, but her Friends were fain to put her into an Hole by a Motes-side.

Also in the Town of wetherset, there was one Mother Barnet, a good Woman, who was persecuted out of the Town, for not going to Mass, &c. Yet at last she returned privately to her own House, and there sickned, and departed this life joyfully, and being denied Burial, was laid in a Grave by the Highway side. She was very merciful to the poor, and her Husband once merrily saying to her, that if she had been sparing, they might have been much richer; she answered, Alas good Husband, be content, let us be thankful, God hath given us enough: I cannot hoard up, and see the poor want, and thereby displease God: But Husband, let us be rich in good works, and so shall we please the Lord, and have all good things given us.

tion against good books.

Godly persons apprehended.

Roger Holland.

A Prophecie.

Their Martyr-
dom.

Immediately after there were Three other godly persons, William Har-rk, Richard Day, and Christian George a Woman, imprisoned, and condemned at Colchester: When they were brought to the Stake, they poured out their fervent prayers to God, and in the midst of the flames, triumphed over their enemies, praising God, and dying chearfully.

In the moneth of June, Anno Christi. 1558. came out a sharp Proclamation against good Books, either brought from beyond seas, or printed in this Realm, that whosoever should be found to have any of those Books, or having them, do not forthwith burn the same, without shewing, or reselling them to any other person, should be reputed, and taken for a rebel, and shall be presently executed for that offence, according to the order of Marshal Law.

Shortly after this Proclamation, Forty godly Men, and Women, were apprehended together in a back close, near Islington to pray, and read Gods holy word: And whilst they were together, there came a Man, and looking over the Hedge, saluted them, saying, That they looked like persons that meant no hurt, and so departed. Within a quarter of an hour after came the Constable of Islington, with Six, or Seven Armed Men in his company. These he left in a private place near at hand, and with only one in his company, he went amongst them, viewing them, and what Books they had, commanding them to deliver their Books to him: They understanding that he was the Constable, refused not to do it. Then came forth the other Armed Men, commanding them to stand, and not depart: They answered, That they would be obedient, and ready to go whether they would carry them. Then were they led to Sir Roger Chomley, the Recorder of London. By the way some of the Women escaped, and more might, if they had listed. The Recorder after examination, sent them to Newgate, and if they would have heard Mass, they might have been delivered; But they refused, and therefore at last were brought before Bonner; who after examination finding them constant, condemned them, and Thirteen of them were burnt in Smithfield. and Six at Brinsford.

Amongst these godly persons, there was one Roger Holland, who had much bickering with Bonner, who in conclusion said thus unto him: God hath heard the prayers of his servants, which have been poured forth with many tears for the afflicted Saints, whom you have daily persecuted, as you do us now: But this I dare be bold in God to speak (which by his Spirit I am moved to say) that God will shorten your cruelty, so that for a time you shall not molest his Church: And, dear Brethren, that you may perceive the truth of this, know that after this day, in this place, there shall not any by him be put to the trial of Fire, and Fagot: Which accordingly came to pass; For they were the last that were burnt in Smithfield for the testimony of the truth.

Bonner hearing this, said, I perceive, Roger, thou art as mad in thy Heresie, as ever thou wast; and now in thy anger thou wouldst become a railing Prophet: But though thou, and all thy companions, would see me hanged, yet I shall love to burn you, yea, and will burn every one of you, that come into my Hands; and so he departed.

Then Roger exhorted the people to repent, and to think well of them that suffered for the testimony of the Gospel, adding moreover, that God would shorten those cruel, and bloody days, for his elect sake.

Upon the day that they suffered, a Proclamation was made that none should speak to, or talk with them, or touch them upon pain of imprisonment without bail, with divers other cruel threatnings. Yet did the people cry out, desiring God to strengthen them. They also prayed for the people, that God would send them his word. Then Roger embracing the Stake, said, Lord, I humbly thank thee, that thou hast called me from the state of death, to the light of thy Heavenly word, and now also to the fellowship of thy Saints, that I may sing, and say, Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God of Hosts. Lord, into thy Hands I commend my Spirit. Lord, bless

blest these thy people, and save them from Idolatry. And so with his fellows praying and praising God, they sweetly ended their lives in the flames.

Amongst the Six that suffered at Braintree, was one William Pake, who whilst he was at liberty about Midsummer time, and at Noon day took his Bible, and going into his Garden, sat down abroad upon it. When suddenly there fell Four drops of fresh Blood upon his Book, he not knowing whence it came: Whereupon he called his Wife, and shewed them to her, saying, I well perceive, the Lord will have Blood: His will be done, and God grant the Grace to a holy trial, and so they went to prayer: And not long after he was apprehended, and burnt, as you have heard before.

Amongst these persons apprehended at Wilmington, was one Thomas Hincham, a young Man of about Twenty years old, whom Bonner, after sundry examinations, took him to Fulham, and there also he labored to pervert him from the truth; and not prevailing, he kept him in the Stocks, and sent Doctor Harpfield, his Arch-Deacon to him; who after much reasoning, fell into a great chafe, asking him if he thought that he went about to damn his Soul: Hincham answered, that he was persuaded, that they went about to uphold their dark and devillish Kingdom; and that they did it not out of any love to the truth. This so enraged Harpfield, that he went, and complained to the Bishop of him, who thereupon sent for Thomas Hincham into his Garden, and there in an Arbor caused him to put down his Breeches, and the Bishop having gotten Two Willow Rods, fell a whipping of him till he was out of breath, and till he had wasted one of the Rods upon him, and so returned him to Prison: But not long after, it pleased God that this Hincham fell sick of a Fever, and being more like to die than live, the Bishop by importunity, was prevailed with, to let him go home to his Master [Master Pugson in Pauls Church-yard,] where he remained sick for the space of a year, and in the mean time Queen Mary died, and thereby he escaped burning.

Amongst the aforelaid persons apprehended at Wilmington, there was also one John Willes, who was by Bonner first set in the Stocks in his Coalhouse, and then removed to Fulham, where he was kept in the Stocks also, and often examined: The Bishop having a Stick in his Hand, wherewith he often rapped him on the Head, and flirled him under the Chint, and on the Ears: And when this prevailed not, he had him into his Orchard, and there wasted a rod upon him to the stumps, and then called for another: After which he returned him to Prison. And many times examined him, and amongst other talk said to him: Ye call me Bloody Bonner, A vengeance on you all: I would fain be rid of you, but I think you have a delight in burning: But if I might have my will, I would sow up your mouths, and put you in sacks, and so drown you.

On a time Bonner came to the Stocks, where he lay, saying, How like you your lodging, and fare? Willes answered: well, if it would please God, that I might have a little straw to lye upon. Whilst they were talking together came in Willes his Wife great with Child, and near her count, intreating the Bishop for her Husband, and said, That she would not go out of his House, but there lay her Belly, except her Husband might go with her. Then said Bonner to Willes: How sayest thou, thou Heretick, if thy wife, and her Child should miscarry, and perish, dost not thou think that their Blood would be required at thy Hands? In brief, the Bishop could not be rid of the Woman, and therefore fearing lest she should cry out in his House, he was at last content upon easie terms to release him: Yet would he have a Kinsman of Willes to pass his word to bring him before him again the next day, or else, saith he, thou art an Heretick as well as he. The Man having no greater a charge than that, neglected to bring him: Yet shortly after Willes of his own accord went to him, and there subscribing a paper which had no great matter in it, was dismissed.

Master Richard Teomans, a godly Minister, who had been formerly Curate under Doctor Taylor at Hadley, and was by him left to supply his place place when he was removed from it. But after a while he was put out of that place.

He was a very holy old Man, of the age of Seventy, was well seen in the Scriptures, and being put out of Hadley, he went up and down from place to place, exhorting all Men to stand faithfully to Gods word, and earnestly to give themselves to prayer, and to prepare themselves for the patient bearing of the Cross; with boldness to confess the truth before their Adversaries, and with an undoubted hope to wait for the Crown of everlasting happiness: But at last, perceiving that his Adversaries lay in wait for him, he went into Kent, selling Points, Pins, and Laces, and such trifles to get something wherewith to maintain himself, his poor Wife, and Children. At last a Justice of Peace, one Master Moyle, took him, and laid him in the Stocks, but after a while, having no evident matter against him, released him.

Then returned he secretly to Hadley, and abode with his poor Wife, locked up in a Chamber for about a Twelvemonth together, spending much of his time in reading, and prayer, and the rest in carding Wool, which his Wife did spin, and by such like poor means they maintained themselves.

At length the Parson of the Parish perceived that this good old Man was thus kept private by his Wife: And therefore taking some Officers with him, in the night-time he brake open the doors, and searching the House, found Father Teomans in Bed with his poor Wife, and Children; whereupon in an anger he said, I thought I should find a Knave, and an whore together, and withal would have pulled off the Bed-clothes: But Father Teomans held fast, saying, Neither Knave nor Whore, but a married Man and his Wife, according to Gods ordinance, and blessed be God for lawful Matrimony. I thank God for this favor, and I despise the Pope, and all his Popery. Then had they him away to the Cage, and there set him in the Stocks.

His Zeal.

In the same place there was one John Dale, who had lain Two or Three days there: The occasion was this: He had been present at Church, when the Parson and his Curate were at their Ramish Service, and the poor Man being offended at it, in the fervency of his Spirit, said, O miserable, and blind guides, will you ever be Blind leaders of the Blind? will you never amend, and see the truth of Gods word? will neither the threats, nor promises of God work upon your Hearts? will the Blood of the Martyrs nothing mollifie your stony Spirits? O obdurate, hard-hearted, perverse, and crooked Generation! O damnable persons, whom nothing can do good upon! For this the Parson caused him to be laid in the Stocks.

Popish cruelty.

The next day the Parson called hard upon Sir Henry Doile to send them both to Prison. Sir Henry earnestly labored to perswade the Parson, they being so old, to let them go with that punishment: But the Parson was restless till he had gotten a Warrant, whereby he sent them both to Bury Goal. As they went, they were carried pinioned, and bound like Thieves: And when they came thither, because they continually reproved Popish practices, they were thrown into the lowest Dungeon.

Dale dies in Prison.

In that place John Dale, by reason of evil keeping, felt sick, and died, and his body was buried in the Fields. After this Father Teomans was removed to Norwich Prison, where he was still used very cruelly. At last he was examined of his Faith: And he boldly, and constantly confessed, that he was of that Faith, which was set forth by King Edward the Sixth of blessed memory; from which he would in no wise vary. And being commanded to submit himself to the Pope, he answered; I despise him, and all his detestable abominations: Yea, I will have nothing to do with him, nor with anything that appertains to him: For this he was degraded, condemned, and burnt at Norwich.

John Alcock.

There was living also in Hadley a young Man called John Alcock, by trade a Shearman, who after the Martyrdom of Doctor Taylor used in the Church of Hadley to read the Service in English till the coming of Parson Newhall thither:

After

After which, this Alcock being in the Church when the Parson was going by with the Proceſſion, Alcock neither moved his Hat, nor ſhewed any reverence to it: Which the Parſon taking notice of, ran to him, laid Hands on him, and called for the Conſtable, commanding him to have him to the Stocks: The Conſtable happened to be his Maſter, and told the Parſon that he ſhould not go to the Stocks, but ſhould be forth coming, and ſo the Parſon went on in his Proceſſion: The Conſtable told Alcock that he was ſorry for him, that if he behaved not himſelf wiſely the Parſon would effect his deſtruction. Alcock answered, Sir, I am ſorry that I am a trouble to you: But as for my ſelf I am not ſorry, but I commit my ſelf into the Hands of God; who, I truſt, will give me a mouth, and wiſdom to answer according to the truth. Yet, ſaith the Conſtable, take heed of him, for he is a Bloodſucker, and will uſe you the worſe for my ſake, againſt whom he hath an old grudge.

His Faith

I fear not, ſaith Alcock; He can do no more than God will give him leave, and happy ſhall I be, if God will call me to die for his truths ſake.

Then went they to the Parſon, who ſaid to him: Fellow, what ſayeſt thou to the Sacrament of the Altar? I ſay, quoth Alcock, as you uſe the matter, you make a ſhameful Idol of it, and you are falſe Idolatrous Priests, even all of you. I told you, quoth the Parſon, that he was a ſtout Heretick: And ſo the next day he carried him to London, where he was clapt up in Newgate, and after many examinations, and troubles, becauſe he would not ſubmit to ask forgiveness of the Pope, nor to be reconciled to the Romiſh Church, he was caſt into the lower Dungeon, where by reaſon of his cruel handling, and evel keeping, he contracted a ſickneſs whereof he died; Yet then did not their malice end towards him: For they would not ſuffer him to be buried with honeſt, and decent Burial: But put him into an hole in the Fields.

He died in Prison.

Maſter Thomas Benbridge, a Gentleman in the Dioceſs of Wincheſter, who might have lived a pleaſant and honorable life in this world, yet choſe rather, through the ſtrate gate of perſecution to enter into the Kingdom of Heaven: For which end he manfully ſtood for the defence of the Goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt againſt Popiſh ſuperſtitious: And therefore being apprehended, was carried before Doctor White, Biſhop of Wincheſter, who examined him upon ſundry Articles: As about Auricular confeſſion: The real preſence of Chriſt in the Sacrament, &c. To all which he made a ſtout answer according to the truth, and was condemned for the ſame. When he was brought by the Sheriff to the place of execution, he put off his Apparel, which was very rich, and be- took himſelf to fervent prayer unto God: When he was faſtened to the Stake, one Doctor Seaton willed him to recant, and he ſhould have his pardon: But he rejected it, like a faithful Souldier of Jeſus Chriſt. The Doctor turned to the people, and bad them not to pray for him any more than they would pray for a Dog. Maſter Benbridge ſtanding at the Stake, with his Hands liſt up to Heaven, the Doctor again urged him to recant: To whom he ſaid, Away Babylonian, away. Then was the Fire kindled which burnt off a piece of his Beard, yet was he nothing moved with it: Then the Fire took hold of his Legs, and his Stockings being of Leather, the pain was ſo grievous that he cried out, I recant: At which words, ſome of his Friends plucked away the Fire, and the Sheriff returned him to Priſon again: But it pleaſed God ſo to awaken his conſcience, that recanting his recantation, he was that day Sevensnight carried to the Fire again, and there burned.

His recovery, and Martyrdom

Shortly after Four godly Perſons, viz. John Cook, Robert Miles, Alexander Lane, and James Aſbley were examined before the Biſhop of Norwich: The chief matter alledged againſt them was, for not going to Church: And when they had given a good account of their Faith, they were condemned and burned together at Saint Edmundsbury not long before the ſickneſs of Queen Mary.

Gouge, and Alice Driver.

About the same time Alexander Gouge, and Alice Driver were hunted after by one Master Noone, a Justice in Suffolk, so that for their safety they were fain to hide themselves in an Haymow: But the Justice with his Men coming to it, and striking Pitchforks into the Mow, at last discovered them, and sent them to Melton Gaol, where after they had lain a time, they were removed to Bury, and there at the Assizes, they boldly confessed Christ crucified, defying the Pope with all his superstitious trash: And Alice Driver compared Queen Mary in her persecution to Jesabel, for which the Judge caused her Ears presently to be cut off, which she joyfully suffered, thinking her self happy that she was counted worthy to suffer any thing for the Name of Christ.

After this they were removed to Ipswich, and there examined before Doctor Spenser, Chancellor of Normich. The chief matter that they insisted upon was about Christs presence in the Sacrament, wherein Alice Driver did so baffle them, that they had nothing to say: Whereupon she thus concluded, God be praised, you are not able to resist the Spirit of God in me a poor Woman. I was an honest poor Mans Daughter, and never brought up in the University, as ye have been; yet in the defence of Gods truth, and in the cause of my Master Christ, by his grace, I will set my Foot against the Foot of any of you all in maintenance of the same, and if I had a Thousand lives, they should all go in payment thereof. Then did the Chancellor condemn her, and delivered her to the Secular Power. Gouge also sticking fast to the truth, was condemned, and so both of them ended their lives sweetly together in the Fire at Ipswich. When the Chain was fastened about Alice Drivers Neck, O said she, Here is a goodly Handkerchief, God be praised for it.

man.

As they stood at the Stake, some came to take them by the Hand; whereupon the Sheriff bad his Men to lay Hands on them; But thereupon there came such a multitude to them, that the Sheriff was fain to let them alone.

There was one Bate, a Barber, that was a very busie Man about burning of them; But presently after Gods judgment fell upon him, so that within Three or Four Weeks after he died in much miserie.

The same Moneth that Queen Mary died, there were burned at Bury Three godly Persons, whose Names were Philip Humphry, John David, and Henry David, his Brother.

There lived in Cornwal an honest poor Woman, whose Husband was much addicted to the Popish Superstitions practised in those days, and would force his Wife to joyn with him in the same, which was a great trouble to her Spirit; whereupon she prayed earnestly unto God for his mercy, and direction, and it pleased God that one night as she lay in her Bed, she received abundance of joy, and comfort in her Soul; insomuch as leaving Husband and Children, to enjoy the peace of her Conscience, she went about spinning for her Living, yet at last she returned to her Husband again. Where after a while she was accused by her Neighbors, apprehended and carried to Exceter to the Bishop.

Christ preferred before all.

A Prophecie.

The chief matter for which she was condemned was, for denying the real presence, and speaking against their Idolatry: The Bishop bad her remember her Husband and Children: She answered, I have them, and I have them not; whilst I was at liberty, I enjoyed them; But now standing here, as I do in the cause of Christ, and his truth, where I must either forsake Christ or my Husband, I am content to stick to Christ only, my heavenly Spouse, and to renounce the other. The Bishop after much other talk, gave her a Moneths liberty to bethink her self; In which time she, going into one of the Churches, saw a Dutchman making new Noses to many Images, which had been defaced in King Edwards time; To whom she said, what a mad Man art thou to make new Noses for those Images, which within a few days will lose their Heads? For this being complained of to the Bishop, she was clapt up close Prisoner, and had no more liberty. During her Imprisonment she was tried by great sufferings, threatnings, <sup>Great tortures,</sup> taunts and scoffs, called Anabaptist, a mad Woman, a Drunkard, a Whore, <sup>a one infected,</sup> a Runnagate: She was tried by liberty, to go whither she would; she was tried by flattery, and many fair promises; she was tried with Husband, goods, and Children; yet nothing would prevail: Her Heart was fixed; she had cast Anchor, and utterly contemned this wicked World, with all the baits and allurements of it: She was wholly without Learning, yet so versed in the Scriptures, <sup>Her knowledge in the Scriptures,</sup> that she could not only fitly and appositely quote them, but name the Book and Chapter also.

Her Adversaries seeing that by no means they could remove her from her constancy, at last condemned her, and delivered her to the Secular Power. Then did the Gentlemen of the Country exhort her yet to call for grace, and to forsake her fond opinions, and so to return to her Husband and Children: For, said they, Thou art an ignorant woman, and these things are to high for thee to meddle withal: I am, said she, indeed, and yet with my death I am content to be a witness of Christs death; and I pray you delay me no longer; my Heart is fixed, I will never say otherwise than I have, nor turn to their superstitious doings. Then said the Bishop, The Devil leadeth her; No, my Lord, quoth she, it is Gods Spirit that leadeth me. When she heard her sentence of death pronounced, she lifted up her voice, saying, I thank thee, my Lord, my God, This day, I have found that which I have long sought for. Then was she again promised Life if she would recant: Nay, that I will not, said she, God forbid, that for this natural and temporary life, I should lose Life eternal; I will never turn from my Heavenly Husband to my Earthly; from the fellowship of Angels to mortal Children: And if my Husband and Children be faithful, then am I theirs; God is my Father, God is my Mother, God is my Sister, my Brother, my Kinsman; God is my Friend, and that most faithful. Then was she led forth to execution, multitudes of people going with her. At the place where she was to suffer, the Popish Priests again set upon her; But she prayed them to speak no more to her, and then said, God, be merciful to me a sinner; God, be merciful to me a sinner. <sup>Her Martyrdom,</sup> In the flames she stood with admirable patience, and so finished her course with joy; she had such a cheerful and lively countenance, as though she had been prepared for the day of her Marriage, was very patient in her words and answers: She had always been sober in meat, drink, and apparel; she would never be idle, and was a great comfort to as many as talked with her, liberal to the poor, according to her ability, and in her trouble would take no money when it was proffered her; For, said she, I am going to a City, where money beareth no mastery; And whilst I am here, God hath promised to feed me. <sup>Her charity: Money contented.</sup>

In the City of Bristol, there was one Richard Sharp, a Weaver, who being <sup>Richard Sharp,</sup> apprehended for Religion, was carried before Doctor Daly the Chancellour; who after examination about the Sacrament of the Altar, so wrought upon him by perswasions, that he drew from him a promise to make a publike recantation, and the time and place were appointed for it: But after this promise, <sup>Humane infirmity.</sup> Sharp felt such an Hell in his Conscience, that he was not able to follow any business, but decayed in his Body, and wholly lost his colour: Whereupon on a Sabbath, going to his Parish Church, he went to the Quire-door, and with a loud voice said, Neighbours, bear me record, that yonder idol, pointing to the Altar, is the greatest and most abominable that ever was, and I am sorry that ever I denied my Lord God. Hereupon the Constable was commanded to apprehend him; but he let him alone, and Sharp went home to his House; yet afterwards was he apprehended in the night, and carried to prison, and continuing constant, was by <sup>Recovery,</sup> the Chancellor condemned, and burnt, which he patiently endured, sealing the truth with his Blood. <sup>His Martyrdom.</sup>

At the same time there was burned with him another Citizen of Bristol, <sup>Thomas Hale,</sup> called Thomas Hale, whom Two of the Aldermen fetched out of his House in the night, night; To whom he said, You have sought my Blood these Two years, and now much good do it you. He was condemned by Dalby for saying, that the Sacrament of the Altar was an Idol; and patiently yielded up his Spirit unto God in the flames.

Thomas Benson.

Also Thomas Benson of the same City, Weaver, was apprehended, and examined before Dalby, and by him was committed to prison, for saying, That the Sacrament was nothing but Bread, as they used it; and for denying Five of their Seven Sacraments: And shortly after he was condemned, and executed, dying in a godly, constant, and patient manner.

John Cornford, Christopher Brown, John Hurst, Alice Snot, and Katherine Knight, the last Martyrs in Queen Marys days.

The last that suffered Martyrdom in Queen Maries time, were Five godly Persons at Canterbury; Their Names were, John Cornford, Christopher Brown, John Hurst, Alice Snot, and Katherine Knight. The things for which they were persecuted and condemned were, for denying Christs real presence in the Sacrament of the Altar; and for saying, that wicked Men do not receive Christs Body; That it was Idolatry to creep to the Cross; That Saints should not be prayed to, &c. When sentence of condemnation was read against them, John Cornford being moved in Spirit with a vehement zeal for God, in the Name of himself and his fellows, said: In the Name of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of the most mighty God, and by the power of his Holy Spirit, and authority of his Holy Catholick and Apostolick Church; we do here give into the Hands of Satan to be destroyed, the Bodies of all those Blasphemers, and Hereticks, that do maintain any Error against his most holy word, or that do condemn his most holy Truth for Heresie, to the maintenance of any false Church or feigned Religion; so that by this thy most just judgment, O most mighty God, against thy Adversaries, thy true Religion may be known to thy great glory, and our comfort, and to the edification of all our Nation: Good Lord, So be it, Amen. And this Excommunication of his, took such effect against the enemies of the Truth, that within Six days after Queen Mary died, and the Tyranny of all English Papists with her: Yet the Arch-Deacon and his Associates condemned, and hastried the Execution of these godly persons, knowing that the Queen was sick past recovery. When they came to the place of their Execution, they made their prayers to Almighty God, and amongst all other things, desired God that their Blood might be the last that should be shed; wherein God answered their prayers, and they joyfully and comfortably in the fire resigned up their Spirits unto God.

CHAP. IX.

The Scourging of some in the Reign of Queen Mary.

Mongst those that were persecuted, and miserably imprisoned for the profession of Christ in the Reign of Queen Mary, there was one John Fetty, a godly Man, dwelling in the Parish of Clerkenwel, who was accused, and complained of to the Parson of the Parish by his own Wife, for that he went not to Church, nor would partake of their Idolatrous Services: Whereupon the Parson caused the Constables to apprehend him. But it pleased God that his unnatural Wife, immediately upon it, fell mad; and the Constables were so far moved with pity, that they let him go home to look to his Wife, and Children, who otherwise were like to perish: And this good Man (forgetting the unkind and wicked Act of his Wife) was very careful of her, and so cherished and provided for her, that through Gods mercy, she was well amended, and recovered her wits again, within the space of about Three weeks. Yet such was the power of Satan in this wicked and malicious Womans Heart, that so soon as she was recovered, not regarding her Husbands kindness, she again accused him; whereby he was apprehended, and cast into Lollards Tower; where he was put into the tormenting Stocks, with a Dish of water, and a stone in it set by him, to shew what favor he should receive at their Hands. There he lay for many days, sometimes hanging by one Leg and one Arm, sometimes by the other, and at other times by both.

At last one of his Children, of about Eight or Nine years old, came to the Bishops House, to see if he could get leave to speak with his Father; and one of the Bishops, Chaplains meeting with the Boy, asked him what he looked for? The Child answered, that he came to see his Father, that was in Lollards Tower; why, said the Priest, thy Father is an Heretick; the Boy, being of a bold and quick Spirit, and well educated by his Father, answered, My Father is no Heretick, but you are an Heretick, For you have Balaams mark on you. With that the Priest took him by the Hand, and led him into the Bishops House, where amongst them, they stripped the Child naked, and cruelly whipt him, till he was all over gore Blood. Then Cluny, the Bishops Sumner, putting on his shirt, and carrying his Coat on his Arm, led him to the Prison, with the Blood dropping at his Heels to his Father. At his coming in, the Boy fell on his Knees, and craved his Fathers blessing: The Father being full of grief to see his Child so cruelly dealt with, said, Alas William who hath done this to thee? The Boy answered, As I was coming to see you, a Priest with Balaams mark, took me into the Bishops House, where I have been thus used. Hereupon Cluny violently plucked him from his Father, and carried him back into the Bishops House, where they kept him Three days: And then Bonner minding to appease the poor Man for the usage of his Child, sent for him out of Lollards Tower to his Chamber. Whilst this Jo. Fetty was standing there with the Bishop, he spied a great pair of black Beads hanging by his Bed, and thereupon said to him, My Lord, I think the Hangman is not far off, for the Halter (pointing to the Beads) is here already. This much enraged the Bishop, yet Fetty spying also a Crucifix standing in the Window, said, My Lord, what is that? The Bishop answered, it was Christ. Was he handled, said Fetty, so cruelly, as is here pictured? Yea, said Bonner, that he was: And even so cruelly, said Fetty, do you handle such as come before you; For you are to Gods people, even as Caiaphas was to Christ. The Bishop was so enraged at this, that he swore he would burn him, or spend all that he had to his Gown: Yet afterward bethinking himself of the danger that the Child was in by reason of their cruel usage of him; he discharged him, bidding him go home, and carry his Child with him, which accordingly he did, with an heavy heart for his poor Boy, who within Fourteen days after died.

The Child
died.

Also when Doctor Crome was to make his Recantation; there came in one of the Guard to a Tradersmans shop in Bow-lane, where they asked him what news at Court! The old Heretick, said he, Doctor Crome hath recanted before the Council, and next Sunday will do the same at Pauls Cross: Hereupon Richard Wilmot, Apprentice in the same shop, of about the Age of Eighteen, said, I am sorry to hear that news; For if Crome shall say otherwise than he hath done formerly, it's contrary to the truth of Gods word, and contrary to his own conscience, which will accuse him before God for it. He also added further, That what Doctor Crome had taught was agreeable to the holy Scriptures, wherein God hath revealed his will. Well, said the other, it was never merry world since the Bible was translated into English, and he was a Traitor and Heretick that caused it to be done (meaning the Lord Cromwel) and therefore was rewarded according to his works. After other such like talk, came in the Master of the shop, and with him another young Man called Thomas Fairfax, The Master asked what was the matter? The Queens servant (whose name was Lewis,) answered, that he had a Knaveish Boy to his man, whom, if he were his, he would rather hang him than keep him. In brief, the business being again rehearsed, Thomas Fairfax spake to Lewis, confirming what the other had said: Whereupon Lewis went away in a rage to the Court. The next day these Two young Men were sent for to the Lord Mayor, and by him, with Chomley the Recorder, they were examined a part, and then sent apart to the Two Counters: Their Masters hearing of it, made great Friends to the Lord Mayor and Recorder for their release, but it could not be obtained without address to the Council, who judged them Hereticks and Traitors, and therefore worthy to die: Yet at last by much importunity their lives were spared, and they were ordered to be whipped Three Market days at a Carts tail through the City of London. Yet at last, great Friends being made to the privy Council, they remitted that, and ordered them to be whipped in the Companies Hall, before the Master and Wardens, which was accordingly done, their Bodies being stripped naked from the waist upward, and their Feet fastned to an Iron ring in the midst of the Hall; and then Two Men disguised in Vifors, coming with Two great Rods, whipt them so cruelly, that Wilmot could not lie in his Bed of Six nights after, and could never recover his health again.

Popish cruel-

There was also one Thomas Green, servant to a Printer; who gave to certain honest Men a Book called Antichrist; which his Master hearing of, examined him where he had it; He answered, of a Frenchman: Then said his Master, there is Heresie and treason in it, and so sending for Cluny, he bad him put him into Lollards Tower, which accordingly he did: But when he had lain there a while, he removed him to the Bishops Coalhouse; and there putting upon his right Leg and left Arm bolts and fetters, he set him cross-fettered in the Stocks. On the morrow he came to him, saying, Come, let me shift your Hand and Leg that you be not lamed, and so he remained Six days. Then was he sent for by Doctor Story, who examined him about the Book: He answered, that going to Newgate to visit some Christian Friends that lay there for the testimony of the truth, he met with a Frenchman, who came thither for the like purpose, and after some further acquaintance with him, he bought this Book of him. Then Story would have have had him to bring forth this Frenchman, but he answered, that he could not do it. Upon this he was returned to the Coalhouse, where he lay in the Stocks Ten days and nights more.

Then was he again sent for to Doctor Story, and whilst he was examining; Two other prisoners were brought to him; whereupon his Wife [Mrs. Story] was in a great rage, and swore a great Oath, saying, Its pity but an Hundred or Two of these Hereticks were put into a House together, and I my self would set fire to them. Then was Green again returned to the Coalhouse. After long imprisonment and frequent examinations, Doctor Story sent for him to Christs Hospital, and commanded him to be stripped, and then calling for Two Beadles, he caused them to give him almost an Hundred stripes; Adding moreover, that if he might have his will, he would cut out his Tongue; and then he dismissed him.

There was also one Steven Cotten, who was twice whipped by Bishop Bonner.

Steven Cotten twice whipt.
James Harris.

Also one James Harris of Billerica in Essex, being apprehended, and sent up to Bonner, was examined by him, when he had been at Church? To whom he answered, that he had not been at Church of above a Twelvemonth before, but once; And then, through fear, he received the Popish Sacrament, for which he was heartily sorry, detesting it with all his Soul. Then the Bishop would have had him shaven himself to a Priest, which because he refused to do, the Bishop took him into his Garden, and there whipped him most cruelly.

Cruelly whipt

Also one Robert Williams, a Smith, being apprehended and sent to Bonner, the Bishop after examination took him into his Garden, and there in an Arbor scourged him cruelly with Rods.

Robert Williams whipt.

There was in Collingborow, a poor starved Man, who because he would not receive the Sacrament at Easter, was apprehended, and sent to Salisbury, to Doctor Geffery the Chancellor, who cast this poor creature into a Dungeon, and afterwards caused him to be cruelly whipt by Two Beadles.

The Story of divers worthy Servants of Christ, who escaped burning by the death of Queen Mary and otherwi'e.

*Richard White,
Hunt.*

Richard White and John Hunt being apprehended, and examined by the Major of Marlborow, were sent to Salisbury, and kept a long time in Lollards Tower; and at last were brought before Bishop Capon, and other Commissioners, and there examined of their Faith, and they made a stout and zealous profession of the same, from which they could not be removed, neither by frowns nor flatteries; so that at length, at the Sessions they were condemned, and with other Malefactors were delivered over to Sir Anthony Hungerford, the high Sheriff, to be executed: But the evening after, Mr. Clifford, Son in Law to Sir Anthony, came to him, exhorting and intreating him earnestly in no case to have a Hand in the death of those Two innocent persons. Sir Anthony hearing him, went strait to Justice Brown to ask his advice, what he should do in the matter. Justice Brown told him, that if he had not a Writ from above for their execution, he could not answer it, but if he had he must then do his office. The Sheriff hearing this, took his Horse the next day, and went out of Town, leaving these Men in Prison. The Chancellor, Doctor Geffery, hearing of his departure, rode after him, and overtaking him, told him that he had delivered over into his Hands Two condemned Men, and wondred that he went away before he had executed them according to his Office; The Sheriff answered, that he was no Babe which was to be taught of him what belonged to his Office. If you have, said he, a Writ to discharge me for the burning of them; I know what I have to do: why, said the Chancellor, did not I give you a Writ under my Hand for it? Well, said the Sheriff, that is not a sufficient discharge for me: If I have not a writ from the Superior powers, I will not burn them for any of you all. Doctor Geffery hearing this, returned home, and presently fell sick upon it.

ment on a persecutor.*

Not long after came down a Writ from above to the Under-Sheriff, for their execution; But he being a godly Man, cast the Writ into the fire, saying, I will not be guilty of these mens Blood.

Providence.*

Within Four days after the Chancellor died: About which time Richard White and John Hunt being in a low and dark Dungeon, were going to Prayer, but on a sudden, knowing no reason for it, they burst both out into a great weeping, so that they could not speak a word; and the next morning they understood that just at the same time the Chancellor died. Presently after the Bishop died also: so that these Two holy Men continued in Prison till Queen Maries death, and by that means it pleased God to deliver them.

Mr. Living.

In the time of Queen Maries sickness, one Coxe a Promoter, taking the Constable, and some others with him, went to the House of Master William Living, a Minister in Shoe-lane, and there searching amongst his Books, found a Book of Astronomy made by Johannes de sacro Bosco, wherein were many Figures: Coxe taking this Book, and Master Living, and his Wife, carried them away away to Darbishires House, the Bishop of Londons Chancellor, and by the way, carrying the Book open, he said, I have found him at length; It's no marvel though the Queen be sick, when there are such Conjurers in corners; but now I trust he shall confute no more.

Darbishire examined him, and told him that he was a Schismatick, and a Traitor; To whom Mr. Living answered, I would be sorry that were true, but I know I am no Traitor; for I have always taught obedience according to the tenor of Gods word; and when tumults have been raised, I have suppressed them by Gods word. But, said the Chancellor, you deny the Church of Rome, and therefore Cluny take him away, and put him into the Colehouse.

Then did Cluny violently hale and draw him, and carrying him to his House, there robbed him of all his money, his Psalter and New Testament, &c. After which he carried him to the Colehouse, and there put both his Arms and Legs into the Stocks, saying, That except he gave him Forty shillings he would put a collar of Iron about his Neck allö. I am never able to pay so much; said Mr. Living, and so he was left in the Stocks; Popish cruel 17.

At evening a Kindwoman of his brought him his Supper; who seeing how miserably he was used, told Cluny that she would give him Ten groats to let him at liberty: Cluny took her money, and so let him out to eat his Supper, but presently after set him in the Stocks again. Within a few days he was removed into Lollards Tower, and there put into the Stocks.

His Wife also was sent to Lollards Tower; But the Queens sickness being mortal, upon the request of Friends, and giving sureties to be forth coming, they were released; by which means it pleased God, that they escaped death.

It was known that some of Mr. Living's Books were at the House of one John Lithals, in Southwark; whereupon a Constable, and some of the Queens Servants went to that House, breaking open his Doors and Chests, and seizing upon the Books; And afterwards, watching for Lithals coming home, they apprehended him, and carried him to Darbishires House, by whom he was examined, and after sent to Lollards Tower. By the way Cluny, and another dragged him into Pauls Church, and there would have had him hear Mass, which he refused: Then would they have had him worl ip the Rood, which he also refused: Whereupon they carried him forthwith to Lollards Tower, and hang- Popish cruel: 17.
ed him by the Hands and Feet in the Stocks, where he lay Three days, and Three nights, till he was so lame that he could neither stir nor move. Then Cluny coming to him; he profered him some gold, and mony which he had about him to release him out of the Stocks, which Cluny accepted of, and so let him out. After he had lien there about Three weeks, Bonner being sick at Fulham, many of his Neighbors came to the Chancellor; and made great sute for the release of Mr. Lithall, and the Queens disease still increasing upon her; they obtained their request, and he was released.

Edward Grew, Minister at a Town called Broke, was by the malice of his Adversaries enforced to fly from his habitation; and though very aged, yet to travel up and down for the keeping of a good Conscience. At last, notwithstanding his circumspection, he was apprehended; and carried to Colchester Castle, where he remained a Prisoner till the coming in of Queen Elizabeth of happy memory, by which means he was released. Edward Grew.

William Brown, Minister of little Stanham, in Suffolk, for preaching a bold Sermon against the Mass, was persecuted by one Robert Blomesfield, Constable, who fetching the under Sheriff for his assistance, in the night time they brake into the Ministers House, and apprehended him, and the next day he should have been carried to the Council; But it pleased God suddenly to strike the said Blomesfield with sickness; so that he could not go with him. Then did the under Sheriff send him Prisoner to Ipswich, and from thence he was removed to Bury Jail, and so at last he was sent to the Council, by whom he was committed to the Mr. Brown. A special Priviledge.

the Fleet, where he lay divers moneths; But it pleased God to put such answers into his Mouth when he was examined by the Council, that at last they dismissed him, and he returned to his former charge: But when he still refused to say or to be present at Mass, he was put out of his place, himself and Wife being constrained to fly and hide themselves from the fury of their Adversaries; till at last, not long before Queen Maries death, it pleased God to deliver this good Man, by taking him to himself.

Eliz. Young.

But a terrible Hand of God followed Blomefield, his Persecutor, both by sickness, and a consumption of his estate; so that being rich before, he became poor; Also his eldest Son, and his Wife, died of a pining disease. Then he sought to repair his estate by marrying a rich Widow, yet all would not do: His Body was full of botches and sores, and shortly after he died, being wasted both in Body and estate; so that he died much worse then nothing.

An excellent Speech.

Popish prophane.

There was one Elizabeth Young, who to preserve her Conscience from pollution, left the Land, and fled to Embsden; yet after a while, came back again, and brought with her divers good Books, which she dispersed abroad amongst Gods People; For which at last she was apprehended, and often examined before the Inquisitors of Heretical pravity: They asked her why she would not go to Mass? She answered, Because her Conscience would not suffer her, and she had rather that all the world should accuse her then her own Conscience. Then they called her Traitorly Whore, and Heretick, and such like vile names, threatening to Rack her, and burn her, and so returned her to Prison, charging her Keeper, that she should one day have Bread, and the other day Water; which when she heard, she said, If you take away my meat, I trust that God will take away my hunger.

Afterwards they examined her about the Sacrament; To which she answered, That when she received the Sacrament in Spirit and Faith, she received Christ: To which a Doctor answered Ah whore, in Spirit and Faith, whore; Hark thou ill-favored whore how I believe; And so he told her how he believed about Transubstantiation: To which she answered, And I Sir have told you how I believe: Whereupon he replied, Ah ill-favored whore; nothing but Spirit and Faith, whore? After divers other examinations, Two Women suing for her release, she was at last discharged and set free.

Eliz. Lawson.

There was dwelling in Bedfield, in the County of Suffolk, an aged Woman of Sixty years old, called Elizabeth Lawson, who being apprehended for an Heretick, because she would not go to Church to hear Mass, was cast into a Dungeon; where having lien a while, she was removed first to Norwich, and then to Bury Jail, and remaining constant in the truth, was at last condemned to be burnt. Then did the High Sheriff take her home with him to his House, and assayed by all means both fair and foul to pervert her; But when nothing would prevail, he returned her to Prison, and there she continued almost Three years: during which time her Son, and many others were burnt: Whereupon she would often say, Good Lord, what is the cause that I may not yet come to thee with others of thy Children? Well, Good Lord, thy blessed will be done, and not mine.

William Watts.

At last Queen Mary dying, she was delivered out of Prison, and not long after resigned her Soul to God.

This is very observable, that before her imprisonment she was much troubled with the falling sickness; But after she was cast into Prison, she never had fit more, but was in good health, and enjoyed much joy and comfort in her Soul.

There was dwelling in the Town of Seale in Kent, one William Watts, who being apprehended by his Popish enemies, was carried before the Bishops and Justices at Tunbridge, who labored very much to withdraw him from the truth; But when by no means they could prevail, they committed him Prisoner to the Constable, who carried him to an Alehouse, where the Constable drank so liberally berally, that at last he fell fast asleep. Watts his Wife seeing this, perswaded her Husband to go his ways, for as much as God hath made way for his escape: But William Watts would by no means be perswaded thereunto. Whilst they were reasoning the case together, a stranger over hearing them, said to him, Father, go thy ways in Gods Name, and tarry no longer; the Lord hath opened the way for thee. Upon this Watts went his way, and his Wife returned to her House at Seale: But whilst she was telling some Friends of her Husbonds great deliverance, he came in amongst them; which when his Wife saw, she was much troubled, and perswaded him by all means to hast away before search should be made after him: He answered, that he would first eat some meat, and pray with his Family, which accordingly he did, and then went and hid himself in an Holly-Bush hard by. But no sooner was he gon out of doors, but in came the Constable, and many more with him, searching all the House, breaking open Chests, and piercing the Featherbeds, so that he made much spoil in the House: But it pleased the Lord to hide his servant; and to deliver him from the danger. His Wife was carried to the Stocks, where she lay Two days before she was freed.

A special providence.

In London there was one Dabney a Painter, a godly Man, who being apprehended by an Apparitor was carried to Bonner: But when they came thither, they were bid to stand by a while, because the Bishop was busie in examining of others; and before he had finished with them, a messenger came in halt, desiring the Bishop to prepare himself speedily, for that the general Procession tarried for him: Then were all other businesses laid aside: The Bishop and his Family hastening away to accompany the Procession; by reason whereof, Dabney was left alone; He seeing this, went down into the Court, and there walked up and down in a melancholly posture; The Porter seeing him thus to walk alone, and thinking him to be some Citizen that came about business, asked him if he would go forth; Yes, said he, with a good will, if you will let me out; with that the Porter opened the Wicket, and let him depart. After this, much search was made for him, but the Lord preserved him from the danger.

Dabney.

Mr. Alexander Whinshurst, a godly Minister, being informed against to Bonner, he sent forth one of his Flies to apprehend him; who, after search, meeting with him, took him, and carried him towards the Bishops House; And as they went through Pauls Church, Mr. Whinshurst espied Dr. Chadsey walking there, who having been of his antient acquaintance in Oxford, he intreated him, that for old acquaintance sake, he would prevail so far, that he might be examined before Doctor Martin, rather than any other; The Doctor in scorn answered him with the words of Christ, when thou wast young thou girdest thy self, and wentest whither thou wouldest; but being aged other Men should guide thee, and lead thee whither thou wouldest not.

Mr. Alexander Whinshurst.

Popish proceedings.

Then was he carried to Story and Cooke, who labored by all means both fair and foul to pervert him from the truth; But he carried himself very resolutely before them, not shrinking at all from his former profession.

Hereupon they sent him to Clunies House in Pater Noster Row, by whom he was to be committed to Lollards Tower; But the Lord pleased so to order it, that when he came thither, Cluny and his Family were very busie, so that he was left alone in his Hall; only there was another Woman whose Husband was in trouble, about whom she staid to speak with Cluny: She seeing Mr. Whinshurst stand there, said to him, Alas good Sir, if you please you may escape the Hands of your cruel Enemies, for as much as they be all absent that should look to you, whereby God hath opened the way for your deliverance, and therefore lose not the opportunity if you be wise. At these words he looked about him, and went out of Doors, walking but a leisurely pace, so that he might have been easily taken again, if any had looked after him; But it was Gods will that he should thus escape the fury of his Adversaries.

There was one Bosoms Wife, who living at Richmond with her Mother, was much called upon to go to Church, and at length, through importunity, she assented thereto : But when she came to Church, she behaved her self in every thing contrary to that which others did ; when they kneeled, she stood ; when they turned forwards, she turned backward, &c. This her carriage was so publick, that the Church-Warden and Constable came and attached her in the Queens Name, commanding her and her Mother to meet them the next day at Kingston ; and accordingly the next morning they went thitherward, and meeting the Officers at the Ferry by the way, they saluted them by their Names : The Officers had no power to speak unto them, but went their ways ; But afterwards they stamp'd and stared, and were much vexed that they had thus let them go.

A special providence.

The Woman seeing that they regarded them not, went back again ; and the good Woman retired her self into London, by which means the Lord mercifully delivered her from their cruelty.

There was dwelling at Windonham in Norfolk, the Lady Anne Knevet, being near an Hundred years old, who all the time of Queen Mary kept her self from their Popish Church, neither suffered any of their Papistical trash to be administred in her House ; But had the English Service, daily performed, which was used in King Edwards days. For this she and her Family were many times threatned by Messengers that the Bishop would visit her ere long : To whom she still answered, That if his Lordship sent word before hand, his entertainment should be accordingly. But God by his merciful providence so overawed their Hearts, that she lived in safety all that troublesome time : Yea, though there were sometimes present at her Service great Enemies to the truth, and such as had much authority ; yet coming in, they would kneel down amongst the rest at Prayer, and had no power to trouble her for the same.

Charity.

This good Lady was much given to Hospitality, and entertained into her House many of the persecuted members of Jesus Christ ; and though they were never so poor, they were lookt upon by her as Friends to the Gospel, and not suffered to depart without meat, and money.

The Lady Vane.

Also the Lady Elizabeth Vane was a great harbinger and supporter of the afflicted Martyrs and Confessors of Christ, for which she was oftentimes in great danger, and yet God mercifully delivered her.

Mrs. Roberts.

There was in Suffex one Mistress Roberts, a godly and vertuous Gentlewoman, who all the time of Queen Maries Reign was earnestly addicted to the truth, and never went to their Popish Service, nor would pollute her Conscience with hearing their Idolatrous Mass : And not far from her, there dwelled Sir John Gilford, a Justice of Peace, who was as fervent on the contrary to promote Popery : He hearing of her, first sent his Wife to tempt her by fair words, and gentle perswasions to go to Church, and to obey the Queens Laws, as others did : But she constantly adhering to the truth, would by no means be perswaded to defile her Conscience with their Idolatrous Service.

Then did Sir John Gilford send his Officers and Servants to carry her by force to Church : But by the way as they carried her, she through anguish and grief of Spirit fell into a swoon, so that they were forced to carry her home again.

A special providence.

Afterwards Sir John went himself to her House, resolving whatever came of it to have her to Church : But behold the good providence of God ! Just as Sir John Gilford was going up the Stairs to her Chamber, he was taken with such violent and terrible pains of the Gout, that he could go no further, and so was fain himself to be carried home, protesting and swearing that he would never trouble this Gentlewoman any more ; and so through Gods mercy she escaped the danger.

There was also in Nottinghamshire, one Mistress Lacy, a very holy Woman, against whom, through the malice of her Adversaries, a Process was sent forth, and she was driven to such straits, that she was forced to hide her her Bible, and some other good Books in a Dunghill. She had one of her own Brothers, a Justice of Peace; But he being a Papist, shewed her little favor: Yet though kindred failed, God did not fail her; For before she was apprehended, it pleased God that Queen Mary died, and so she escaped the danger.

An unnatural Brother.

There was in Norfolk one Crosmans Wife, a good Woman, who being taken notice of for her not coming to Church, the Constable of the Hundred came to apprehend her: She had a young sucking Child that just at that time was crying very hard; But it pleased God that as the Constable came in with his Company, the Child gave over crying, and the Mother having notice of the danger, slipped with the Child in her Arms into a corner behind the Chimney, the Child continued quiet all the time that they were searching the House, and when they could not find her they departed; And so the poor Woman, through Gods merciful providence, escaped the danger.

A special providence.

There was at the Town of Stoke in Suffolk a great number of godly People, with whom, by reason of their number and unanimity, the Bishops were afraid to meddle; They kept constantly to their private meetings, and came not at all to the Popish Service: Yet at last an Order was sent to them that within Sixteen days after Easter, they should all receive the Popish Sacrament, or else stand to the peril that would follow. Hereupon these godly People meeting together, considered what to do, and resolved that none of them would receive it: Only there was one John Foxe that was very urgent with his Wife to obey the Order, and prevailed with the Priest to come and give it her upon the Seventeenth day after Easter: But the day before she went to the meeting, and with tears declared how violently her Husband had dealt with her; They bad her be of good chear, for that they would make their earnest Prayers unto the Lord, both for her, and her Husband, and accordingly they did so, and through Gods mercy, they found good success; For the very next day Jo. Foxe came of his own accord unto them, and confessed, and bewailed his rashness and inconsiderateness, promising, through Gods help, to be more strong in the Faith, to the great comfort both of them, and his Wife.

Power of Prayer.

About half a year after, the Bishop of Norwich sent his Apparitors amongst these good People, straitly charging them to go to Church the Sunday following, or else presently to appear before the Commissary to render an account of their absence: But they, having notice before hand of the Apparitors coming, kept themselves out of the way to avoid the Summons: And so not being at Church at the time appointed nor appearing before the Commissary, he first suspended them, and Three weeks after Excommunicated them: And when an Officer was appointed to apprehend some of them, they absented themselves out of the Town, and so escaped the danger all Queen Maries time.

No less wonderful was Gods mercy to the private Congregation of the faithful in London, whom he preserved all Queen Maries Reign, notwithstanding all the malice, and searchings of their Adversaries, and the strictness of the Laws against them. First when they were to have met in Blackfriars at Sir Thomas Cardens House, privy Watch was set for the apprehension of them; But through the Lords vigilant eye over them the mischief was prevented, and they escaped the danger.

Gods providence in preserving the Church in London.

Also when they were met about Aldgate, some Spies were set to discover them: But it pleased God that Thomas Sympson the Deacon, espying them, bad them presently disperse themselves, which if they had not done, they had there been all taken, the Constable coming presently after to search for them.

Another time about the great Conduit in Cheapside, as they passed through a little Alley into a Clothworkers Chamber, where they were to meet together, they were espied by some of their Adversaries, and the Sheriffs were presently sent for to apprehend them: But they being privily warned of the danger, pre-

lently departed, one of the Bishops Sumners looking on, but having no power, or else fearing to meddle with them.

At another time they publickly assembled together in a Ship at Billingsgate, that belonged to a godly Man of Ley; where, though the People took notice of them; yet, through Gods mercy, they were freed from danger. Yea twice or thrice they assembled together in another Ship between Ratcliff and Redriff, where they had Prayers, preaching, and the Sacrament administred, and though many took notice of it, yet none medled with them.

A special providence.

At another time being met together in an honest Coopers House in Pudding lane: Whilst they were there, the Bishops Officer came into the House, and having talked a while with the good Man of the House went away again, having no power to meddle with them.

Another eminent danger they escaped in Thamesstreet near the Water, where being met together in the night, they were discovered, and the House beset that none should escape: But there being an honest Marriner amongst them, he seeing no other way to avoid the danger, flipt out at a back Door, and swam to a Boat, and bringing it thither, took all these good People, and making Oars of his Shoes conveyed them away from the danger.

A special providence.

Sometimes some were sent to spy out their doings, and to take their Names; But when they came thither, God hath wrought so upon them, that themselves have been caught, and have asked them forgiveness for their wicked purposes against them.

We have heard before of the extream danger that they were in at the taking of Mr. Rough, their Minister, and Mr. Sympson their Deacon, if God by a dream had not warned Mr. Rough to charge Mr. Sympson to lay aside that Book wherein all their Names were contained.

This Congregation began presently after Queen Mary entred into her Reign, and were sometimes more, sometimes less: Sometimes Two Hundred in number, and towards the latter end of Queen Mary, they much increased: They had also divers Ministers, first Mr. Scamler, Then Mr. Foule, Then Mr. Rough, Then Mr. Bernher, and lastly Mr. Bentham, who in the beginning of Queen Elizabeths Reign, was made Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield. This Mr. Bentham escaped wonderfully when the last Seven Martyrs (mentioned before) were burned in Smithfield: The occasion and manner was this; When these Prisoners were brought forth of Newgate, a Proclamation was made in the King and Queens Name, straitly commanding that none should pray for them, nor speak to them, nor once say, God help them; notwithstanding which, this godly Company resolved to go to, and comfort the Prisoners, and accordingly as they were guarded with Bills and Glaves, they pressed towards them, and forcing their guard from them, they embraced and kissed them, carrying them in their Arms (whereas they might as easily have conveyed them away) to the place where they were to suffer. Then giving way to the Officers, these Martyrs were tied to the Stake, and the forementioned Proclamation was again published, notwithstanding which; Mr. Bentham inflamed with zeal, and Christian charity, when fire was set to them, turning to the People with a loud voice, said, we know that these are the People of God, and therefore we cannot chuse but wish well to them, and pray to God to strengthen them, and so turning to them he prayed to Almighty God to strengthen them; whereupon all the People with one consent said, Amen, which did so astonish the Officers, that they knew not whom to accuse, or whom to apprehend.

A special providence.

Not long before Queen Maries death, the City of Calice in France, which had been Two Hundred and eleven years in the possession of the English, was taken by the Bloody Duke of Guise, who put multitudes of persons of all ages, and sexes to the Sword. At which time there were many godly persons in that Town, and the Lord, whose wakeful eyes of providence do continually watch over his, so ordered, that few or none at all of those many that favored Christ and and his Gospel, in that terrible Massacre miscarried; And amongst others that escaped after a wonderful manner, there was one John Thorpe and his Wife, a godly couple, who lying sick at the same time, were cast out into the Fields, in a hopeles and helples condition; Also a young Infant that sucked upon the Mother, was taken in the Fields, and born away by the Soldiers; yet, behold the admirable providence of God! they were by strangers fetched to a place almost a mile off: and being recovered, the next day as they travelled towards England, they chanced into the same Inn where they found their young Child, and so came all over in safety.

In the second year of Queen Mary there was one Edward Bennet, dwelling at Queenhithe, who was desired to carry a New Testament to a godly Man that was Prisoner in Newgate: But as he went in, the Keeper discovered it, and thereupon carried him before Chomley the Recorder, who after examination committed him to the Compter in Woodstreet, where he continued Twenty five weeks. Then Dr. Story coming to examine other Prisoners; Bennet looking out at a Grate, desired him to be good to him, and to help him out of Prison; Tea, said Story, thou hast been with me before, and dost not believe in the Sacrament, and therefore I will help thee out; and so he took him, and delivered him to Cluny to be put into the Bishops Colehouse, and there he lay in the Stocks for a week.

Then Bonner sent for him, and examined him, and finding him constant in the truth, sent him back again, saying, that shortly he should go to Fulham and be whipt. Afterwards they sent Dr. Cranmers Recantation to him, hoping thereby to draw him to recant; But he answered, That his Faith was not founded upon any Mans Books, but upon his that had redeemed him. Two or Three days after he with Five more were sent for to come to the Bishops Chappel to Mass; At the end whereof those Five were returned to Prison, and afterwards burned: But Bennet being behind, and walking towards the Gate, the Porter opened it for company to go out, and so Bennet, going out amongst them, escaped.

Afterwards he being amongst those that were apprehended at Islington, Bennet with some Seven more was left behind; yet he went after the rest to the Bishops House, and knocked at the Gate to come in: The Porter said that he was none of the company; Yes, saith he, but I am, and knocked again; But the Porter not opening the door, one of the Congregation that stood by, said, Edward, thou hast done well; do not tempt God; go thy way; and so he taking this warning as sent of God, departed, and thereby escaped the danger.

There was in the Town of Shakerley in Lanchashire, one Jeffry Hurst, who by his Father was bound Apprentice to a Nailor; And when he came out of his time, having a great mind to get knowledg, he learned to read and write, and afterwards got him a Bible, and other good Books, whereby he attained to a good measure of knowledg in the Scriptures. Then he married the Sister of Mr. George Marsh, of whose Martyrdom we have heard before; by whose society he much bettered his knowledg, and was careful to walk answerable thereunto. But in the first year of Queen Mary, he abstaining from their Idolatrous Services, was taken notice of, and often reproached for a Lollard and Heretick; And at last they lay in wait to apprehend him, which he having notice of, was compelled to leave Wife, Child and all, and to fly into Yorkshire: Yet divers times he returned by night to visit and comfort his Wife, and usually brought with him some good Minister or other; At which time about Twenty honest Persons used to repair to his House, and so they spent the night in Prayer, Preaching, and sometimes Administring the Sacrament of the Lords Supper, and so away before the day brake, lest they should be discovered.

Not far from his House there dwelled one Justice Leland, who having notice on a time of J. Hurst coming home, took a Priest and some others with him

him, to search his House for him; But it pleased God that J. Hurst had notice of their coming, and so hid all his Books in a great Tub, and then crept himself under it, and they covered him with Straw; only in his Chamber window he willingly left a part of the Bible, and Tindals New Testament in English, and another Book or two. When the Justice and his Company came into the House, they made a diligent search for Him, and his Books, breaking open Chests and Boxes, &c. At last they found these Books in his Chamber window; Then the Justice asked the Priest what Books they were? He told him that one was Tindals Testament, which was plain Heresie, and none worse than it; and for the other Books they were not fit to be looked on, for they might do much harm. Then the Justice asked his Mother (an aged Woman of about Sixty) and one of his Brothers, where Jeffry was? They answered, they could not tell. Then he swore by Gods Body he would have him, and if his Mother would not tell where he was, he would lay her in Lancaster Dungeon. But to be brief, he bound the Mother, and Brother in an Hundred pound Bond to bring in Jeffry within Fourteen days, and so departed. When the time came, Jeffry and his Sister went to the Justice, who caused a Mass to be sung, and bad Jeffry first to go and see his Maker, and then he would talk further with him: Jeffry answered, Sir, my Maker is in Heaven, and sure I am that by going to your Mass I shall get no edification; and therefore pray you have me excused. The Justice replied, By God, I see that I shall find you an Heretick, but I will not lose the Mass for all your prating; and so he went into the Chappel: When Mass was ended he sent for them, and caused his Priest to read a long scroll unto them about the Seven Sacraments. After which the Justice threatened them, yet at length he suffered them to depart, putting in sureties to appear again at Three weeks end, and then to go to Lancaster Jail. But it pleased God that Four days before the time appointed, news came down of the Queens death, whereby they escaped.

Gods Judgment on a Persecutor.

Not long after this Justice Leland sitting in his Chair, and talking with his Friends, fell down suddenly, and died, never so much as once stirring after.

There was living in Kent on Tho. Wood, a Baker, who being convented before Dr. Kenall, Chancellor, Dr. Chadsey, and some others: At his appearing they asked him why he came not to Church, and whether he had received the blessed Sacrament of the Altar? He answered, That he had not, neither durst receive it as they administered it.

Kenall. Thou Heretick, what's the reason thou darest not receive it?

Wood. There are Three causes why I dare not do it. 1. Because ye eat and drink up all alone; whereas Christ saith, Eat ye, drink ye all of this, &c. 2. Because ye hold it up to be worshipped contrary to Gods command, Thou shalt not bow down nor worship. 3. Because ye administer it in a strange Tongue, contrary to St. Pauls rule.

Kenall. Thou Heretick, are not these words plain enough, This is my Body? wilt thou deny the Scripture?

Wood. I will not deny the Scripture, God forbid: Christ saith, I am the Vine: I am a Door: The Rock is Christ; all which are figurative Speeches, wherein one thing is spoken, and another thing is understood.

Kenall. These Hereticks will not learn: Art thou wiser than the Queen and her Council, and then all Learned Men of the Realm?

Wood. St. Paul saith, The wisdom of the wise of this world is foolishness before God: And, If a man will be wise, he must become a Fool that he may be wise.

Kenall. Dost thou not believe that after the Priest hath spoken these words, This is my Body, that there remains no more Bread and wine, but the very Flesh and Blood of Christ, as he was born of the Virgin, and did hang upon the Cross?

Wood.

Wood. I pray you, Master Chancellor, give me leave to ask you another Question: when God commanded Ezekiel to shave off his Hair, and to burn a third part in the fire, And this, saith he, is Jerusalem: I pray you, was it Hair that was burnt, or Jerusalem?

Kenall. It did signifie Jerusalem.

Wood. Even so those words of Christ, This is my Body, are to be understood, &c.

Chadley. I will prove that Christ is here present under the form of Bread and Wine, but not in quantity, and quality.

Kenall. Yes, he is here present in quantity, and quality.

Chadley. He is here present under a form, but not in quantity, and quality. Yes, said the one; No, said the other. Whereupon the contention grew so hot between the Doctors, that they foamed again; and Dr. Kenall in a great rage rose up, and departed the Church.

Then said Wood, Behold good People, they would have us to believe that which they do not believe themselves, nor can agree upon. This caused all the People to give a great shout; And thus as God delivered Paul by dividing his Judges, the Pharisees and Sadduces between themselves: So he delivered this his Servant by dividing these Doctors between themselves.

Mr. Thomas Horton, a godly Minister in the Reign of Queen Mary, flying amongst many others beyond-sea, made it a great part of his work to travel between Germany and England, to procure means for the relief of the poor Exiles which lived in banishment for the truths sake: And on a time as he passed between Mastrick and Cullen, he fell into the hands of some Rovers, who led him away with them, but being in great danger, the Lord was pleased wondrously to deliver him out of the hands of these Bloody Villains, whose Name be praised for the same.

There was one Thomas Sprat, sometimes a Servant to Mr. Brent, a Justice in Kent, who because his Master was a cruel Persecutor of the truth, left his service, and went to Calice, from whence he often used to come into England, together with one William Porrege, about their necessary affairs; And about the Fourth year of the Reign of Queen Mary, it fell out that they landing at Dover, were travelling on foot towards Sandwich; and as they were upon the way, they met with Mr. Brent, and the Two Blachendens, with their Servants, being Ten or Twelve Horsmen, and Tho. Sprat espying Mr. Brent, was much dismayed, saying to his Friend, Yonder is Mr. Brent, the Lord deliver us out of his Hands, but seeing there is no remedy, let us go forwards; and so shadowing his Face with his Cloak, they went on: Mr. Brent heeded them not, but one of his Servants looking better upon them, said to his Master, Yonder goes Tho. Sprat, at which words they all stopped their Horses, and called to Tho. Sprat to come to them. They call you, said W. Porrege, and therefore there is no remedy but we must be taken; and thereupon perswaded him to go to them, for that there was no means of escaping, themselves being on foot upon those plain downs, and the other on Horseback; yet Sprat would not go: Whereupon they called him again, and Mr. Brent said, Ah srrah, why come you not when you are called? his companion likewise still moved him to go, seeing there was no way for him to fly away: No, said Sprat, I will not go to them, and withal ran away. They seeing that, set Spurs to their Horses, and rode after him; But before they overtook him, he gat to an Hedg, and made shift to scramble through it, yet they were so near him, that they struck at him with their Swords: Then they rode to the end of the Hedg, and so pursued him; But before they came to him, he was gotten to a steep Hill, which they could not ride down; and so getting to a Wood, he escaped notwithstanding all their diligence. Then did Two of them question with Will. Porrege, asking him whence he came, and how he came into Sprats company? He answered that they came from Calice, and happened into the same Passage-Boat, and that they were

were going to Sandwich; and so without any more ado they let him depart; wherein Gods goodness did also-marvellously appear, for that one of the Blanchendens knew this Perrege, but as God would have it, he was following the chase of Sprat, till the other had dismissed him: And thus the Lord wonderfully delivered these his servants from this danger.

An unnatural Mother.

John Cornet
whipt.

There was also one John Cornet, Apprentice to a Minstrel at Colchester, who being sent to a Wedding in a Town called Roughedg, at the request of some, sang a Song against the Maie, and misproceedings of the Queen, for which he was accused by a Priest, and first imprisoned by the Constable, and afterwards sent to the Earl of Oford, who caused him to be put into Irons and Chains, and to be so manacled that the Blood sprang out at his fingers end. In this case his Master forsook him; and his Mother, instead of relieving, felt a curling of him: Yet it pleased God so to order it, that the Earl, instead of sending him to Bishop Bonner, as his manner was, who would certainly have burned him, commanded him to be sent back to Roughedg, and there to be whipped till Blood followed, and so to be banished the Town for ever, which was done accordingly, and thereby he escaped further danger.

A special providence.

There was also one Thomas Brice, who being in the House of John Seale in the Town of Horting, the Bailiff with some others came into the House to search for him, and though they knew his stature, and what apparel he wore, yet the Lord so blinded them, that when he stood before them, and they asked for him, yet they knew him not, and he before their Faces quietly took up his Bag of Books and departed, and they had no power to lay Hands on him: And at another time, he, with one Springfield, being in an House in Gravesend, a Promoter dogged them thither, and had so beset the House, and all the way to the Water side, that it had been impossible for them to escape, but that the Lord stirred up an Ostler in the same House to convey them by a back and private way to the Water side, a mile off the Town by which means, through Gods gracious protection, they were delivered.

C H A P. XI.

The great Troubles, and wonderful Deliverance of the Lady Katherine, Dutches Dowager of Suffolk; who was the only Daughter, and Heir to the Lord William, Baron of Willoughby and Eresby, and the last Wife of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk.

IN the first year of Queen Maries Reign, Steven Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, knowing this good Dutches to be no good Friend of his, intended first to work his revenge upon her Husband, Richard Bertie, Esquire, for whom he sent an Attachment by the Sheriff of Lincolnsbire, whom he straitly charged immediately to Attach the said Richard, and without taking bail, to bring him up to London. Mr. Bertie having a clear conscience, and not knowing wherein he had offended the Queen, could not conjecture what should be the cause of this strange Process, except it were some quarrel for Religion. Yet the Sheriff, out of respect to him, notwithstanding the strait charge, adventured to take Bond of him for his appearing before the Bishop on Good Friday following. And accordingly Mr. Bertie, at the time appointed made his appearance at Winchester House in Southmark, which the Bishop being informed of, came forth in a great rage to him, asking him how he durst so arrogantly set light by Two former Processes of the Queens? Mr. Bertie answered, That he now perceived, that whereas he thought it before great extremity to be attached at the first, having shewed no contumacy, yet now he gathered by his Lordships words, that he had formerly sent some ordinary Processes for him, which yet never came to his Hands.

Winchester. Yea marry, I have sent Two Sub pœna's, and that by no worse a Man than by Master Soliciter, which I know came to your Hands, and therefore I will make you an example to all others for your obstinacy.

Bertie. I never received any, and therefore I humbly desire your Lordship to suspend your displeasure, and the punishment, till you know the truth, and then if I have deserved it, I refuse not double punishment.

Winchester. well, I have set this day apart for devotion, according to the holiness of it, and therefore I enjoin you in a Thousand pound Bond, not to depart without leave, and to appear again to morrow by Seven a Clock.

Accordingly Mr. Bertie appeared at the time appointed; whereupon the Bishop said to him, It's the Queens pleasure that you shall presently pay Four thousand pound due to her Father, from D. Charles, late Husband to your Dutches, whose Executrix she was.

Bertie. If it please your Lordship, that debt is stalled, and according thereto truly answered.

Winchester. Tush, the Queen will not be put off with stallments in the time of Ketts Government (so in scorn he called the Government of King Edward.)

Berty. The estallment was appointed by King Henry the Eighth, and by special Commissioners confirmed by King Edward, which the Lord Treasurer, being another Executor, undertook to discharge.

Winchester. If that be true, I will shew you favor; But Mr. Berty, I must admonish you of another thing, because I mean you well; I hear ill of your Religion; and pray you, is your Lady now as forward to set up Mass, as she was lately to pull it down, when she caused a Dog in a Rochet to be carried with her, which she called by my Name? Or doth she now think her Lambs as safe as she did when she saw me vail my Bonnet to her out of my Window in the Tower; At which time she said, That it was merry with the Lambs, when the Wolf was shut up. And at another time when my Lord her Husband invited me amongst other Lords to Dinner, desiring every Lady to chuse him whom she liked best, and so place themselves together; your Lady taking me by the Hand, said, That seeing she might not sit by her Husband whom she liked best, she had chosen ~~me~~ whom she loved worst.

Berty. My Lord, of the device of the Dog, she was neither the Author, nor allower; For her words she can answer her self; and for the Mass, she hath from learned Men been taught to abhor it; and therefore if she should outwardly allow it, she should be a false Christian to Christ, and a masking subject to her Prince. You knew my Lord, One judgment reformed, is better than a Thousand transformed Temporizers.

Winchester. Yea marry, deliberation is good, if she were to come from an old Religion to a new; But she is to return from a new one to an old one; when I was her ghostly Father, she was as earnest a Papist as any.

Berty. To this, my Lord, she told a Friend lately, that Religion went not by age, but by truth, and therefore she was to be turned by argument, not by compulsion.

Winchester. Pray you, do you think it possible to perswade her?

Berty. I trust you shall find no fruits of infidelity in her.

Then did the Bishop perswade Mr. Berty to take pains in her conversion, promising him large favors thereupon, and so dismissed him.

When Mr. Berty was returned home, he and his Dutches had frequent informations from their Friends, that the Bishop intended to call her to an account for her Faith, and therefore they devised how by the Queens Licence, they might go beyond Sea, for which they had good occasion, there being great Sums of money due to D. Charles from the Emperor, and divers others. And therefore in pursuance thereof, Mr. Berty made such Friends to the Queen, that he obtained her Licence to pass and repass at his pleasure. And accordingly in the first year of Queen Maries Reign, he went beyond Sea, leaving his Dutches behind him, who yet by agreement betwixt them, followed ere long, the manner whereof followeth.

She dwelt at this time in her House called the Barbican, and when she was to go, she acquainted none of her Servants with it, but one old Gentleman, neidid she take any but the meanest of her Servants with her, fearing lest the best would not run so dangerous an adventure. She took also her young Daughter, being but a year old.

For the first.

As she departed from her House between Four and Five a clock in the morning, an Herauld that lay in her House, hearing some noise, rose up, and with a Torch in his Hand came down, so that she fearing to be discovered, was forced to leave most of her Childs necessities behind her, and commanded her Servants to hast away to the Lion Key, taking with her self only Two Women, and her Child. She was no sooner out of her Doors, but the Herauld followed; whereupon she stepped into the Charterhouse gate, that he could not see her; yet the Herauld finding the bundle of her Childs clothes, fell to ransacking of them, and she in the mean time hastened away, knowing the place only by Name where she should take Boat. Her Servants also having divided themselves, none but one one of them knew the way thither. Thus she, attired in a mean habit, and they that were with her, took their way into Finsbury Fields; where, by the especial providence of God, near Moorgate, she and all her company met together; and so they went directly to Lion Key. There a Barge was ready for her, but the morning was so extreame misty, that the Steersman feared to adventure out, but that they urged him thereunto.

Not long after, the Council was informed of her departure, whereupon some of them came presently to her House to search out the manner of her escape, and to Inventory her goods; And withal they appointed Searchers to apprehend and stay her: So that the fame of her departure was at Leigh, a Town at the Lands end, before she gat thither.

When she arrived there, the old Gentleman before spoken of, had her privately to a Merchants House, near Leigh, naming her Mistris White, where she stayed till she had made some new provision for her Child in the room of that left behind her at the Barbican.

When the time came that she was to take Ship, she was again almost discovered; But through Gods merciful providence, escaped that danger also; And being twice carried into the Seas, almost within the sight of Zealand, by contrary Winds, was both times driven back to the place whence she came; And at her last return, the Searchers suspecting that she might be in that Ship, examined her Servant that came to provide some fresh victuals, who framed his tale in such a simple manner of a mean Merchants Wife that was a Shipboard, that they ceased to search any further; And so at last, through Gods merciful providence, she arrived safely in Brabant, where she met with her Husband, who apparelled her and her Women, like the Netherlandish Froes, and so they travelled together towards Cleveland; and coming to Santon, they took a House therein to shroud themselves, till they had resolved whither to retire for their further safety.

About Five miles from this place, was wesell, an Hanf-Town in the Duke of Cleves Dominion, to which place many walloons were fled for Religion, and had for their Minister, one Francis de Rivers, who having formerly been in England, had received some courtesies from this good Dutches: Him therefore did Mr. Berty make use of to obtain leave of the Magistrates for their private living there: But ere this could be effected, there was a muttering in Santon, that they were greater Personages then they gave themselves out to be; so that the Bishop and Magistrates resolved together, suddenly to apprehend and examine them, both of their condition and Religion; But Gods wakeful eye of providence stirred-up a Gentleman of Santon to give Mr. Berty secret notice of this their purpose; whereupon taking only his Wife, Child, and Two Women, he walked out about Three a clock in the afternoon in the moneth of February, as it were but to take the air, purposing that night to get to wesell; and the better to conceal his intention, they went on foot, and left the rest of their Family at Santon.

They had not gone above an English mile, before there fell a mighty rain, which dissolved the Frost and Ice, and so made the ways deep and slippery, which proved extreame tedious to these new lacquies, never before accustomed to such walks; And so their march being but slow, they were overtaken by the night, which caused them to send their Women to some villages which they passed by, to hire them a Cart to ride in for the ease of their wearied limbs, but none could be gotten, so that in the mean time Mr. Berty was forced to carry the Child, and the Dutches his Cloak and Rapier.

At last near Seven a clock in the dark night they came to wesell, seeking, after such a tedious journey, to repose and refresh their wearied limbs in an Inn. But going from Inn to Inn, through the whole Town, they all refused to intertain them, though they profered large money for the same: The Inholders suspecting Mr. Berty to be a Lanceknight, and the Dutches to be his Trull. In the mean time the poor Babe cried bitterly : The Dutches wept as fast ; The weather was extreame cold, and the Heavens rained as fast as the Clouds could pour.

Mr. Berty destitute of all worldly succor and relief for him and his, in this their deplorable condition, resolved to have his Dutches, with her Infant, into the Porch of the great Church, and so to buy some Coles, Food and Straw for their repose that night, or at least till he could procure some better lodging.

Mr. Berty at this time could speak little Dutch, and could meet with none that could speak either English, French, Italian or Latin, till at length, passing towards the Church Porch, he heard Two Boys talking in Latin together ; whereupon, stepping to them, he promised them Two Stivers to bring him to a walloons House ; and so, through Gods goodness, he at last happened upon the House where Monsieur de Rivers supped that night, who had procured the protection of the Magistrates for them.

At the first knocking, the good Man of the House came to the Door, asking Mr. Berty what he was : He told him that he was an English Gentleman, that desired to be brought to Monsieur de Rivers his House : The Man wished him to stay a while, and so going back to his guests, told Monsieur de Rivers that he thought that the English Gentleman, whom a little before he was speaking of, had sent his Man to speak with him : Monsieur de Rivers going to the Door, and seeing Mr. Berty, his Dutches and Infant in that lamentable case with Rain, Mire and Dirt, and in Apparel so unlike to that which he had formerly seen them in England, was so overwhelmed with sorrow and tears, that for a good while he could neither speak to them, nor they to him ; yet at last they saluted each other, and he brought them into the House, into which they entred, God knows, full joyfully. Mr. Berty changing his Apparel which the good Man of the House, the Dutches with his Wife, and their Infant with the Child of the House.

A few days after Monsieur de Rivers helped them to hire a fair House in the Town, where discovering themselves more freely, they lived in such a good fashion as their present condition would afford. The discourtesie which the Inn-Keepers had shewed them at their first coming to Town was presently spoken of all abroad, insomuch as a godly Minister, the Sabbath following openly reproved their incivility towards strangers, shewing, that not only Princes sometimes are entertained in the habit of private Persons, but Angels also in the shape of Men, &c. Whilst they thus passed the time in some content after their tedious travels, hoping that they had found a resting place, they had private notice given them from Sr. John Mason, Queen Maries Embassador in the Netherlands, that a design was laid for their apprehension, and carrying back into England, by the Lord Paget ; And the Plot was this, The Duke of Brunswick being to pass by that City with Ten Companies of Soldiers to assist the House of Austria against the King of France, was suddenly to apprehend and carry them away from wezell. Mr. Berty being informed of this, was fain presently to take his Dutches and Child, and to fly into the Palatinate, where he found protection in Wincheim, till the means which he brought with him out of England was almost spent, and they began to faint under their heavy burthens, being almost out of heart and hope in this their distressed condition. At which time it pleased God wonderfully to provide for them by a way and means that they never dreamed of.

In the first part of my Marrow of Ecclesiastical History, you may in the Life of John a Lasco, read, that he being driven out of England in the beginning of Queen Maries Reign, after many troubles and adventures, returned into Poland, his native Country, where he found great favor with the King ; And understanding standing the condition of Mr. Bertie and his Dutches, whom he had known in England, he made report thereof to the King of Poland, and the Palatine of Vilna, who presently wrote to them to come into Poland, offering them great kindness if they would accept of their invitation. Yet considering that hereby they should remove further from their native soil, and from all their acquaintance, into a far Country; and at their arrival there, it might be, they should not find their intertainment answerable to their toil and hazard in their journey, they knew not well what to do: Whereupon they advised with Mr. Barlow, sometimes Bishop of Chichester, who was then in the Palatinate, desiring him to go before them to Poland, and by him they sent Letters to the King, and Palatine of Vilna, returning them many thanks for their kind proffers; By him they also presented them with some Jewels, which were all the remainder of those which they had brought out of England; desiring the King, under his Broad Seal, to assure them of that which by his Letters he had so honorably proffered to them.

Mr. Barlow arriving safely with his Letters, by the assistance of the Palatine of Vilna, easily procured what they desired. Whereupon the Dutches, with her Husband and Family began their journey towards Poland, in April Anno Christi 1557.

By the way they met with many dangers: One was occasioned by a Captain of the Lantgraves, who for a Spaniel of Mr. Berties, quarrelled with them, and with his Horsemen set upon them by the way, thrusting their Bore-spears through the Wagon, wherein the Women and Children were, yet through Gods mercy, none of them were hurt. Mr. Bertie had only Four Horsemen with him, and in the brabble the Captains Horse was slain under him. Presently a rumor was spread all over the Country, That the Lantgraves Captain was slain, which exceedingly incensed the common People against them, it being reported that they were Walloons which had done it. The Dutches understanding the danger that they were in, perswaded her Husband to leave them, and by the swiftness of his Horse to recover some Town for his safety, till they came to him. Mr. Bertie attempting this, was eagerly pursued by the Countrymen; and the Captains Brother, who thought, that according to the report, the Captain had been slain indeed; And in the pursuit they came so near unto him, that he had certainly been murdered, but that, as God would have it, spying a Ladder that leaned against a Window, he left his Horse, and ran up the Ladder, whereby he got into a Cock-loft on the top of the House, where, with his Rapier and Dagger, he defended himself for a space: And it pleased God that the Burgomaster, and another Magistrate that could speak Latin came to the House, and perswaded him to submit himself to the order of the Law. Mr. Bertie knowing himself to be clear, and the Captain to be alive, was content to yield himself to them upon condition that the Magistrate would promise him safety, and to protect him from the rude multitude: This the Magistrate promised, whereupon he delivered up his Weapons and himself into his Hands, and was committed to safe custody till the truth of his cause should be tried.

Then did Mr. Bertie presently write to the Lantgrave, and to the Earl of Erbagh, declaring his case unto them. The next morning the Earl of Erbagh came to the Town, whither the Dutches also with her Waggon was now come. The Earl having heard of the Dutches before, went to her, and carried himself with much civility and respect towards her: Whereupon the Towns-men seeing how submissively the Earl behaved himself, and by this time understanding the Captain to be alive, both they and the other authors of that stir began to shrink away, making all the Friends they could to Mr. Bertie and the Dutches, that they would not report their doings after the worst sort. And thus, through Gods merciful providence, escaping this great danger, they proceeded on on in their journey, and through the same good hand of providence arrived at last in safety in Poland, where, by the King they were entertained with all curtesie and humanity; And the King also placed them safely and honorably in the Earldom of Crozan, in which place they had absolute power of Government, the same which the King himself formerly had, so that it proved to them as a quiet Haven after a tempestuous Sea, and there they lived with much honor and comfort till the death of Queen Mary.

CHAP. XII.

The Troubles of many of those which fled for Religion in Queen Maries days beyond the Seas, especially at Frankford.

Any godly Persons, Ministers, and others, seeing the charge of Religion by Queen Mary, and the storm of persecution arising, that they might reserve themselves for better times, fled beyond Sea, and June 27. 1554. Edmund Sutton, William Williams, William Whittingham, and Thomas Wood, with their companies, arrived at Frankford, which were the first Englishmen that desired to make their abode there.

The same night of their arrival came to them Mr. Valeran Pullen, one of the Ministers of the French Church, and told them that he had obtained of the Magistrates a Church for all such as should come out of England for the Gospels sake, especially from Glastenbury, who were Frenchmen. To which they answered, That they had great cause to praise God who had stirred up the Hearts of the Magistrates to shew such favor to the French; But seeing few of them who were already, or should hereafter come from England, understood the French Tongue, it would not be convenient for them to join themselves to that Church.

A Church granted in Frankford.

Hereupon the next day they conferred with Mr. Morellio, another Minister of the French Church, and with Mr. Castalio, an Elder of the same, both of them godly and learned Men, by whose advice they concluded that a Supplication should be drawn up and presented to the Magistrates to know whether they would suffer, both such as were already come, and such others as might repair thither from England, to remain safely within their City. This Supplication was subscribed by Mr. Sutton, Mr. Whittingham, and the rest of the English; as also by Mr. Morellio, Castalio, and one Adrian a Citizen, with whom they lodged.

The English Petition.

The Magistrates granted this request: Whereupon July 8. by the advice of Morellio and Castalio, who shewed themselves Fathers to all English Men so long as they lived, address was made to Mr. John Glanberge, one of the chief Senators, for a place or Church, where they and all other their Countrymen, might have Gods Word truly preached, and the Sacraments sincerely administered in the English Tongue. He promised them kindly his furtherance, and accordingly moved it to the whole Senate, and July 14. it was granted that they should have liberty to preach and administer the Sacraments in the Church, which the Frenchmen had, each other day in the week, and upon Sabbath days at different hours: But withal it was required that the English should agree with the French in Doctrine and Ceremonies, that so they might give no offence to them. They were also required to approve and subscribe the same Confession of Faith, which the French Men had then presented, and were about to publish in Print, which was accordingly done by all the aforementioned, and by some others which by this time were come to them.

The Magistrates answer.

They were to agree with the French.

Thus

Satan's malice.

Thus far Gods mercy did greatly appear to them. But Satan envying their peace and welfare, when they had withdrawn themselves from the reach of their common Enemies the Papists, shortly after he set them at discord amongst themselves, raising up a persecution where they least expected it, as in the process of the Story you shall find.

These holy Men having obtained so much favor of the Magistrates, began to consult what form of Service they should use: for (it was told them) that they were not bound to strictly to the French Ceremonies, but if one allowed of the other, it was sufficient

A form of service agreed on.

Hereupon the English Service Book was perused, and by generall consent it was concluded, That answering the Minister aloud, the Litany, Surplice, and many other things should be omitted, because they might prove scandalous to those Reformed Churches.

It was further agreed, That the Minister, instead of the English Confession, should use another form more suitable to that state and time, after which a Psalm was to be sung; And then the Minister, after Prayer to proceed to his Sermon, at the end whereof a form of Prayer was prescribed for all Estates, and in particular for England, which was to be concluded with the Lords Prayer; And then the Minister was to rehearse the Articles of the Faith, and so to dismiss the People with a Blessing.

It was also concluded that sundry things should be omitted in the administration of the Sacraments. All which being agreed on, they proceeded to choose the Minister and Deacons, and so entered their Church, July 29.

Letters sent to other English.

Then they thought good forthwith to advertise their Brethren, and Countrymen dispersed, of this singular mercy of God to them, the like whereof could not as yet be obtained in any other place, and to desire them, That laying aside worldly respects, they would repair thither, that they might altogether with one Heart and Mouth, lament and bewail their former sins; And also to give thanks to their Heavenly Father, who had given them such a Church in a strange Land: These Letters were sent to Strasborough, Zurick, Desburg and Embsen, Aug. 2.

Government agreed on.

Also because they conceived that the Church could not long continue in good order, without Discipline, there was a form of Government drawn up, and agreed on, unto which all that were present subscribed.

The answer from Strasborough.

Shortly after the English at Strasborough returned this answer, That they had considered the contents of their Letter, and perceived that the principal effect was, That they might have One or Two sent them to take the chief charge of their Church; For which end they might get Dr. Poinet, Dr. Cox, Dr. Bale, or Mr. Scory, or any Two of them; And if they disliked this, they would appoint one from Strasborough, and another from Zurick, to come to them. Mr. Grindall also at the same time wrote to Mr. Scory at Embsen, perswading him to be the Superintendent of that Church at Frankford, who in Two several Letters to his private Friends, profered his service to that Congregation. But before the receipt of his Letters, the Church had written to Mr. Knox at Geneva, to Mr. Haddon at Strasborough, and to Mr. Lever at Zurick, whom they elected for their Ministers, and advertised Mr. Scory by a general Letter of the same.

The Letter to Zurick.

Sept. 16. These of Frankford wrote again to the English at Zurick, in this form: Grace, mercy and peace; After long expectation of your answer to our Letter, we thought fit once more to put you in remembrance; and as formerly, so now again we earnestly require on Gods behalf, that you would seriously weigh and consider this call of God, and the necessity of this Congregation: we have thoroughly learned your estate, and also made you acquainted with ours; and we heartily wish that we might together bewail our sins, pray for our Brethren who are under the Tyranny of Antichrist; and to instruct and edifie one another. Finally to spend the time of our persecution together, and to redeem these days which are so evil. If you stay there for the improvement of your learning, surely you might so benefit yourselves here, that you should have no cause cause to repent: You cannot here lack the Society of Learned Men, and for their works which are in Print, you may here be abundantly furnished with them. But we need not, Brethren, be large in reasoning, for we know that Gods Spirit that worketh in your Hearts, will prevail more with you than any arguments of ours; not doubting but the same holy Spirit knocks at the door of your consciences, not only to move you to hearken to our request, but also to avoid the offence and scandal which will be given to our poor Brethren in England, whose expectations cannot otherwise be satisfied. Remember, brethren, that we write as those who altogether seek our Fathers honor, the discharge of our duty, and the comfort of our afflicted Countrymen. The same sweet Father grant for his mercies sake, that we may assemble together to promote the building of his Temple, and to hinder false Workmen and Underminers; and diligently in our several places to endeavor to promote this work, till it come to perfection. Farewel in Christ: From Frankford Sept. 16. 1554.

To this Letter, they that studied at Zurick returned this Answer:

Being placed here in quietness, with many and great advantages to our studies, we have by this our Letter returned answer to your earnest request, which was, that to discharge our duty and conscience, and to increase and instruct your Congregation with our pains and presence, we would remove from hence to you; Urging it upon our consciences, in regard of that great need which you have of us; and for the further encouragement of us, you have signified and assured us, that with you we may, and shall use the same order of Service in Gods worship, as was last set forth by King Edward the Sixth. Wherefore for the better enabling us to understand your request, and for the charitable performance of duty upon both parts, we have sent unto you Master Richard Chambers, our best Friend, a charitable Man, and one that is tenderly affected to the Church of Christ; intreating him to travel to you, and with you for us, that this business moved by writing may be fully debated betwixt you; and we all agree to, and shall perform whatsoever he shall say and promise in our Names to you. We beseech you therefore in the Name of God conscientiously to consider both your state and ours: And if you shall conclude with the said Master Chambers for our coming to you, then let not him lack your charitable help in necessary provision for our continuance with you. Thus beseeching God that your doings may tend to his glory, and the speedy comfort of his afflicted Church, We wish you all health, and increase of true knowledge in Christ our Lord and Saviour. Octob. The Thirteenth following, they wrote also another Letter to the same purpose, concluding thus:

Dear Brethren, Considering that we are not only all of one Nation, but also members of the same mystical Body of Jesus Christ our Head; we ought therefore especially in this time of our Exile, and worthily deserved affliction, by all means possible to aid and comfort one another, beseeching God for his mercies sake to assuage his wrath, to give us repenting Hearts, to grant patience to our Brethren in England, and mercifully to look down upon his Vineyard that is miserably spoiled and trodden under foot, and after these fatherly chastisements, to return us to our native homes, and to enable us to work fruitfully in the same. If upon the receipt of these our Letters you shall without cloke or forged pretence, only seeking Christs honor, advertise us by your Letters, that our Beeing there is so needful as you have already signified, and that we may as freely and uprightly serve God (whereof private Letters received from Frankford make us much to doubt) as the order last taken in the Church of England permitteth and prescribeth: For we are fully resolved to admit and use no other: Then about Easter next (for before we cannot) God prospering us, and no just cause intervening, whereby our purposes may be disappointed, with one consent we agree to joyn our selves to you, and most willingly to perform such service there, as our poor condition and calling will permit. In the mean space we shall most intirely beseech God so to assist you with his holy Spirit, that your doings may help to confound Papistry, set forth Gods glory, and shew such light in the face of the world, that both the wicked

Octo. 14. Following Master Whitehead came to Frankford, and by the request of the Congregation, took the place upon him for a time, and preached upon the Epistle to the Romans.

Mr. Knox chosen
Pastor.

Not long before, Master Chambers had conference with the Church at Frankford, in the behalf of the English Students at Zurick, and saw that they could not assure him the full use of the English Service Book, without hazarding their Church: Whereupon he returned to Zurick whence he came: And about the same time Master Knox coming from Geneva, was chosen their Minister; and so the business rested for a while. Yet shortly after they wrote again to them at Zurick in this manner:

Their second Letter to Zurick.

we have received Two Letters from you, one dated Octo. 13. sent us from Strasborough; The other of the Twenty seventh of the same, sent us by our dear Friend Master Chambers, and have conferred with him at large touching the contents thereof; and whereas, after divers Assemblies, and long debates, Master Chambers perceived that we could not in all points warrant the full use of the Service Book, which seemeth to be your full scope and aim, and also conscientiously weighing the great benefit offered to our whole Nation in this City; he not only rejoiced greatly at the same, but also promised to travel with you, in perswading you to the furtherance thereof.

*As touching the substance of the Book, we desire the observation of it as much as you, so far as Gods Word commands: But for the unprofitable Ceremonies, as well by his consent, as by ours, they are not to be used. And though they were tolerable, as some of them are not, yet being in a strange Commonwealth, we could not be suffered to use them: And surely it were better that they should never be practised, than that they should prove the subversion of our Church, which would be much hazarded by the use of them. If a larger door be opened there for the same, than to us, upon your perswasions, you shall find that we will not draw back: For this is very necessary, if we wish the comfort and gathering together of our dispersed Brethren. If any think that the not using the Book in all points will increase our godly Fathers and Brethrens bands in England, or will tend to the dishonor of the Laws of our late Sovereign of famous memory, King Edward the Sixth, he seemeth little to weigh the matter, or else hindered by ignorance, knoweth not that even they themselves, upon consideration of circumstances have altered many things; and if God had not in these wicked days prevented, would have altered more: And we doubt not but in our case they would have done the like. These few lines touching our communication we have written to you, referring the rest to the prudence of our good Friend Master Chambers, who can testify that we have shewed our selves conformable in all things which are in our power, and most desirous of your companies, as we formerly wrote to you. Letters from Strasbourg.

When we consider what inward comfort it would be for the faithful people of England, now dispersed for the Gospels sake, and wandering in strange Countries, as sheep without shepherds, to be gathered together into one Congregation, that with one Heart, one Mind and Mouth, they might glorifie God. We have always, and still do think it our duties, not only to desire, but also to labor the effecting of it: And now understanding the good wills of the Magistrates of Frankford towards you, and others of our dispersed Countrymen, who also have granted a Church, wherein we with others may serve God; And not doubting of their further friendship in permitting us freely to use our Religion, according to that godly order set forth and received in England: we do not only bless God for this great mercy, but also think it not fit to refuse so friendly an offer, or to let slip so good an occasion. Therefore not doubting their good furtherance, nor distrusting your good conformity and readiness in reducing the English Church with you to the former perfection which it last had in England, so far as possibly it can be attained, lest by much altering the same, we should seem to condemn the chief Authors thereof; who, as they now suffer, so are they ready to confirm that Fact with the price of their Blood; and should also give occasion to our Adversaries to accuse our Doctrin of imperfection, and us of mutability; and should cause many godly to doubt of that truth, wherein they have formerly been persuaded; and to hinder their coming hither, which before they had purposed. For the avoiding of these, and obtaining the other, moved hereunto in conscience, and provoked by your gentle Letters, we have thought fit to send over unto you our beloved Brethren, the bringers hereof, to travel with the Magistrates and you concerning the premises, whose wisdom, Learning and godly zeal, as they are known to you, so their doings in this business shall be fully approved of by us. And if they obtain that which we trust will not be denied at any Hand, we intend God willing to be with you Feb. the First next, there to help to set in order, and establish that Church accordingly, and so long to remain with you, as shall be necessary, on till just occasion shall call some of us away: And we doubt not but our Brethren of Zurich, Embden, Duesborough, &c. will do the same, as we have requested them by our Letters; hoping that you by yours will make the like request, Farewel: Strasborough, Nov. 23, 1554.

This Letter being read to the Congregation, Master Grindall declared the occasion of their coming, which was chiefly for establishing the English Service Book; nor that they meant (as he said) to have it so strictly observed, but that such Ceremonies and things which the Country could not bear, might well be omitted, so that the substance and effect thereof might be retained.

The English
Service book
prefixed.

Then Mr. Knox and Mr. Whittingham asked, what they meant by the substance of the Book?

They answered that they had no commission to dispute of those things, only they requested the Congregation to answer these Three Queries.

1. What parts of the Book they would admit?

2. Whether they would allow them a several Church?

3. What assurance they might have for their quiet Habitation?

To the First, answer was made, That what they could prove to be consistent with the word of God, and the Country could permit, that should be granted them.

For the Second they answered, That they understood by the Magistrates, that the time was unreasonable to move for such a thing, till the Council brake up at Augsburg.

The Troubles of those which fled

To the Third they answered, That a general grant was made at their first coming thither, to the whole English Nation, and the freedom of the City was offered to all such as were desirous of it, in as ample a manner as they could require, which to them was sufficient.

They also by these messengers wrote back this Letter to them at Strasborough.

The second Letter to Strasborough.

As it was ever most true, so at this time we find it fulfilled, that wheresoever God hath laid a foundation to build his glory upon, there he continues till he hath perfected his own work. All thanks and praise therefore be to him who hath so moved your Hearts as not to neglect the furtherance of the same. And as the work is of great excellency, so the Adversaries neglect not craftily to undermine it, or at least by false reports, and disgracing the work begun, to discourage the laborers, which should travel in the finishing of it. But truth ever cleareth it self; And as the Sun dispels the Clouds, so misreports by trial are confounded. Our Brethren sent from you can testify our answers to the particulars of your Letters, to whom we have agreed in all things which seemed expedient for the state of this Congregation. As for such Ceremonies, as the order of this Country will not bear, we necessarily forbear; yet with as little alteration as may be possible (according as you desire in your Letters) so that no Adversary can be so impudent, as either to blame our Doctrine of imperfection, or us of inconstancy, except he be wilfully ignorant, rather seeking how to find fault, than to amend things amiss. Neither do we dissent from them who are spending their Bloods for the Doctrine whereof they have made a most worthy Confession: And yet we think not, that any Learned or Godly Man will stand in defence of those Ceremonies to death, which even the Book confesseth may upon occasions be altered and changed. And if the not full using of the Book cause any godly person to doubt of the truth which they formerly imbraced, or retard their coming hither, surely either they were not well instructed, who for the breach of a Ceremony will neglect such a singular benefit, or else things have been misreported to them by false Brethren, who spare not everywhere to sow some poor reasons to hinder so worthy an enterprise. And whereas ye write that the First of February next ye will come to help to set in order and stablish this Church, as we willingly desire it for your companies sake, and that you might see our godly order here observed; so we cannot but signify, that if ye take such a journey for the stablishing of Ceremonies, it will tend more to your charges, than to any general profit, except ye resolve to stay longer with us than Two moneths, as you write to our Countrymen at Densborough and Embden, &c.

The rest we refer to our Brethren, Mr. Chambers, and Mr. Grindall, who by their diligent enquiry have learned so much of our estate as we wrote unto you in our former Letters; That is, that we have a Church freely granted to Preach Gods Word purely, and to administer the Sacrament sincerely, to execute discipline truly: And as for the Book, we will practise it so far as Gods Word warranteth; and the state of this Country will permit, Farewel, Presently after the receipt of this Letter, the Divines of Strasborough returned this answer:

The answer from Strasbo-
rough.

Grace, mercy and peace, We have received your Letter, and therewithal an answer to certain Articles, by which we perceive, as also by the report of Mr. Chambers, and Mr. Grindall, your estate; But seeing the time serves not for the present to move the Magistrates for those requests, the obtaining whereof was the principal cause of our sending to you, we cannot agree to any general meeting at any certain time, time, either to remain with you, or otherwise. But when you shall find the time convenient to move the Magistrates for the quiet habitation for all comers, especially for the Students, and for a separate Church, wherein the Book may be used in such a manner as no reasonable Man shall justly blame, and that we may have assurance thereof under the Magistrates Hands: Upon this information we shall consult what is further to be done on our party, hoping that God will direct us so as may be most for his glory in the end, whatsoever may be judged of it for the present.

Strasb. Decem. 13. 1554.

Your Loving Friends,

James Haddon, Edwin Sands, Edmund Grindall, &c.

Hereupon Mr. Knox, Mr. Whittingham, and others translated the English Service Book into Latin, and sent it to Mr. Calvin to Geneva, requesting his judgment thereupon, and declaring to him that some of their Countrymen went about to force them to the use of it, and would admit no other, saying, That it was most absolute, and that if ever they came into their own Country, they would endeavour to establish it there again.

Mr. Calvin having perused it, returned this answer. I find in the English Liturgy, many tolerable follies, by which word I mean, that there is not that purity which is to be desired: These things, though they could not at first be amended, yet seeing there was no manifest impiety in them, they were for a season to be tolerated. These Letters bore date from Geneva, Jan. 20. 1555.

These Letters being read in the Congregation at Frankford, many which before were for all the parts of that Book, were wholly alienated from it. Whereupon it was concluded that Mr. Knox, Mr. Whittingham, Mr. Fox and Mr. Cole should draw forth some order fit for their state and time, which being finished, was tendered to the Congregation, being the same with that used at Geneva: This was well liked by most, only such as were for the English Service Book could not abide it. Hereupon, Feb. 6. A Liturgie was framed, part taken out of the English Book, and other things added as the state of the Church required, which by the consent of the Congregation was to be continued till the last of April following. And if any contention should arise in the mean time, the matter was to be determined by these Five notably Learned Men, viz. Calvin, Musculus, P. Martyr, Bullinger and Viret; which agreement being put in writing, all gave their consents to it, and hereupon the holy Sacrament of the Lords Supper was comfortably administered.

This happy Concord continued till March 13. following; At which time Dr. Cox and some others coming out of England to Frankford, began to break the order agreed upon: First, in answering aloud after the Minister, contrary to the Churches determination, saying, That they would do as they had done in England, and that they would have the face of an English Church there: Yes the Sabbath following, one of that company, without the consent of the Congregation, went up suddenly into the Pulpit, and read the Letany, Dr. Cox and the rest answering aloud, thereby breaking the order of that Church. Hereupon Mr. Knox being to Preach in the Afternoon, he having gone over so much in Genesis, was come to the story of Noah, and in the process of his Sermon he said, As some things ought to be kept secret, so such things as tend to the dishonor of God and the disturbance of his Church, ought to be disclosed and openly rebuked, and so shewed that after long trouble and contention a godly agreement was made amongst them, which that very day had been very ungodly broken: Which thing, said he, became not the proudest of you all to have attempted; adding further, That as by the Word of God we must seek our warrant for the establishing of Religion, without which warrant nothing ought to be obtruded upon Christians; So seeing in the English Book there are some things superstitious, impure, and imperfect, which I undertake to prove before all Men, I will not therefore consent that they shall be received of this Church: And in case any will go about to burthen our free Congregation therewith, so often as I come into this place, my text offering just occasion, I will not fail to speak against it. He also affirmed that amongst many other things which provoked Gods anger against England, slackness in reforming Religion when they had opportunity, was one, and therefore now they ought to be the more circumspect how they laid their foundation: And whereas some were not ashamed to say, that Reformation was perfected in England, he proved the contrary by the want of a good Discipline, as appeared by the troubles which good Master Hooper had sustained in King Edwards time about the Rochet, &c. As also for that some Men were permitted to hold Three, Four or Five Benefices, to the scandal of the Gospel, and to the starving of many poor Souls.

Dr. Cox disturbs the peace of the Church.

This speech of his was much stomacked by some, especially such as had been Pluralists in England, who sharply reprov'd him so soon as he came out of the Pulpit: And the Tuesday following was appointed to speak more fully about these businesses: At which time Doctor Cox and his company made earnest request to be admitted to have voices in the Congregation: To this some answered, that this could not be granted, till the matters in controversie betwixt them were first determined, and till they should subscribe to their Discipline, as others had done before them, &c.

Dr. Cox and his company admitted members.

Raise up troubles.

But Mr. Knox intreated that they might be satisfied in their request, unto whom some others adhered, by which means they became the greater part, and so were admitted members of the Church; which was no sooner done, but Doctor Cox forthwith forbad Mr. Knox to meddle any more in that Congregation.

Hereupon the next day Mr. Whittingham went to Mr. Jo. Glanburge (who had procured the Church for them) and complained to him, that certain newly come out of England, had forbidden their Minister, who was appointed to Preach that day, and intended to set up an Order, which, he doubted, would not be well taken; which he thought fit to acquaint him with, least any inconvenience should fall out.

Arbitrators chosen.

Nothing concluded.

Hereupon he presently sent and commanded that there should be no Sermon that day; and sending for Monsieur Valeran, the French Minister, commanded him that Two Learned Men should be appointed of either part; and that he and they should consult and agree upon some good Order, and make report to him thereof accordingly. Upon this Doctor Cox and Master Lever of the one side, and Master Knox and Master Whittingham on the other side, were appointed to decide the controversie, and Master Valeran was appointed to set down in writing what they agreed upon: But when they came to speak of the morning Service, and Doctor Cox said, I will have it thus, they could not agree, and so brake off.

Then did the Congregation draw up a supplication, presenting it to Master Glanburge, and intreating him that it might be considered of by the Senators: The tenor whereof was this;

The Presbyterians Petition.

Let it not molest you (most grave and worthy Senators) that your affairs are interrupted with a few words. But least we should trouble you with prolixity, the matter briefly is this: When your great humanity had through the providence of God, granted us a Church, we undertook forthwith (as became us) to consult about Orders, and to draw up a Liturgy; And because we found in the prolix and ceremonious Book of England, many things, to speak the least of them, not so perfect; we thought fit to reduce it to the perfect rule of the Scriptures, and to accommodate our selves to the example of the Church wherein we live, and to which we have subscribed. But when this proved offensive to some of our Countrymen (although the greatest part agreed thereto) as declining from the decrees of our Elders, we were for a few Moneths put to no small trouble: But at length when it could not be otherwise, for peace sake, we gave place to them, and suffered them to pick out of their

Book the best things, upon this condition, that the same should continue without alteration, at least till the last of April, at which time, if any new contention should arise, that then the whole matter should be referred to these Five worthy Men, Calvin, Musculus, Bullinger, Martyr, and Viret. What need many words? The condition was willingly accepted, and confirmed by both parties, which also was drawn up in writing; And thanks were given to God, with great joy, every one thinking that day to be the end of all discord; They also received the holy Communion as the token and seal of their mutual agreement, which had been omitted for the space of Three Moneths. Master Valeran joyned with us herein, and was a furtherer of Concord, and a witness of this our agreement. But now lately some of our Countrymen came to us, who have endeavored by all means to obtrude that large volume of ceremonies upon us, to break the Covenant, and to overthrow the liberty of our Church; granted by your benevolence; which also they enterprise under the name of your defence, abusing the authority of your name to the satisfying of their lusts. We here omit many things that would make for our cause; and remit them to our Brethren, to whom (most Honorable Senators) you may understand the cause of our contention, and so may know easily what to judge of the whole matter.

What manner of Book this is for which they so earnestly contend, you may consider by the Epistle which Calvin lately wrote to us, in which he hath signified his mind plainly, both of the Book, and of the uprightness of our cause.

We could have pointed out to you the foolish and fond things of the Book, but passing over others, we shall instance only in this one; within these Three years arose a great conflict between the English Bishops, and the Bishop of Gloucester [Master Hooper] a Man worthy of perpetual memory, whom we now hear to be burned. This Man being made Bishop by King Edward the Sixth, according to this Book, there was obtruded upon him by other Bishops, a Rochet, and a Bishops Robe; This Man being Learned, and having been long brought up in Germany, because he refused those proud things that are admired by Fools, was cast into Prison; and at length, being overcome by their importunity, he was compelled to his shame, to give place to their impudency, to the common grief and sorrow of all godly minds.

But happily you will say, wherefore speak we of these things which appertain not to us? Yea verily, we think it concerns you much, for if these Men, armed with your Authority, shall do what they list, this evil in time shall be established by you, neither shall there be any end of this controversie in England. But if it shall please your Honors to moderate between us, that this whole matter may be referred to those Five Men above mentioned, not we alone that are here present, but all our posterity; yea our whole English Nation, and all good Men, to the perpetual memory of your Names, shall be bound unto you for this great benefit. We might have enlarged this Narration, for we want not other reasons, but we fear that you would want time, by reason of your more serious businesses; Therefore we leave the rest to the consideration of your Wisdoms.

March 22. Mr. Glauburg came to the English Church, and shewed the Congregation, that it was commanded by the Magistrates (when by his means the Church was granted) that they should agree with the French Church both in Doctrine and Ceremonies: And that they understood that their falling from that order had caused much contention amongst them; Therefore he straitly charged and commanded, That from thenceforth they should not dissent from that Order; For if they did, as he had opened the Church doors for them, so he would shut them again, and that such as would not assent thereto, should not stay in that City, willing them presently to consult hereof, and give him an answer before he departed.

Hereupon Doctor Cox spake to the Congregation, saying, I have read the French Order, and do think it good and godly in all points, and therefore desire you to obey the Magistrates commandment about it; upon which speech the whole whole Congregation assented, and a report was made thereof to Mr. Glauburg by Dr. Cox, Mr. Lever, and Mr. Whittingham before he departed. Dr. Cox also requested him, that notwithstanding their ill behavior, he would be pleased to shew them his accustomed favor and goodness, which he most gently and lovingly promised.

Dr. Cox's dissimulation.
Peace concluded.

The treachery of the Prelati-cal party.

At the next meeting of the Congregation that Order was put in practice to the comfort and rejoycing of the most part. Yet such as would fain have had the English Service Book, left not the matter thus. For seeing Master Knox to be in great credit with the Congregation, they endeavored by a most cruel, Barbarous and bloody practice to dispatch him out of the way, that thereby they might attain their end of bringing in their Service Book.

They had amongst them a Book of his, called, An Admonition to Christians, written in English; wherein by occasion he spake of the Emperor, of Philip his Son, and Mary Queen of England. This they presented to the Magistrates; who, upon the receipt of it, sent for Mr. Whittingham, and asked him what manner of Man their Minister Mr. Knox was? He answered, that to his knowledge he was a Learned, Wise and Godly man. Then said one of the Magistrates, Some of your Countrymen have accused him to us of high Treason, against the Emperors Majesty, his Son, and the Queen of England: Here is the Book, and the places which they have turned down, the true and perfect sense whereof, we command you (sub pana pacis) to bring to us in Latine at one a clock in the afternoon. This he did accordingly, at which time, having conferred amongst themselves, they commanded that Mr. Knox should Preach no more, till their pleasure were further known. The words concerning the Emperor were these, spoken by him in the Pulpit in a Town in Buckinghamshire, in the beginning of Queen Maries Reign: O England, England, If thou wilt obstinately return into Egypt; That is, If thou Contract Marriage, Confederacy or League with such Princes as do maintain and advance Idolatry, such as the Emperor, who is no less an enemy to Christ then was Nero; If for the pleasure and friendship, I say, of such Princes, thou return to thine old abominations used in the times of Popery, then assuredly (O England) thou shalt be plagued, and brought to desolation by the means of those whose favor thou seekest, and by whom thou art drawn to fall from Christ, and to serve Antichrist.

The Magistrates dislike of them.

Mr. Knox driven away.

But the Magistrates abhorring this bloody design, when certain of Master Knox's enemies followed them, to know what should be done with him, they shewed evident signs of disliking their unnatural suit; and withal sent for Master Williams, and Master Whittingham, willing them that Master Knox should depart the City, least they should be forced to deliver him, if the Emperors Council (which then lay at Auspurg) should upon the like information send for him.

His farewell
Sermon.

March 25. The night before Master Knox's departure, he made a most comfortable Sermon at his Lodging, to about Fifty persons then present, about the death and resurrection of Christ, and of the unspeakable joys prepared for the Elect, which in this life suffer trouble, and persecution for the testimony of his blessed Name. The next day he was brought Three or Four miles on his way, by some of those persons, who with great heaviness of Heart, and plenty of Tears committed him to the Lord.

The Prelatical
party prevails.

And the same day one Adolphus Glauburg, a Doctor of Law, and Nephew to Master John Glauburg the Senator, whom Doctor Cox and his party had won to them, sent for Master Whittingham, and told him that Three Doctors, Thirteen Batchelors of Divinity, and some others had obtained of the Magistrates, the full use of the English Book; and therefore he commanded him not to meddle any further to the contrary; For (saith he) it is fully concluded of that so it shall be. And supposing that Mr. Whittingham would oppose it what he might, the next day he sent for him again, and before Dr. Cox and others he renewed the same charge. Mr. Whittingham answered, That if it were so concluded, he would willingly obey; not doubting but that it might be lawful for him and some others, to join themselves to another Church. But Dr. Cox besought the Lawyer that that might not be permitted: Mr. Whittingham answered, That it would be too great cruelty to force Men contrary to their consciences to obey their disordered doings; Adding, that if it would please the Magistrates to give him and others the hearing, they would dispute the matter against all the contrary part, and doubted not to prove, that the Order which they sought to establish, ought not to be admitted in any Reformed Church: The Lawyer answered, That there should be no such Disputation, commanding him again to deal no further in that matter.
next

The Congregation hearing of the Tyrannical dealing of this Doctor, they sent Mr. Gilby with some others to Mr. John Glanburg, by whose command they had received the French Order, to mind him of the same, and to shew him that certain lately come in amongst them, had sought to overthrow their Church, by bringing in the English Service Book; To which he answered, That he was informed that both parties had consented thereto, and thereupon he had referred the whole business to his Cousin the Lawyer. Then he enquired for Mr. Whittingham, whereunto they answered, That he was straitly charged by his Cousin to meddle no more in that matter. Upon this answer he gently intreated Mr. Gilby and the rest to be contented, and he would see that nothing should be used, but what should be tolerable, with which answer they departed.

But March 28. Dr. Cox assembled the English Ministers, and told them, That the Magistrates had allowed them the use of the English Book, and therefore he thought it requisite that a Bishop, Superintendent, or Pastor together with Elders and Deacons, should be chosen. To which Mr. Christopher Goodman answered, That he thought fit that they should first agree upon some godly Order for the Church, and to have the consent of the Congregation thereto, that so it might appear that they despised not their Brethren. To this it was answered, That for the Order it was already agreed upon, for other Order then was contained in the English Book they would not have; and so nothing was further done.

Then did the oppressed Congregation desire Mr. Whittingham to go to Basill and Geneva, where it pleased the Lord to stir up the Magistrates Hearts to grant them Churches, and so at his return it was thought good by such as determined to go away, to endeavor a reconciliation before their departure, as Mr. Calvin had counselled them; And the rather, for that some of Dr. Cox's company had stiled publicly their departure to be a schism: Whereupon they wrote this ensuing Letter to the Pastor and whole Congregation.

For as much as, through Gods mercy, we have obtained a Church in another place, we thought good to advertise you of the same; And to the intent that slanderous reports may cease, as also that if any offence be taken or given, the same may come to trial, we desire that you for your part would appoint Two Arbiters, and we shall appoint other Two, who hearing the matters, may determine where the fault resteth, at which time we undertake to defend our departure against the slanderous reports of some that unlearnedly tearm it a schism. This, Brethren, we thought good to signify to you, judging it to be the only means for peace; whereof, how desirous we are, our tedious journey may be a sufficient proof, being perswaded that hereby strife may be ended, charity revived, friendship continued, Gods glory advanced, and our Brethren edified. The Presbyterians driven away.

This Letter was read publickly in the Congregation by the Pastor, but answer they could get none, save this, That since they were minded to depart, they might depart at their pleasure; But for the reference, or satisfaction, they would assent to neither: Whereupon not many days after, the oppressed Church departed from Frankford to Basill, where Mr. Fox, with some other of them staid, the rest went to Geneva, where they were received with great favor and courtesie, both by Magistrates, Ministers and People; And shortly after entering their Church, they chose Mr. Knox and Mr. Goodman for their Pastors, and requested Mr. Gilby to supply the room till Mr. Knox should come out of France. And thus, through Gods mercy, at last they found some rest; whereas that Church that remained at Frankford, after that by their violent proceedings they had driven these godly Brethren away, they presently after fell out amongst themselves, and had such continual bickerings and contentions, as could by no means be pacified, till at the end of Queen Maries Reign the Church was dissolved, and they returned into their own native Country again. The large and full discourse whereof, it being not pertinent to my scope, who so pleases to read, may find it in a Book called, A Discourse of the Troubles at Frankford. Printed Anno Christi 1575. and reprinted 1642.

C H A P. XIII.

Gods Judgments upon the Persecutors of his Church and Children.

From the first general Plantation of the Gospel in this Kingdom under King Lucius, there was never any King or Queen of England, in whose Reign so much Christian Blood was shed, as in Four years space, during the Reign of Queen Mary: Under whom there suffered, One Archbishop, Four Bishops, Twenty one Divines, Eight Gentlemen, Eighty four Artificers, One hundred Husbandmen, Servants, and Laborers, Twenty six Wives, Twenty Widows, Nine Virgins, Two Boys, and Two Infants; in all Two hundred seventy seven. Sixty four more were persecuted for their Faith, and Profession; whereof Seven were whipped, and Sixteen perished in Prison, and were buried in Dung-hills; many lay in captivity, and condemned, but were delivered and saved by the happy entrance of our glorious Queen Elizabeth: Besides those many who were forced to fly the Land, and live in exile.

But as Queen Mary was Prodigious of the lives of her best Subjects, and a persecutor of the Gospel, so God followed her with his plagues, both in her life and death; For whilst she lived, nothing prospered which she took in hand. I shall only instance in some few particulars.

Gods judgments on Queen Mary.

First, The fairest and greatest Ship which she had, called the Great Harry, was burnt by lightning from Heaven; The Christian world at that time not affording such another.

Then would she needs marry Philip King of Spain, thereby subjecting England unto strangers; yet do what she could, she could never set the English Crown upon his Head.

Then did she attempt the restitution of Abbey Lands, and had all the assistance that the Pope could afford her therein, yet she was finally crossed of her desires about them.

Then did God plague her, and her Land with a grievous Famine, so that many of her poor Subjects were fain to live upon Acorns.

Then did she lose Calice which had been in the possession of the English, during the Reign of Eleven Kings, viz. from King Edward the Thirds time, with which loss she was so affected and afflicted, that she told some of her Courtiers, that if they opened her Body when she was dead, they should find Calice written in her Heart.

Again, never had Woman worse success in her Child-birth than she. For if she was with Child, and did travel, Why was it never seen? If she was not not with Child, Why was the Kingdom so abused? some in the Pulpit returning thanks for her safe delivery, and taking upon them to tell that it was a Son, and a goodly Prince.

Then God having thus crossed her in her hopes of Children, which above all things she most desired, He also bereft her of that which above all earthly things should have been her comfort and honor, by withdrawing from her the company and affection of her Husband, by whose marriage she had promised to her self such a world of felicity and content; so that now she could neither enjoy him whom she had married, nor have liberty to marry another. And when all these Hands of God would work nothing upon her to cause her to repeal her Bloody Laws, or to abstain from her Bloody Persecution of the Saints of God; the Lord stroke her with a lingring and pining sickness, whereof she died; having only Reigned Five years, and Five moneths; a shorter Reign than any of the Kings of England enjoyed since the conquest, Richard the Third only excepted.

The Two last years of her Reign, as there was in them most violence and bloodshed for Religions sake, so were they most grievous for temporal Calamities; For besides the loss of Calice, and the fruitless attempt upon Brest in Brittany, which proved both chargeable and dishonorable; The Land was also grievously afflicted with horrible tempests, mortal diseases, plagues and famines. In the former of which years, hot burning Agues, and other strange diseases took away much People; so that between October the Twentieth, and the last of December, there died Seven Aldermen in London, whereof Five had been the Lord Maiors of the City. The same year Wheat was sold for Four Marks the Quarter. Mault for Two pound Four shillings the Quarter. Peas at Two pound Six shillings Eight pence. Whereas after the next Harvest, Wheat was sold for Five shillings a Quarter: Mault at Four shillings Eight pence; and in some places a Bushel of Rie was exchanged for a pound of Candles which came to Four pence.

In her Fifth year near Nottingham was a marvelous tempest of Thunder, which beat down all the Houses, and Churches in Two Towns, cast the Bells out of the Church-Yard, and some sheets of Lead were carried Four hundred foot off into the Fields, writhen as if they had been of Leather. Trees were torn up by the roots, and carried twelvescore off. Divers Men were slain, &c.

Also the same year in the Harvest time was a great mortality; so that much Corn was lost in the Fields for want of Workmen to gather it, whereby a great scarcity ensued. Sir Richard Baker.

Upon Steven Gardiner.

In the next place let us consider the Lords dealing with the chiefest of those who were her instruments of cruelty: And first to begin with Steven Gardiner Bishop of Winchester: We have before heard of his wretched and woful death, about the midst of Queen Maries Reign, and therefore we will not again speak of it; only I will add this, That being upon his death-bed put in mind of Peters denying his Master, he answered, I have denied Christ with Peter, but I never repented with Peter.

Upon Bishop Morgan.

Also Morgan Bishop of St. Davids, who sat upon the condemnation of the blessed Martyr Bishop Ferrar, whose place he unjustly usurped; presently after, he was stricken with such a strange Hand of God, that the meat which he did eat would not go down, sometimes vomiting it up at his Mouth, sometimes through his Nostrils after an horrible manner, and so he continued to his death.

Upon Mr. Leyson.

Mr. Leyson also being High Sheriff at his burning, having set away Mr. Ferrars Cattel into his own grounds, many of them would never eat any meat, but lay bellowing, and roaring till they died.

Gods Judgments upon Persecutors.

Justice Morgan who sat upon the condemnation of the Lady Jane Grey, not long after fell mad, continually crying out, The Lady Jane, The Lady Jane; Take away the Lady Jane; and so continued till he died.

Upon Justice Morgan.

Dr. Dunnings, the Bloody Chancellor of Norwich, that had condemned many of the faithful Servants of Christ, was in the midst of his rage suddenly stricken by the revenging hand of God as he sat in his Chair, and so died.

Upon Dr. Dunnings.

Berry, Commissary of Norfolk, another Bloody Persecutor, Four days after Queen Maries death, having made a great Feast, at which he had one of his Curtesans, and then going to Church in the afternoon, where he administered the Sacrament of Baptism, as he returned homewards, with an heavy groan he fell down to the ground, and never stirred afterwards.

Upon Com. Berry.

Bishop Thornton, Suffragan of Dover, a cruel Persecutor of the holy and harmless Saints of God: As he was on a Sabbath day looking upon his Men that played at Bowls, was suddenly stricken with the dead Palsey, and being carried to his Bed, was wished to remember the Lord, Yea, said he, so I do, and my Lord Cardinal also, and so died after a desperate manner.

Upon Bishop Thornton.

Another Suffragan that succeeded him in that place, having been before Bonnors Instrument in persecuting the Saints, going to Cardinal Poole in his Chamber at Grenwich, to receive his blessing, as he went from him, fell down the Stairs, and brake his Neck.

Upon a Suffragan.

John Cooper of Watsam in the County of Suffolk, a very honest Man, and one that harbored such as were persecuted for the truth, had a couple of Bullocks, which one William Fenning, his Popish Neighbor desired to buy; Cooper told him that he kept them for his own use, and therefore would not sell them. Hereupon this Fenning went and accused him of Treason, for praying, That if God would not take away Queen Mary, that then the Devil would. This wicked accusation, though it was altogether false, yet Fenning suborned Two Knights of the Post to swear to it, whereupon John Cooper was hanged, drawn, and quartered, all his Goods seized on, and his Wife, and Nine Children were turned out of doors, being destitute of all means of subsistence.

But shortly after Gods revenging hand pursued one of those false Witnesses called Grimwood: For as he was at harvest work, stacking of his Corn, his Bowels suddenly fell out, and he immediately died miserably.

Upon Grimwood.

The Parson of Crondall in Kent, being preaching upon Whitsunday, told his People that he had received the Popes pardon from Cardinal Poole, whereby he stood now as clear in Conscience as when he was first born, and therefore he cared not now if he should die the same hour: The words were scarce out of his Mouth, when suddenly he fell down dead in the Pulpit, and never spake word more.

Upon the Parson of Crondall.

A little before Queen Maries death, died Dr. Capon, Bishop of Salisbury, a great Persecutor of the Saints; And about the same time, Dr. Jeffery, his Chancellor (of whose persecutions we have heard before) as he was in the midst of his buildings, suddenly being struck by the Hand of God, yielded up his Ghost. Wherein this is further observable, That just at that time he had appointed to call before him almost an hundred godly Persons, and to examine them by Inquisition, which mischief was by this means prevented.

Upon Dr. Capon.

Mr. Woodroffe, Sheriff of London used much to rejoyce at the torments of the poor Saints of Christ; And so cruel was he, that when Mr. Rogers was carried in a Cart from Newgate to Smithfield, by the way his Children were brought to see him, and the People made way for their coming to the Cart; But Mr. Woodroffe, commanded his Men to break the Car-Mans Head for staying the Cart: But shortly after, vengeance overtook him, he being stricken with a deadness all

Upon Mr. Woodroffe.

one side of his Body, so that he was not able to turn himself in his Bed, in which manner he languished till he died.

Upon Ralph Lardin.

Ralph Lardin, the Betrayer of George Eagles, was afterwards arraigned and hanged. As he stood at the Bar he said publickly, This is justly fallen upon me; for that I betrayed the innocent Blood of that good and just Man George Eagles, who was condemned through my means, and I sold his Blood for a little money.

Upon Richard Potto, and Justice Browne.
Mr. Swingfield with Three others.

The like vengeance of God fell upon Richard Potto and Justice Browne, both cruel Persecutors of the said George Eagles.

Mr. Swingfield a Deputy in Thamesstreet, hearing that Mrs. Angell a Midwife, and a good Woman, was at a Womans labor in Crookedlane, he took Three other with him, and beset the House, and apprehended her, and carried her to Bonnors Officers, by whom she was cast into Lollards Tower. This Mrs. Angell was great with Child, and by reason of the fright, and a fall which she caught in her apprehension, she fell the next day in labor, and was delivered in that Prison, having no Woman with her to help her in her extremity. But within Ten weeks after, Deputy Swingfield and the other Three that came with him to apprehend her, all Four died.

Upon Burton.

There was one Burton, Bailiff of Crowland in Lincolnshire, who in the days of King Edward was a seeming zealous Protestant; But as soon as Queen Mary came to the Crown, he turned Papist, and endeavored to perswade his Neighbors to set up the Mass; But they being not forward therein, this Burton on the Sabbath went to Church, and when the Curate was beginning to read the English Service, he went to him, and said Sirra, will you not say Mass? Buckle your self to it, you Knave, or by Gods Blood I'll sheath my Dagger in your Shoulder. The poor Curate being affrighted herewith, betook himself to the Mass. But shortly after as this Burton, with one of his Neighbors, rode together upon the Fen-bank, a Crow took her flight over his Head with her usual note, and voiding her Excrements, they fell on his Nose, and ran down his Beard, withal, yielding such an horrible stink, that caused him to fall a vomiting in a most violent manner; Whereupon hastening home, he gat him to Bed, but could eat nothing, the stink and vomiting still continuing, which made him with Oaths and fearful execrations to curse the Crow that had poisoned him, and so he continued in extream pain till his death.

Upon a Sherriffs Man.

We have heard before of James Abbes Martyr, that was burnt at Bury; As he went towards the Stake some poor People met him, craving his Alms, and because he had no money to give them, he plucked off his Apparel to his Shirt, and distributed it amongst them, withal exhorting them to be strong in the Lord; and as faithful Followers of Christ, to stand stedfast in the truth of the Gospel, which said he, with Gods assistance I will now in your sight Seal with my Blood. But whilst he was thus exhorting them, there came one of the Sheriffs Men, who hearing him, cried out aloud to the People, most Blasphemously saying; Good People believe him not, he is an Heretick and a mad Man, and out of his Wits; Believe him not for it is Heresie which he speaketh: And as Abbes continued his godly exhortation, so this wicked Wretch belched forth his Blasphemous exclamation till they came to the Stake, at which the constant Martyr was burned. But as soon as the fire was kindled, the fearful stroke of Gods justice fell upon this Wretch, who immediatly before the People fell distracted, wherewith a little before he had charged the blessed Servant of Christ, and pulling off his clothes in a furious manner, he said, Thus did James Abbes the true Servant of God, who is saved, but I am damned; And so he ran about the Town, still crying out That James Abbes was a good Man, and was saved, but he was damned. Hereupon his Master caused him to be bound, cloathed, and kept in a dark Room; but as soon as the company was departed, he tore off his clothes, still raging and crying out, James Abbes was the true Servant of God, and is saved, but I am damned; and thus he continued to his death.

His Son James, to whom he left a great estate, soon wasted it all; jeeringly saying, ill gotten, ill spent; And as he went along Newgate Market, he suddenly fell down and died.

John Peter, Son in law to this Alexander, an horrible Blasphemer, who used upon every occasion to say, If it be not so, I pray God I may rot ere I die: He was also very cruel to the poor Saints in Prison; But God met with him for all, for his Body rotted away by piecemeale whereby he died.

The Life of Doctor Collet Dean of Pauls, who dyed Anno Christi 1519.

John Collet was born of Worshipful Parents in London; his father [Henry Collet] having been twice Lord Mayor of London, by whom he was carefully trained up in Learning. In his younger dayes he travelled into France and Italy, whereby he much improved his learning. At his return into England he went to Oxford, commenced Doctor of Divinity, and began to read publicly upon Pauls Epistles instead of Scotus and Thomas Aquinas, which before were only in request in that University.

His Birth
and Education.

His Travels.
His going to Oxford.

He is famous for Preaching.
His Character.

When he came to London he Preached often, and had a very great Auditory both of Courtiers and Citizens. His Diet was very frugall, his life upright and unblamable; In discipline he was very severe, in so much as being made Dean of Pauls, his Canons complained that they were held in too much by him. He alwayes preferred the honest and honourable estate of Marriage before the unchast single life of Priests. At dinner time he used to have some portion of Scripture read to him, either out of Pauls Epistles or Solemn Proverbs. He used no supper at all.

He was no friend to the irreligious religious orders of Monks, and Friars. He was an enemy to the Divinity of the School Doctors, as of Scotus, and Thomas Aquinas, inso much as when Erasmus highly commended Aquinas for his Learning and acutenesse, Doctor Collet answered; What tell you me of the Learning of that man, who unless he had been of an arrogant and presumptuous spirit, durst never have taken upon him to dispute and define all things so boldly and rashly as he did? And except he had rather been worldly minded then Heavenly, he would never so have polluted Christs wholesome Doctrine with mans prophane Doctrine, as he hath done.

His Judgment of Erasmus.

The Bishop of London at this time was Fitz James, who of a long time bore a great grudge to Dr. Collet, and therefore joyning with two other Bishops, they entred an action of complaint against him before Dr. Warkham Archbishop of Canterbury. The Articles exhibited against him were three. First, For preaching against the worshipping of Images. Secondly, About hospitality, for that he Preaching upon those words in the Gospel, Feed, feed, feed; having expounded the two first for feeding by Doctrine and Example, the third he expounded for feeding by Hospitality, yet not so much for feeding the body as the soul by good counsel and conference. The third was for speaking against such as preached besom Sermons, declaring nothing to the people but what they bring in their Papers with them: The the Bishop of

The Bishops hate him and Article against him.

The Arch-bishop frees him. London used to do, and therefore took it as spoken against himself, which much irritated him against Doctor Collet. But the Arch-bishop more wisely weighing the matter, and being well acquainted with the worth of Collet, so took his part against his Accusers, that at that time he freed him out of trouble.

The Bishops implacable malice. Another design of Fitz James was to make him an Heretick for translating the Pater-noster into English, but the Arch-bishop help him out of that also.

They accuse him to the King. Yet the Bishops malice was restless, For when he could not prevail against Doctor Collet before the Arch-bishop, he laid a train to accuse him to the King, and the occasion thereof was this: About this time King Henry the eighth was preparing War against France, and the Bishop with his complaisances took advantages against Doctor Collet, for that in one of his Sermons he had seemed to preferre Peace before any kind of Warre, though never so just. For this they envied against him in their Sermons, and traduced him also before the King; Yet on good Fryday after, Doctor Collet preached before the King, at which time he treated upon the Victory of Christ, exhorting all Christians to fight under Christs standard against the Devil; adding moreover, what an hard thing it was so to do. He shewed also that all they who upon private hatred or ambition took weapons against their adversaries, one Christian to destroy another, they did not fight under Christs Banner but under Satans. He exhorted therefore all Christians in their Wars, rather to make Christ their Prince and Captain in fighting against their enemies, than to imitate Julius Caesar, Alexander, &c.

The King favours him. The King hearing this, and fearing lest the hearts of his Souldiers should by these words be withdrawn from the Wars, took him aside into his Garden after Sermon, and had much private conference with him. Bishop Fitz-James and his associates seeing this, were now confident that they should see Collet presently sent Prisoner to the Tower, and therefore they waited for his return out of the Garden; But contrary to their expectation, the King used him very courteously, bad him put on his Cap, much commended him for his learning and integrity of life, and agreed with him in all points that he had taught; onely he desired him, lest the rude Souldiers should misinterpret that which he had said, that in his next Sermon he would explain himself more fully to them, which afterwards he did accordingly: And so after long communication, and great promises of favour, the King gently dismissed him with these words, Let every man have his Doctor as himself best liketh, this shall be my Doctor. His adversaries seeing and hearing this, durst never after that time molest him any further.

His Charity. He did many excellent works of Piety and Charity, and amongst the rest he erected that famous foundation of Pauls School, London, where one hundred fifty three poor mens sons should be taught freely, and for this end he built a very convenient dwelling house for the School-master. He assigned also a large annual stipend both for the Head-Master and Usher, whom he willed rather to be chosen out of the number of married men, then of single Priests with their suspected chastity. He left sundry rents and houses for the payment of those stipends, which he committed to the oversight of the Worshipfull company of Merchants in London. He caused to be ingraven upon the School in Latine, Schola Cathedralis puerorum in Christi Opt. Max. fide, & bonis literis, Anno Christi M. D. X. The first Moderator of this School was Mr. William Lilly, a man no lesse eminent for his Learning, than Doctor Collet was for this Foundation; He made the Latine Grammar which ever since by authority hath been used in all Schools.

Doctor Collet was very expert in the Scriptures, especially in Pauls Epistles, which he hath illustrated by his Commentaries. He held Justification freely by the merits of Christ, and not by our own works. He was an enemy to the idle idle and unchaste Life of the Popish Clergy: He abhorred death that persecuted the Professors of the Truth. He died Anno Christi 1539, and was buried in Pauls Church, upon whose Tomb Mrs. Lilly engraved this Motto,

Disce mori mundo; vivere deo.

The Life of Miles Coverdale sometimes Bishop of Exeter, who dyed Anno Christi 1568.

Miles Coverdale was born in the North of England, and from his Child-hood was much given to Learning, and by his Diligence and Industry profited exceedingly therein; So that in the Reign of King Henry the Eighth, he was one of the first that professed the Gospel in England. He was very well skilled in the Hebrew, and translated the Bible into English, and wrote sundry Books upon the Scriptures; which Doctrine being new and strange in those daies, he was much hated and persecuted for it, especially by the Bishops; whereupon he was forced to fly into the Low-Countries. There he printed the Bibles of his Translation, and by sending them over, and selling them in England he maintained himself. But John Sticksy Bishop of London, hearing thereof, and minding to prevent their dispersing in England, enquired diligently where they were to be sold, and bought them all up, supposing that by this means no Bibles would be had; but contrary to his expectation it fell out otherwise; For the same Money which the Bishop gave for these Books, the Merchant sent over to Miles Coverdale, by which means he was enabled to Print as many more, which he also sent into England. This caused the Bishops to pursue him with such eagerness, that he was forced to remove himself out of Flanders into Germany, and to settle himself under the patronage of the Rhene, where he found much Favour. At first he taught Children for his Subsistence; but having learned the Dutch Language, the Prince Elector Palatine gave him a Benefice at a place called Burgsteden, where he did much good by his Ministry and holy Life; maintaining himself partly by his Living, and partly by the Liberality of Thomas Lord Cromwell, who was his good Lord, and relieved him very much.

At length, when by the happy coming in of King Edward the sixth Religion was altered in England, and the Gospel had a free passage, he returned into his Native Country, where he did very much good by Preaching.

At the time of the commotion in Devonshire for Religion, he was appointed to go down as Chaplain with the Lord Russell, who was sent to suppress the same; and after the work was over, for his excellent Learning and godly Life he was made Bishop of Exeter, being consecrated thereunto at Lambeth, by Thomas Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury Anno Christi 1559.

He most worthily performed that Office that was committed to him. He Preached constantly every Sabbath and Holy-Day, and most commonly twice in the week he read a Divinity Lecture in one Church or other within the City of Exeter. Considering his Means, he was a great lover of Hospitality, and kept a very good House. He was sober and temperate in his Diet, holy and blameless in his Life, friendly to the Godly, liberal to the Poor, courteous to all Men, void of Pride, full of Humility, abhorring Covetousness, and an Enemy to all wickedness and wicked Men, whose society he shunned, and whom he would in no wise entertain or keep in his House or Company. His Wife was a most sober, chaste, and godly Matron: His household another Church in which was exercised all Godliness and Vertue. He suffered no one Person to abide in his House, who could not give an Account of his Faith and Religion, and who lived not accordingly.

And as he was very carefull to promote Religion in his Diocess, so was he as ready to give direction for good Government in all Ecclesiasticall affairs: And because himself was not skillfull therein, he neither would be hindered from his godly studies, nor encumbered with worldly matters, and yet judging it meet that the Government should be carried on with all uprightness, Justice and Equity, he sent to Oxford for a learned man to be his Chancellour, and by the assistance of his Friends, he obtained Mr Robert Weston Doctor of the Civil Law (and afterwards Lord Chancellour in Ireland) unto whose fidelity he committed his Consistory, and the whole charge of his Ecclesiasticall Jurisdiction, allowing him, not only all the Fees belonging thereto, but also lodged, and found him, his Wife, and Family, horse and man within his own House, and gave him a pension of 40. l. per annum besides, which was a very great matter in those daies; so liberal was this good Bishop in the allowance which he made to this good Chancellor. And surely the Bishop was no more godly and carefull in performing his Office of preaching, than his Chancellor was diligent, strict and just in doing his Office without the reproach of partiality or bribery. Yet notwithstanding that this godly Bishop lived most holily, painfully, and virtuously, the common people (whose old bottles were not capable of new wine) could not brook nor digest him; and when they could find no other cause, this was judged a crime sufficient, that he was a Preacher of the Gospel, an enemy to Popistry, and an honest married Man. Hereupon many devices were set on foot for his disgrace, and removing him out of his place; sometimes by flie and false informations against him, sometimes by open railing and false Libels; sometimes by secret backbitings; yea at last, their malice proceeded so far, that they practised his death by Poysoning; but by Gods good Providence the Snakes were broken, and he was delivered.

Having thus continued Bishop about three years, it pleased God to take away that famous English Josiah, King Edward: and his sister Mary succeeding him, the Face of Religion was soon altered, and this good Bishop amongst others was deprived, and clapt up in Prison: And though the Malice of the then Prelates and Arch-Papists against him was very great, who also had sworn his Death, yet it pleased God most miraculously to preserve and deliver Him out of their Hands, which was effected by this means.

The good King Christian of Denmark, having formerly known him at his being in Germany, wrote divers times, and sued so earnestly and effectually to Queen Mary for him, that at last he was dismissed out of Prison, and suffered to go over into Denmark. There he stayed a while, and afterwards, with the leave of the King, went into Germany to his former worthy Friend the Noble Elector of the Rhine, who most willingly received Him, and restored him to his former Benefice of Bursfelde. The reason why he staid no longer with his deliverer the King of Denmark, but chose rather to go into the Palatine

The Life of Doctor Sands Arch-bishop of York. Anno Christi 1588.

The Duke of Northumberland was first with the Queen, as we have heard before, Edward the sixth dying, and the Lady Jane being proclaimed Queen, at which time that blessed King commenced Doctor, he was made Vice-Chancellor of that University, at which time that blessed King Master of Kingsbury Hall in Cambridge, and having the Country and University, that he was chosen up in Learning, he so profited therein, both in Family about the Year 1526, and being then born of an Ancient and Worthy

Edwin Sands was born of an Ancient and Worthy Family about the Year 1528. and being trained up in Learning, he so profited therein, both in the Countrey and University, that he was chosen Master of Katharine Hall in Cambridge, and having Commenced Doctor, he was made Vice-Chancellor of that University; at which time that blessed King Edward the sixth dying, and the Lady Jane Grey being proclaimed Queen, as we have heard before, the Duke of Northumberland was sent with an Army to apprehend the Lady Mary. And when he came to Cambridge he sent for Dr. Sands the then Vice-Chancellor, and some other Doctors, to sup with him; and at supper required Dr. Sands to Preach on the Morrow. The warning was short for such an occasion and Auditory, yet he refused it not, but went home and so to bed: The next Morning he arose at three a Clock, and having prayed a good while, rose up, took his Bible in his Hand, and closing his Eyes, earnestly prayed to God that it might fall open at a fit Text for the present Occasion, and accordingly it opened, and the first Text that he cast his Eye upon was Joshua 1. 16, 17, 18. And they answered swered Joshua, saying, All that thou commandest us we will do, and whithersoever thou sendest us we will go; according as we hearkened to Moses in all things, so will we hearken unto thee; only the Lord thy God be with thee, as he was with Moses. Whosoever he be that daubeth Rebel against thy Commandment, and will not hearken to thy Words in all that thou commandest him, he shall be put to Death, only be strong and of a good courage.

This Text he Prosecuted with such Prudence and Affection, as drew many Tears from the Eyes of his Auditors. After Sermon the Duke and other Nobles desired him to Print his Sermon, and he only required a day and an half time for the writing of it, at the end whereof he delivered it to M. Leaver, who was presently to carry it to London to the Press. But just at that instant came one of the Beadles to him Weeping, and had him shute for himself, for, said he, the Duke is retired, and Queen Mary is Proclaimed. Dr. Sands was nothing troubled herewith, but delivered his Sermon to Mr. Leaver, and so went to Dinner to Mr. Meeres, one of the Beadles, his great Friend. At dinner, being of an undaunted Courage, and cheerful Disposition, he was very merry, Mistress Moore drinking to him said, Mr. Vice-chancellor, I drink to you, this being the last time, that ever I shall see you: which accordingly proved true.

A Prediction.

That Night the Duke sent for him to joyn with him in Proclaiming Queen Mary, and then told him that the Queen was Merciful, and that he hoped for a general Pardon, to which Dr. Sands answered, my Life is not dear unto me, neither have I done or said any thing that troubleth my Conscience. For what I spake of the State, I have instructions signed by sixteen Counsellors to warrant me therein, neither can speeches be Treason, nor yet have I spoken any thing but what the Word of God and the Lawes of the Land will bear me out in, therefore the will of the Lord be done. But he yon assured, my Lord, you shall never escape Death, for if the Queen should spare you, they that now shall Rule, will kill you.

That Night the Duke was apprehended, and some were as busie about Dr. Sands, but Sir John Gates that lay in the Doctors house, drave them away. The next day Doctor Sands was walked into the Fields, when the University in an irregular manner meeting together, ordered Doctor Mause and Doctor Hatchet to go to Doctor Sands his House, to fetch away the University Statutes, the Keyes, and such other things as were in his custody, which accordingly they did, and Doctor Mause, who the day before was an earnest Protestant, was turned now a zealous Papist, and a great Enemy to Dr. Sands, from whom he had received great Curtesies.

Dr. Mause's inconstancy and ingratitude.

That afternoon a Congregation was appointed by them, and the Bell rang to it, when Doctor Sands, coming out of the Fields, sent for the Beadles, asking what the matter meant, requiring them to wait upon him to the Schools according to their Duty, which they did, and Dr. Sands took the Chair.

Mr. Mitch and a rabble of unlearned Papists seeing this, withdrew, and conspired amongst themselves to pull him out of the Chair. In the mean time Doctor Sands began his Oration, expostulating with the University about their dealings, and charging them with great ingratitude towards him, affirming that he had said nothing in his Sermon, but what he was ready to justify, and that if he were faulty, they were as deeply guilty in concealing, and consenting to that which he had spoken. In the midst of his Speech in came Mitch with his associates, some laid hands on him to pull him out of the Chair, telling him it was not his place, others called him Traitor, &c. Doctor Sands seeing that they used Violence, being of a great Courage, felt for his Dagger to have dispatched some of them, as Gods Enemies, but Doctor Bell and Doctor Ellis prayed him for Gods sake to hold his hands, and Patiently to bear the great wrong, to which he assented, and so the tumult ending, ending, he went on, and finished his Oration, and having some Money of the Universities in his hand, he delivered it up, together with all other things belonging to the University, and then resigned his Office, praying to God to substitute a better in his room, and to give them better and more thankfull hearts, and so he repaired to his own Colledge.

His Courage.

On the morrow came to him Mr. Germingham and Mr. Thomas Mildmay; Mr. Germingham told him that it was the Queen's pleasure that by two of the Guard he should be conveyed to the Tower, together with the Duke; Mr. Mildmay told him that he wondered that so learned a man as he, should speak so unadvisedly against so good a Prince. Dr. Sands answered, I shall not be ashamed of Bonds, but if I could do as Mr. Mildmay can, I need not to fear them: For, you came down in armes against the Queen, and now you are in arms for her; I cannot thus blow hot and cold with one mouth.

Meekness.

Presently Dr. Sands his Stable was robbed of four excellent Geldings, and an Inventory was taken of all his goods, and he was set upon a lame Jade that halted to the ground; whereupon a friend of his desired that he might lend him a Nagg to ride upon. As he went out at the end of the Town some Papists assembled to jeer, and some of his Friends to mourn for him. He was carried through London in scorn, and as he entred in at Bishopsgate a base Woman threw a stone at him, and hit him so full on the Breast that he was near falling from his Horse. To whom he mildly said; Woman, I pray God forgive thee. As he went through Tower-street, a woman in her door said to him, Eye on thee thou Knave, thou Knave, thou Traitor, thou Heretic. At this he smiled, whereupon she said; Look, the desperate Heretic laughs at it. Another woman on the other side of the street, said, Fie neighbour, thou art not worthy to be called a woman, railing thus upon this Gentleman whom thou knowest not, nor yet the cause why he is thus used: and turning to the Doctor, she said, Good Gentleman, God be thy comfort, and give thee strength to stand in Gods Cause even to the death: and thus he was carried Prisoner to the Tower, where the Yeoman of the Guard took from him his borrowed Nagg, and whatsoever else he had: and whereas his man brought some linen after him, that also was taken from him.

He is imprisoned in the Tower.

The first three weeks he was in a very bad prison, at the end whereof he was removed to another, where was put to him Master John Bradford.

Flight refused.

On the day of the Queens Coronation his prison door was left open, and there came to him one Mr. Mitchell, a special friend of his, and said, Doctor Sands, there is such a stir in the Tower that neither gates, doors, nor Prisoners are looked after this day; therefore take my Cloak, Hat and Rapier, and get you gon, save your self and let me do as I may. The Doctor refused his offer, saying, I know no just cause of my imprisonment, and if I should do this I should make my self guilty, I will expect Gods good will; yet am I much bound to you for your love. Mr. Mitchell not prevailing departed.

A Jailor
Converted.

Dr. Sands and Mr. Bradford continued in Prison twenty nine weeks, one Bowler, a perverse Papist being their Keeper: yet by their affable and loving carriage and converse, he began to mislike Papery, and to favour the Gospel; yea he was so far at last wrought upon, that on a Sabbath when others went to Masse, he carried up to them a Service-Book, a mancher and some wine; at which time Dr. Sands administered the Sacrament to Mr. Bradford and him, and so Bowler became their son begotten in their bonds.

When Wyat was up in Arms, that room might be made for him and his in the Tower, Dr. Cranmer, Dr. Ridley, and Mr. Bradford were put into one prison; and Dr. Sands with nine other godly Ministers were removed to the Marshalsey.

As they went, the people every where prayed God to comfort them, and to to strengthen them in his truth, whereupon the Keeper of the Marshalse said to Doctor Sands, I perceive that the vain people would set you forward to the fire, but I hope you will not prefer your own knowledge before the judgement of so many worthy and learned Prelates; if so, you shall find me as strait a Keeper as one that utterly mislikes your Religion. Doctor Sands answered, I know my self young, and my Learning small, its enough to know Christ crucified; and he hath learned nothing that sees not the great blasphemy that is in Popery. I have read in Scripture of some godly and courteous Keepers, God may make you one; if not, I trust he will give me strength and patience to bear your hard dealing with me. The Keeper replied, Do you then intende to stand to your Religion? Yea, said the Doctor, by Gods Grace I do. Truly, said the Keeper, I love you the better for it, I did but try you before, and what favour I can shew you, you shall be sure of it, and I shall think my self happy if I may die at the stake with you, and ever after he shewed the Doctor much favour, suffering him to walk into the fields alone, where sometimes he met with Mr. Bradford, who being removed to the Kings Bench, found the like favour with his Keeper. He also lodged him in the best Chamber, and would not suffer irons to be put on him, as other Prisoners had, and suffered his Wife, a beautifull Gentlewoman, both in body and soul, to resort to him. He lodged also Mr. Sanders with him.

His Name was Thomas Wyat.

To these two holy men there was much resort, and much Money was proffered to them, but they would receive none. Three or four times they celebrated the Sacrament, and had many Communicants, at which times Doctor Sands gave such exhortations as drew many teares from his Auditors, and wrought in them an utter abhorrency of the Mass and all Popery.

When Sir Thomas Wyat with his Army came into Southwarke, he sent to Doctor Sands in prison, desiring his company and advice, telling him that the prison doors should be set open for him and the other Prisoners: Dr. Sands had the Messengers tell him, that if his rising were of God he should stand, otherwise he should fall: and that for his own part he was committed by order, and that he would never depart thence except he were discharged by the like order. The like answer made Mr. Sanders, and the other godly Ministers that were prisoners there.

Sr. Tho. Wyat as professed him his liberty.

His prudent Answer.

Doctor Sands having thus lain there nine weeks, at last by the mediation of Sir Thomas Holcroft, then Knight Marshall, he was set at liberty. The manner of it was thus: Sir Thomas Holcroft made great suit to the Bishop of Winchester in the behalf of Dr. Sands, yet could get no grant from him, except he would turn to their Religion, which if he would do, he should have great preferment; yet at last by importunity he extorted from him, that if the Queen would grant him his liberty he would not oppose it. Then did Sir Thomas, by two Ladies of Honour, prevail with the Queen; that he should have his liberty if Winchester liked of it: Sir Thomas having this grant, watched the Bishops next going to the Queen, and then again moving the business, he at last prevailed with them, and gat a Warrant signed by them for his deliverance; yet Winchester afterwards commanded him not to release him, till two Gentlemen should give a thousand pound bond for him not to depart the Kingdom without License. Sir Thomas seeing this, procured two Gentlemen to be willing thus to be bound with him; and then sending for Dr. Sands he imparted all the business to him; to whom Dr. Sands said, Give God thanks who hath moved your heart to be so carefull of me; I think my self much bound to you for your love, which God will requite, and I will never prove ingratefull. But I came a free man into Prison, so I will not go out a bond-man; for all cannot benefit my friends, so neither will I hurt them; and if I be set at liberty I will not stay six dayes in the Realm, if I can get out. Therefore if I may not go free, send me back to prison, where you shall be sure of me. Sir Thomas Holcroft was much troubled at this answer, yet seeing that Doctor Sands imposble in his Resolution, he said to him, Since I cannot change you, I will change my own Mind, and am resolved to set you at Liberty, come of it what-ever will come, therefore get you gone quickly over-sea, and never write any thing back hither, for so you may undo me, and so friendly kissing him, he bad him farewell, and commanded his Keeper to take no Fees of him.

He is again sought for.

Doctor Sands returning to the Marshalsey carried all night, and on the morrow gave his Prison-fellows a dinner; bad his bed-fellow, and sworn stake-fellow, if it had so pleased God [Master Sanders] farewell, they kissing each other with many Teares. Then went he to the Kings-Bench to Master Bradford, and Mr. Ferrar, comforting them, and they praising God for his happy Deliverance; and so he went into London to a private Friend, and the next Night changed his Lodging, hearing that search was made after him. For Doctor Wasson and Christopherson went to the Bishop of Winchester, and told him that he had set at liberty the greatest Heretick in England, and one who had most corrupted the University; whereupon the Bishop sent for all the Constables in London, commanding them to make diligent search for him, and promising five pound to him that could apprehend Him.

A special providence.

Doctor Sands suspecting the matter, shifted from place to place, and appointed his man to provide him two Geldings, purposing the next day to go into Essex to his Father-in-Law Master Sands, with whom his Wife was. But that night having a pair of Hofs to long for him, which were made without measure whilst he was Prisoner in the Tower, he then lodging in Cornbil, requested the good Wife of the House to send them to the next Taylor to be cut shorter; and it so fell out, by Gods Providence, that the next Taylor was a Protestant, and the man that made them; He knowing the Hofs, went at midnight to the Doctors Lodging, and being admitted into his Chamber, wished him not to be troubled at their unseasonable coming in: To which he answered, Nothing can be amiss, what God will, that shall come to pass: Then the Taylor told him of the Bishops sending for the Constables, whereof he was one, and of their hopes to find him; for, saith he, it's known, that you have provided Geldings, and that to morrow you are to go through Algate, where you will certainly be taken: Therefore let your man walk booted and spurr'd to morrow neer where your Horses stand; and in the mean time they shall be conveyed privately to Bednal-Green, and at a fit season I will come and convey you thither also: as you go along the Streets look wildly, and if you meet your Brother in the Mouth, know him not, &c.

Accordingly Doctor Sands attired like a Gentleman, and looking wildly, went with the Taylor the next day, who conveyed him through back-lanes to Moor-Gate, and from thence to Bednal-Green; where having his Horses ready, he kissed the honest Taylor, and would have given him the greatest part of that little which he had, which yet he would not receive, and so with Teares they parted. Yet afterwards Doctor Sands required him thankfully. That Night he rode to his Father-in-Law, and within two hours after his coming, his Father was informed that that Night two of the Guard would seek to apprehend him there; whereupon he was presently conveyed to an honest Farmers House neer the Sea-side, where he was locked up two days and two nights in a Chamber all alone, and then removed to one Mower, a Master of a Ships House at Milton shore, attending a Wind for his departure: And while he was there, Mower brought forty or fifty Mariners to him, to whom he gave such an Exhortation, that they being taken with it, resolved all of them to die rather than he should be apprehended. The sixth the wind served, and he took his leave of his Host and Hostess, who had been married eight years, and had no Child; and when he took took his leave of the Woman, he thanked her kindly for his entertainment, and gave her his Handkerchief with an old Royal of Gold in it, saying, Ere A Prophecy a year be past, be of good comfort, God will give you a Son, and accordingly it came to pass; for when there lacked but one day of a twelvemonth, she was brought to bed of a fair Son.

Doctor Sands, and Doctor Coxe were both in the same Ship, and ere it was out of ken, two of the Guard were upon the Shore to have apprehended Doctor Sands: But God gave them a good passage; so that they arrived safely at Antwerp, and were invited to dinner to Master Licks house: And as they were at dinner Master George Gilpin, Secretary to the English house, came to them, and whispering to Doctor Sands, said, King Philip hath sent to make search for you, and to apprehend you: Hereupon he immediately rose from dinner, and though it Rained very fast, yet he went out at the Gate that leads towards Cleveland, where meeting with a Wagon, he hasted away, and came safely to Ausburg in Cleveland, where he tarried fourteen daies, and then travelled to Strasbourg. And when he had continued there one year, his Wife came to him. There he fell sick of a great Flux, which held him nine Moneths, and brought him to death's door: He had a Child also that fell sick of the Plague, and died. His godly, and virtuous Wife also fell sick of a Consumption; and died in his Armes.

Whil'st he remained there, he was chiefly Maintained by one Master Isaac, an English Gentleman of Kent, and one that suffered Exile for the same cause of Christ: He so entirely loved him, that he was always more ready to give, than Doctor Sands was ready to receive, so that he gave him above a hundred Marks, which Doctor Sands afterwards thankfully repayed again.

After the death of his Wife, he travelled to Zurich in Switzerland, and there So-journed in the House of Peter Martyr for five weeks space, at the end whereof as they sate at Dinner, News was brought them of Queen Maries Death, and Doctor Sands, by his Friends, was sent for back to Strasbourg. This News occasioned joy to all but Doctor Sands, who was stricken to the heart to think that he was called back to new Sorrows.

Master Bullinger, and the other Ministers Feasted him before his departure from Zurich, and so he returned back to Strasbourg, where he preached, and in the company of Master Grindal, he came for England, arriving at London upon the Coronation-Day of Queen Elizabeth.

By her, for his singular Piety and Learning, he was advanced to the Bishoprick of Worcester, Anno Christi 1559. and afterwards, he was removed to the Bishoprick of London, Anno Christi 1570. And lastly, he succeeded Doctor Grindal in the Arch-bishoprick of Tork, Anno Christi 1576. In all which places he governed the Church with singular Prudence, and modesty; and having finished his Course on Earth, he went to receive his Crown in Heaven, August the eighth, Anno Christi 1588. being about the Age of sixty, and lies Buried in the Collegiate Church of Southwell in Nottinghamshire.

He was a man of whom it is hard to say, whether he were more famous for his admirable vertues, or great learning, as his Sermons yet extant in Print do manifest. He left many children of which three were Knights, excellently qualified both in mind, and body, especially Sir Edwin Sands, who deserved so well of his Country.

about the year, 1591.*

He was Fellow in Pembroke-Hall.

His remove to Dry-Drayton.

His extraordinary Pains.

His hard Studies.

His Charity.

Can yet learn nothing Concerning the Countrey, Parentage, or first Education Mr. Richard Greenham. The first place, where I find him, was in Pembroke-Hall in Cambridge, where he followed his Studies so hard, and was so eminent for his proficiency in learning, that he was chosen Fellow in that Society, and after a while he was called to a Pastoral charge at Dry-Drayton, not far from Cambridge, and like a faithfull Minister of Jesus Christ, he spared no paines amongst his people, whereby he might advance the good of their souls.

His constant course was to preach twice on the Lords day, and before the evening Sermon to Catechize the young people of the Parish. His manner also was to preach on Mondays, Tuesdays, and Wednesdays, and on Thursdays to catechize the youth, and again on Frydays to preach to his people; and that on these week dayes, the people might have the better opportunity to attend upon his Ministry, his course was to be in the Pulpit in the morning so soon as he could well see. He was so earnest, and took such extraordinary pains in his preaching, that his shirt would usually be as wet with sweating, as if it had been drenched in water, so that he was forced, so soon as he came out of the Pulpit, to shift himself, and this wonderfull and excessive paines he took all his time. Twice a day he prayed in his Family, and after Sermon he used to call his servants together, and examined them of what they heard, and what they remembred. And besides all these his publike labours, he studied very hard, rising every day both Winter and Summer, at four of the clock in the morning.

He was very eminent for his charity to the Poor; whereof we have this notable Example: In a time of scarcity, when Barley was at ten groats the Bushell, (which in those daies was an extraordinary price) he by his Prudence brought it to pass, that the poor had it sold to them for four groats the Bushell of every Husband-man in the Town; and thus he effected it.

There were about twenty Plough-holders in the Town, all which he by his holy perswasions drew to an agreement amongst themselves, to hire a common Granary, and therein to lay up Corn for the poor, some more, some lesse, every man accordingly to his ability; so that some laid up one Coom, some a quarter, some three Cooms, and Master Greenham himself laid in five Cooms, all which was delivered out to the poor at a groat a peck. There was one day in the week appointed for all the poor to come and be served, at which time every one received according to their charge; where there were but two in a Family, they received one peck a week, and so more according to that proportion; only no one Family had above three pecks a week.

He kept but two Beasts himself, that the poor might have his straw, and when other men sold their straw for two Shillings the dayes thresh, he sold his for ten pence: So that in that dear time all the poor in the Parish had been well neer famished, had it not been for his prudence, and liberality which he also continued, till the price of Corn abated, which was suddainly, and extraordinarily; For that Corn which was sold for a noble the Bushell, was within one moneth after sold for fourteene pence the Bushell.

But during the fore-mentioned dearth, by publike Order, the Bushells were cut and made lesse; This Master Greenham Preached much against, and Publickly reprov'd wheresoever he came, and withall gave his man a charge, that if the Clerk of the Market sent for his Bushell to cut it, he should not carry it in, which was done accordingly, for which he came into some trouble, but the Lord delivered him out of the same. Also at this time though his Bushell was bigger then other mens, yet he would often charge his man not to strike off all the Corn. He used not to trouble himself with reckonings and accounts, but would sometimes ask his man when he came from the Market, how he sold Corn? and if it was dear, he would say, of pray God bring down the price of it; and if it was Cheap, he would heartily blasse God for it. Yea, his Charity was not onely extended to the poor of his own Parish, but to others also, for if at any time he had seen a poor body at a distance from him as he rode abroad, he would send his man with money to him; and when at any time he rode by the Castle at Cambridge, the Prisoners would never ask him for any thing, nor any one that was with him, for if he had any money in his Purse, they were sure to have part of it. By reason of his great Liberality, though his living was worth a hundred pound per Annum, yet he usually wanted Money to get in his Harvest, so that his Wife (formerly Doctor Bounes Widow) was forced to borrow money to supply that want: Yet was he so well content with his present Condition, that though he had proffers of livings worth three of that which he had, yet would he by no meanes be perswaded to accept of them.

He was a great Friend to, and promoter of Peace and Concord amongst his Neighbours and Acquaintance, insomuch that if any had come to him who were at Variance, he would either have made them friends themselves, or if he could not prevail, he would have made use of other Friends to reconcile them together, thereby to prevent their going to Law.

A great Peace-maker.

When Martin Mar Prelate came first out, Master Greenham being to preach at St. Maries in Cambridge, spake freely against that Book, manifesting himself like of the same. For (said he) the tendency of this Book is to make ridiculous, whereas it ought to be made odious.

He disliked Martin Mar-Pre-late.

On a time the Bishop of Ely sent for him, to appear about his Nonconformity: At which time the Bishop told him that there was a great Schisme in the Church, asking him where the blame was to be laid, whether upon the Conformists, or Non-conformists. To which he readily answered, that it might lie on either side, or on neither side. For (said he) if they loved one another as they ought, and would do all good Offices each for other, thereby maintaining Love and Concord, it lay on neither side. The Bishop was so pleased with this answer, that he dismissed him in Peace.

He is contented before the Bishop. His prudence.

He was much troubled with a bad Concoction, whereby he had frequent sick Nights, which kept him much waking, but then his manner was (as much as possibly he could) to spend the time in Meditation and Prayer.

He is distressed.

We have before heard of his great Charity to mens Bodies. His Charity to Souls was not less exemplary. For having great Experience, and an excellent Faculty to relieve and comfort distressed Consciences, he was sought to, far and near, by such as groined under spiritual Afflictions and Temptations.

His Piety.

His skill in curing spiritual dif-
eases.

Temptations: all whom he entertained friendly and familiarly, without respecting the person of the rich more than of the poor.

Yea the fame of this spiritual Physician so spread abroad, that he was sent for to very many, and the Lord was pleased so farre to blesse his labours, that by his knowledge and experience many were restored to joy and comfort, out of unspeakable and insupportable terrours and torments of conscience. If the Lord had not so soon translated him out of this sinfull and miserable world, there was none more fit, nor willing to have prescribed Rules, and a Method to be observed in this so little a known Art. Of his good will herein, let his own words testifie the forward desires of his heart: For upon a special occasion he thus speaketh of himself; I have had (saith he) for a long time a settled resolution, (which I hope is from God) to study the cases of Conscience, that thereby I may be the better able to succour the tempted and perplexed in spirit.

He was filled with bowels of compassion towards the afflicted, sympathizing, as if he had been afflicted with them.

Many godly and learned friends of his, perceiving his abilities and inclinations thereto, did labour much to excite and encourage him in those studies, upon these and the like grounds. First, that he might hereby the better train up some young men in the like studies, communicating his knowledge and experiences to them therein. Secondly, that he might leave to posterity a Commentary of such particular Maladies as God had made him instrumental in the cure of, together with the meanes by him used for effecting of the same. And because Precepts are wanting, Rules of direction might be framed, partly by his own observation, partly by conference with other learned and experienced persons, whereby in that, and the age following, that Art might be brought into some form and method, to the publick good and benefit of many, not only for the fruitfull curing, but also for the healthfull preventing of manifold mischief.

To such as complained to him that they were troubled with blasphemous thoughts, his counsell was, that they should not fear them, but abhorre them. And when some Poor Christians were miserably afflicted with feares, that they had committed that unpardonable sinne against the holy Ghost, he used to tell them, that if they would not have committed it, it was certain that they had not fallen into it.

The graces of Gods Spirit did all abundantly shine forth in this man of God: all tempered, as with unfeigned love to Christ, so with bowels of love and compassion towards men, and he again was greatly beloved of all men.

In the whole course of his Ministry, he was very carefull ever to avoid (as much as was Possible) all occasions of offence, desiring in all things to approve himself as a Minister of Christ, and Work-man that needed not to be ashamed.

He much reioyced in, and Praised God for the happy government of Queen Elizabeth, and for the blessed calm and peace which the Church and People of God enjoyed under the same, speaking often of it, both publicly and privately, as he had occasion, endeavouring to stirre up the hearts of all men (as much as in him lay) to Praise God with him for it, and to pray also for the continuance thereof. Yea this matter so affected him, that the day before his departure out of this world, his thoughts were much troubled, for that most men were so unthankfull for those wonderfull and happy deliverances, which the Lord of his mercy vouchsafed to that glorious Queen, from the conspiracies and dangerous practices of her Papish Adversaries.

He was a special Instrument and meanes under God to encourage, and train up many godly and learned young men in the holy service of Christ, in the work of the Ministry, and to restrain, and reduce not a few from errors and schisme; striving by all meanes to retain them in obedience to the

Lawes

Lawes of the land, and to Provoke them highly to Prize, and preciously to esteem the peace of the Church, and People of God.

Having continued at Dry-Drayton about the space of twenty, or one and twenty years, he left it, and went from thence to London, about the year 1588, or 89. Yet was very carefull before his remove, to get an honest and able man to succeed him in that place.

His remove to London.

The Causes of his Removal, were, partly the untractableness and untractableness of that people amongst whom he had taken such exceeding great paines. For besides his publick Preaching and Catechizing, his manner was to walk out into the Fields, and to confer with his Neighbours as they were at Plough: And partly he did it upon supposal that he might do far more good in a more publick place by comforting afflicted Consciences, wherein the Lord had given him such an admirable dexterity.

He wholly spent himself in the Service of God and his Church, and therefore often made use of that saying of the Prophet David: The Zeal of thy House hath eaten me up.

He was a little Man of Stature, and usually indifferent well in Health, but when at any time he was sick, he would suffer no body to sit up and Watch with him, that so he might more freely converse with God.

He continued not in London above the space of two years, but being quite worn out, he comfortably and quietly resigned up his Spirit unto God, An. Christi 1591. and about the sixtieth year of his Age.

His Death.

He hath a Volume of Sermons, and Treatises of Divinity in Print.

The Life of Master Thomas Cartwright

The

Thomas Cartwright was born in Northampton about the year 1535. And being by his Parents kept at school till he was fit for the University, he went to Cambridge and was admitted into Saint Peter's Colledge, June 1550. He there followed his studies exceeding hard, and being a man of excellent natural parts, he excelled in Learning more than ordinary. He never used to sleep above five hours in a night, which custom he continued to his dying day.

His Birth.

His Study.

Three years after at the death of King Edward the sixth, he left the University, and betook himself to the service of a Counsellor, yet followed his studies very hard, as taking more pleasure therein than in the study of the Law. This he continued till the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign, at which time his Master meeting with Doctor Pilkington, Master of Saint John's Colledge in Cambridge, he told him of his man's Learning and famous disposition. The Doctor desired to speak with him, and thereby perceiving his great abilities and hopefulness, with his Masters consent he took him again to Saint John's Colledge, where his piety and proficiency and Progress both in the Arts and Theology, was so eminent, that June 1560. He was chosen Fellow in that Colledge, and about three years after he was removed to a Fellowship in Trinity Colledge.

He is a Lawyer's Clerk.

*The Life of Master Thomas Cartwright, who dyed
Anno Christi 1603.*

His Birth. Thomas Cartwright was born in Herfordshire, about the year 1535.

And being by his Parents kept at School till he was fit for the University, He went to Cambridge and was admitted into Saint Johns Colledge, Anno 1550. He there followed his Studies exceeding hard, and being a man of excellent natural parts, he profited in Learning more than ordinary; He never used to sleep above five houres in a night, which custom he continued to his dying day.

He is a

Three years after at the death of King Edward the sixth, he left the University, and betook himself to the service of a Counsellor, yet followed his studies very hard, as taking more pleasures therein, than in the study of the Law; Thus he continued till the beginning of Queen Elizabeth Reign, at which time his Master meeting with Doctor Pilkinton, Master of Saint Johns Colledge in Cambridge, he told him of his mans Learning and studious disposition; The Doctor desired to speak with him, and thereby perceiving his great abilities, and hopefullnesse, with his Masters consent he took him again to Saint Johns Colledge, where his proficiency and Progresse both in the Arts and Tongues, was so eminent, that Anno 1560. He was chosen Fellow in that Colledge, and about three years after he was removed to a fellowship in Trinity Colledge, where

His return

where for his great worth, he was ere-long made one of the eight Senior fellows.

Anno 1564. Queen Elizabeth coming to Cambridge, great Preparation was made for her Entertainment, and four of the eminentest men in the University, being chosen to keep a Philosophy Act before her, he was one of them, who performed it with extraordinary abilities, to the great content and satisfaction both of the Queen and his other Studitors. Anno 1567. He commenced Batchelor of Divinity, and three years after he was chosen to be the Lady Margaret Divinity-Reader. He read upon the first and second Chapters of the Acts of the Apostles, and performed it with such acuteness of wit, and solidity of judgment, as caused admiration in his hearers: and even at that time he was so famous for his Ministry, that when his turn came to Preach at Saint Maries, the Sextone was faine to take down the Windows, by reason of the multitudes that came to hear him.

His Disputation before the Queen.

He is chosen Professor.

His multitude of hearers.

In his Lectures he was occasioned to discover his judgment about Church-Discipline, which the Doctors and Heads in the University took very haينously, as being dangerous and destructive to the present Hierarchy, whereupon he was convented before the Vice-Chancellor, Doctor May, and other Doctors, and examined upon sundry Articles, or propositions of Doctrine delivered by him publickly in his Lectures, and elsewhere, which they affirmed to be contrary to the Religion received, and allowed by publick authority in this Realm, and thereupon they demanded whether he would stand to, or revoke the said Opinions and Doctrines delivered by him.

He is questioned before the Vice-Chancellor.

Master Cartwright upon deliberation, desired that he might have leave to set down in writing what his judgement in those things was and what he would stand to, which being granted, he drew up in six Propositions what his judgement was, and setting his hand to it, delivered it to the Vice-Chancellor, who thereupon admonished him to revoke the same, and upon his refusal, punished him by the subtraction of his stipend, and so he continued in his Lecture that year.

But the year after, Doctor Whigfitt being chosen Vice-Chancellor, he again convented him before him, requiring his absolute answer whether he did mind to teach his Auditors otherwise, revoking that he had before taught; or whether he would abide in the maintenance of the same? Unto this Mr. Cartwright answered, that for the Propositions delivered by him under his hand to Doctor May, and now shewed to him, they were his own hand-writing, such as he had openly taught, and still continued fully determined to maintain and defend as Truths. Hereupon after Master Cartwright had a while withdrawn, and the Vice-Chancellor had conferred with the other Doctors, Master Cartwright was again called for, and this definitive sentence was pronounced against him by the Vice-Chancellor, Doctor Whigfitt, that perceiving that no admonition would help, but that he still persisted in the same mind, he did therefore pronounce him, the said Master Cartwright, to be removed from his said Lecture; and by his final decree or sentence, did then and there remove him, and declare the said Lecture to be void, and that he minded, according to the foundation thereof, to proceed to the Election of a new Reader. And further he did then and there, by Vertue of his Office, inhibit the said Master Cartwright from preaching within the University and the Jurisdiction of the same.

He is expelled the University.

Now that the Reader may be better satisfied what the Articles were which Master Cartwright drew up, and signed with his hand, and for which this sentence was passed upon him, I shall here set them down in his own words, as I have them transcribed out of the Original, standing upon Record in the Registry of the University of Cambridge.

The Articles for which he was expelled.

1. Archiepiscoporum, & Archidiaconorum nomina simul cum muneribus, & officiis sunt abolenda.
2. Legitimorum in Ecclesia Ministrorum nomina, qualia sunt Episcoporum, & Diaconorum separata a suis muneribus in verbo Dei descriptis, simpliciter sunt improbanda, & ad institutionem Apostolicam revocanda: ut Episcopus in verbo, & precibus, Diaconus in pauperibus curandis versetur.
3. Episcoporum Cancellariis, aut Archidiaconorum Officialibus, &c. regimen Ecclesia non est committendum, sed ad idoneum ministrum, & Presbyterum ejusdem Ecclesie deferendum.
4. Non oportet Ministrum esse vagum, & liberum, sed quisque debet certo cuidam gregi additi.
5. Nemo debet ministerium tanquam candidatus petere.
6. Episcoporum tantum autoritate, & potestate, ministri non sunt creandi: multo minus in Museo, aut loco quopiam clanculario: sed ab Ecclesia electio fieri debet.

Hisce reformatis, quisque pro sua vocatione studere debet (vocationem autem intelligo) ut magistratus Authoritatis, minister verbo, omnes precibus promoveant.

Per me Thomam Cartwright.

His travels beyond Sea.

Bezas' testimony of him.

He is Preacher to the English Merchants.

Master Cartwright being thus driven from the University, not long after, finding the way for the Exercise of his Ministry in England obstructed, he went beyond the Seas to visit other Reformed Churches, where he grew acquainted with the famous men for Piety and Learning in Christendome, with whom he kept Correspondence all his life after. He was also highly prized by them, insomuch as Beza writing about that time into England to a Friend of his, hath this Expression; Est quidam Anglus nobiscum, nomine Thomas Cartwright, &c. Here is now with us your Countrey-man, Thomas Cartwright, then whom I think the Sun doth not see a more Learned Man, &c.

He was also chosen Preacher to the English Merchants at Antwerp, and afterwards at Middleborough, where he did very much good by his Ministry, the Lord blessing his labours exceedingly in those parts; and when he understood that the Merchants, by whom he was maintained, through their great Losses decayed in their Estates, he returned his Salary to them again.

He is chosen to answer Dr. Whitgift.

His imprisonment.

His contempt of the World.

Not long after he came over into England, being earnestly solicited thereunto by Letters from Master Dearing, Master Fulk, Master Wiburne, Master Leaver, and Master Fox; about which time the Non-Conformists having drawn up an Admonition to the Parliament for the Reformation of the Church, Doctor Whitgift, who was then preferred to the Arch-Bishoprick of Canterbury, answered the same in Print; whereupon the Ministers which wrote the Admonition, consulting, but not agreeing upon the choice of one to reply to Doctor Whitgift, Master Cartwright was at last chosen by lot to undertake it, and performed it so well, that his very Adversaries were heard to advance and commend him for it.

Yet was he with divers other of the Non-Conformists brought into the High Commission Court, where, for refusal of the Oath ex officio, they were clapt up in Prison, and afterwards proceeded against in the Star-Chamber; But it pleased God so to order it by his Providence, that those very Witnesses which were brought to accuse them, did so clear them, that they were dismissed, and sent home much more honoured and beloved than they were before.

Whilst Master Cartwright was Prisoner in the Fleet, he had thirty pounds sent him from a Noble Friend, of which he took but ten shillings, returning the rest with many thanks to the Donor; and when the Earl of Leicester of offered him the Provostship of Eaton-Colledge, saying, That it was a hundred pounds a year more than enough, besides the conveniency of the place; Master Cartwright answered, That the hundred pounds more than enough was enough for him.

His favour with the Earl of Leicester.

About the year 1580. his Fame was so spread through the Reformed Churches, that King James, then King of Scotland, sent for him, professing to make him Professor in the University of Saint Andrews: whereof twenty years after, upon King James his coming into England, Master Cartwright makes mention in his Epistle before his Commentary upon Ecclesiastes, which he dedicated to King James, returning humble thanks for that Royal favour. The Arch-Bishop of Dublin also sent for him into Ireland, proffering him preferment in that Kingdom.

King James sends for him into Scotland.

He was sent to from divers eminent Divines beyond the Seas, wherein they craved his advice for the direction of young men in the method of their studies, as also in the behalf of the Churches in general, for his counsel in regulating their proceeding in the weightiest affairs.

He is sent to for counsel.

Also about the same time the Earl of Leicester preferred him to be Master of his Hospital at Warwick, which place was worth to him about one hundred pounds per annum: His employment was to pray with the Poor men twice a day, to catechise twice a week, and to preach once on the Lords-day at the Parish Church: This place he willingly and thankfully accepted of, because he was therein exempted from the Jurisdiction of the Prelates.

He is made Master of the Hospital at Warwick.

His carriage and deportment was such, that there was not a Nobleman or Gentleman of quality in all the Country that looked Heaven-ward, or was of any account for Religion and Learning, but they sought to enjoy his company, and found much pleasure and content therein; for his conversation was such, that scarce a word came from his mouth that was not of some good use and concernment.

His esteem in the Country.

He was of a very laborious and indefatigable spirit; it was his meat and drink to be doing the Will of his heavenly Father, so that besides all his paines in Writing, and in the Hospital, he preached every Sabbath-day in the morning, about seven a clock in the lower Parish of Warwick, and, when he could be suffered, in the upper Parish in the afternoon; Besides which he preached a Lecture on Saturdays in the afternoon in the upper Church, in which he went over a great part of the Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes with singular judgment and profit; and this he did of his own free Will without demanding or receiving one penny for his paines. And whereas he was sometimes suspended by the Bishops from preaching in the Churches, his manner was at those times to preach in the Hospital, whither many resorted to hear him, though they were sure to be brought into the Bishops Courts for the same.

His diligence in the Ministry.

Presently after his coming to Warwick, the English Seminary at Rhemes published their Version of the New Testament, and Annotations upon it in English, which coming over into England, it was looked upon by all as a Book of dangerous concernment, and therefore fit to be answered by the ablest pen that could be found; Hereupon (as I have heard) Queen Elizabeth sent to Beza to request him to undertake the answer, but he modestly excused it, and returned answer that she had one in her own Kingdom, far abler then himself to undertake such a task, and upon further enquiry declared that it was Master Thomas Cartwright.

He is importuned to answer the Rhemish Testament.

Then Sir Francis Walsingham, a man of eminent place and power, who herein, as in other affairs was accounted the mouth and hand of the Queen and State, wrote to Master Cartwright, earnestly requesting him to undertake the work, assuring him also of such aid as should further him in the finishing thereof; for which end he sent him one hundred pounds towards the charges of buying Books, and procuring Writers which were to be employed by him therein; This was Anno 1583.

He is solli-

* Church-Discipline.

The same year also he was earnestly solicited by the most learned men of the University of Cambridge by a solemn Epistle, with joynt consent written to him to undertake the answer, wherein amongst other passages they have these expressions; *With you we are earnest (most Reverend Cartwright) that you would set your self against the unhallow'd endeavours of these mischievous men, either by refusing the whole Book, or at least some part thereof. It is not for every man Work-man-like to frame Gods Tabernacle, but for Bazaheel and Aholiab; neither is every one rashly to be thrust forth into the Lords battles; but such Captains are to be chosen from amongst Davids Worthies; Of which, as we acknowledge you to be one by the former battels undergone for the walls of our City, the Church*; we doubt not if you will enter this War (which truly you ought to do according to the Zeal and Picty you bear to your Countrey and Religion) but that you fighting for Conscience and Countrey (yea even for the very inmost holy place of the Temple) will be able to tread underfoot the forces of the Jebusites, which set themselves to assault the Tower of David. Moreover, (which may marvellously sharpen the edge of your courage) you are not now to fight with a Brother, or fellow of the same Religion (which maketh the Conflist more faint) but with the most inveterate enemies of Jesus Christ, &c. Then they thus conclude: You see to what an honourable fight we invite you. Christs business shall be undertaken against Satans Champions. We stir you up to fight the battels of our Lord, where the Victory is certain, which the triumph and applause of the Angels will ensue. Our Prayers shall never be wanting unto you. Christ without doubt, whose cause is defended, will be present with you. The Lord Jesus much increase your courage and strength, and keep you very long in safety for his Churches good. Vale. This was subscribed by Roger Goad, William Whittaker, Thomas Crook, John Ireton, William Fulk, John Field, Nicholas Crane, Giles Seintler, Rich. Gardener, William Clark; &c.*

And by the Ministers of London and Suffolk.

His discouragements
in the work.

The work left imperfect.

into Gernsey.

But besides these, the Reverend Ministers of London, and Suffolk, did by their severall letters earnestly exhort him to this work; and Master Cartwright, was at last by these importunities drawn to undertake it, and neither diligence nor constancy was wanting in him to have carried it on to perfection; but he met with such great discouragements and hinderances from Potent Adversaries, that he was forced often to lay pen aside; yea Arch-Bishop Whitgift sent him a positive command that he should deal no further in it; yet afterwards by an Earl and privy Counsellor of great note, and some other noble Personages, he was at last drawn to take pen in hand again; But receiving new discouragements, and having such continual employment in the Ministry, he lived not to perfect that work.

Whilst he was at Warwick, being silenced by the Bishops, he was requested by the Lord Zouch, Governour of Gernsey, to go with him into that Island, with whom he continued some time, and in the mean space he substituted one Master Lord, a godly and holy Minister, then living at Woolstone, in his room at the Hospital in Warwick, allowing him the greatest part of the profits of the place during his abode there; and the rest he caused to be distributed amongst the poor.

tempt of the World.

He was far from seeking after great places or great things in the world, and for riches he sought them not; yea he rejected many opportunities whereby he might have enriched himself; His usual manner was, when he had good summes of gold sent him, to take only one piece, lest he should seem to slight his Friends kindnesse, and to send back the rest with a thankfull acknowledgement of their love, and his acceptance of it; professing, that for that condition wherein God had set him, he was as well furnished as they for their high and great places.

His

The Life of Master Thomas Cartwright.

His manner was not to keep any more money in his purse, but what might serve for charitable uses; He was very bountifull to poor Schollers, His charity. He distributed money every Sabbath-day amongst the poor of the Town of Warwick, besides what he gave to the prisoners, and upon other occasions both at home and abroad.

For his Household affairs, he never troubled himself with them, but wholly left them to be ordered and managed by the Prudence of his Wife.

He was very carefull to regulate and order the businesses of the Hospital for the best advantage of the poor Brethren. He continued his diligence and assiduity in his studies even in his old age, and his usual manner was to rise at two, three, and four a clock in the morning at the latest, both summer and winter, notwithstanding that his bodily infirmities were such, that he was forced to study continually kneeling upon his knees. His Prudence. His assiduity.

He was of a very meek and quiet spirit, as appears in those conflicts which he had with Doctor Whitgift, and Dr. Sutcliffe, wherein he used sore Words, and hard arguments; He could not endure, so much as in private, to hear his adversaries reproached, and if any in his presence used disgracefull speeches of them, he would sharply reprove them for it, saying, That it's a Christians duty to pray for, and not to reproach his adversaries; and when Martin Mar-Prelates Book came forth, he shewed much dislike of the Satyrical and tart language used therein. His meekness.

He was also very humble, not enduring to hear any thing spoken in his own commendation, or any titles given him, which in the least measure savoured of ambition; He affected not popularity, but avoided it as much as possibly he could. His humility.

Indeed all his ambition was to advance the Kingdom and cause of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to promote Gods glory. It was the great joy and rejoycing of his heart to hear of the welfare and prosperity of the Churches at home and abroad; for this he earnestly and daily prayed; and when he heard any ill tydings, with Nehemiah, he sat down and mourned, and fasted, and prayed before the God of Heaven; so that all that conversed with him, might easily discern that nothing did affect him in any degree, like the good or ill tydings of the Churches state. His sympathy with the Church.

He was frequent in Prayer every day, and in his younger years hath risen many times in the night to seek out private places to pray in. And as his labours were very great in the work of the Ministry, so it pleased the Lord to make them very successfull for the conversion and confirmation of many, and for terour and restraint unto others. His frequency in Prayer. The success of his Ministry.

There was a woollen Draper, in Warwick, who made a Profession of Religion, but many times brake out into scandalous practices; Master Cartwright on a time walking with him in his Garden, dealt plainly and faithfully with him, rebuking him for his miscarriages, and shewing him the dishonour that he brought to God, and the Gospel thereby; This so wrought upon him, that he presently sunk down, and being carried home, died within a few hours after. A remarkable judgment upon a loose Professor.

In his old age, he was much troubled with the stone and gout, which much impaired his strength, yet would he not intermit his labours, but continued preaching when many times he could scarce creep up into the Pulpit. The Sabbath, before his death, which was the last Sermon that he made, December the 25. he preached upon Eccles. 12. 7. Then shall the dust return to the earth, and the spirit shall return to God who gave it. The morning before his death, which was the Tuesday following, he was two hours on his knees in private Prayer: in which (as he told his Wife) he found wonderfull and unutterable joy and comfort; God giving him a glimpse of heaven before he came to it, and within a few houres after he quietly resigned up his spirit unto God, December the 27. Anno Christi, Joy unspeakable.

His Death. 1603. And of his Age sixty eight. Master Dod Preached his Funeral Sermon.

During his abode in the University, he was of great Power and Credit in the Regent-House, so that the Doctors feared lest the Precisians (as they were then called) should choose him Vice-Chancellor, whereupon they procured the alteration of the Statute, whereby the Choice was formerly in the Regent-House; and confined the Election of the Vice-Chancellor to one of those two whom the Heads should prick.

After long discontinuance Master Cartwright coming to Cambridge, was importuned to Preach on a Week day in Saint Maries, where there was a great Confluence of all sorts to hear him; Grave men ran like Boys in the Streets to get places in the Church. After Sermon he dined at Master Chaddertons, and many went to the House to see and hear him speak.

The Life of Master Paul Baines, who dyed Anno Christi 1617.

His Birth,
and Education.

Paul Baines was born in London, and had his Education in his younger Years at Withersfield in Essex, under one Master Cosens, his School-master, from whence, being fitted for it, he was sent to the University of Cambridge, and admitted into Christs-Colledge, where his Conversation at first was so irregular, that his Father, being grieved at it, before his death, being intimately acquainted with one Master Wilson a Sailes-man in Birchin-lane, he left with him forty Pounds by the year,

His Fathers desiring him, that if his Sonne did forsake his evil courses, and become an Prudence. honest man, he would then give him that fourty Pounds per annum, if not, that he would never let him have it.

But it pleased God, not long after his Fathers decease, to shew him his sinnes, and to work effectual Repentance in him for the evil of his waies; so that forsaking his former evil company and practices, he became eminent for Piety and Holiness, and according to that of our Saviour, Much being forgiven him, he loved much. After which gracious change wrought in him by the goodness of God, it was not long before Master Wilson fell dangerously sick, and hearing how God had dealt with Master Baines, he sent for him, and desired him to pray with him, by which as also by his savoury discourse, finding that what he had heard of him rather came short of the truth than exceeded it, according to that trust reposed in him, perceiving himself to be upon his death-bed, he told Master Baines of the fourty Pounds per annum, which his Father left with him, and so faithfully delivered up to him those Writings of the Agreement which had passed betwixt his Father and him; and being like to leave behind him a Wife and two Children, he intreated Master Baines, that as he had faithfully and carefully discharged charged his trust towards him, so when God should take him away hence, that he would have a care of his Wife and Children, and be a Friend to them. And Master Baines, after Master Wilsons death, that he might fully discharge that trust which was reposed in him, and also by way of Gratitude for that Friendship and Fidelity, which he had found in Master Wilson, married his Widdow.

Mr. Baines
tude.

But before this, for his eminency in Learning, he was chosen Fellow in Christs Colledge, where he so much (through Gods blessing on his studies and endeavours) improved his time, and talents, that he became inferior to none for sharpness of Wit, variety of Reading, depth of Judgment, aptness to Teach, Holy and pleasant Language, wise Carriage, heavenly Conversation, and all other fulness of Grace. By his holy Life and Conversation also he did largely Preach to all such as came neer unto him: And for the Heavenly Frame of his Spirit, what it was, his incomparable Writings will sufficiently Demonstrate to all Future Generations.

When Master Perkins, who was Lecturer at Saint Andrews in Cambridge, had there for many years held forth a burning and shining Light, the Sparks whereof did fly abroad into all the Corners of the Kingdom, and after he had served in his Generation, was taken up into Heaven, there was none found so meet to receive, as it were, the Torch out of his Hand, and succeed him in that great Office of bearing it before such a people as Master Baines, upon whom also the Spirit of that Alma was by experience found to be doubled. In which Station he so demeaned himself for some years, that impiety only had cause to complain. But all that favoured the wayes of God, be it saied of Religion, rejoyced, and gloried in him and his Ministry, as in a Spiritual and Heavenly Treasure.

Sometime after Master Baines was silenced, yet preached sometimes where he might have liberty, and as the weakness of his Body would suffer. The rest of his time he spent in Reading, Writing, Meditation, and Prayer, saving that upon occasion, he instructed and comforted those that came to him in private, wherein he had a very happy and heavenly Gift. He was indeed all his Life after pressed with want, nor having (as he often complained to his Friends) a place to rest his Head in. Yet did he never so much con- sult with himself about his denying his sincerity, and complying with the Bi- shops and of whom, and their counsels, he was wont to say, They are a Gene- ration of the Earth, earthly, and favour not the Ways of God.

fulness and piety.
And poverty.

Whilst he lived a private Life, his Wife died, and being Thunder struck by the Bishops bolt, he had time and leasure to apply his able Wit and Judgment, about the discussing of many Questions, which if the Prelates had not forced such leasure upon him, it may be, he would have passed by with others.

He was of such an holy and heavenly Temper, that he was reverenced by all good Men that knew him. His manner was in the Summer-time, to go from one Gentlemans house to another, and happy were they that could get his Company. He had such a Divine and Heavenly Majesty in his Countenance, that it would awe any man to look upon him. Little Re-creation he used, but sometimes to play at Chess.

Once he was called by Bishop Harsnet, to the Councel-Table, the Bi- shop having laid a designe, to suspend and banish him under the pretence of keeping Conventicles, the Reason whereof was this. He was an excellent Casist, and thereupon many doubting Christians repaired to him for satis- faction in cases of Conscience, which the Bishops would needs have to be keeping of Conventicles. When he was accused hereof before the Pri- vy-Councel, one of the Noble-Men said to him, Speak, speak for your self: Whereupon he made such an excellent Speech, that in the midst thereof, a Noble-Man stood up and said, He speaks more like an Angel than

than a Man; and I dare not stay here to have a hand in any Sentence against him; upon which Speech they dismissed him, and he never heard more from them.

His faithfulness and prudence.

Upon a time he went to the House of Mistress Sheafe who was his VVives Sister, at Cranbrook in Kent; were observing that she, and others of the Family used to play much at Cards, and such like Games, as the Custom was, and still is too much used in Gentlemens Houses, he took occasion on the Sabbath Day in his Sermon to speak against such Games: And it pleased the Lord so to work upon Mistress Sheafes Heart by that Sermon, that when she came home, she came crying to him, saying, Oh Brother, Why would you thus suffer me to live in Sin, to the dishonour of God, and would never tell me of it before? To which he replied, that it was best of all that God had wrought on her by the publick Ministry, and that it might not have been so well if he had spoken to her in private.

His Character by Dr. Sibbs.

He was a Man of much Communion with God, and acquaintance with his own Heart, observing the daily passages of his Life, and was much exercised with spiritual Conflicts, whereby he became the more able to Comfort others with the same Consolations which himself had received from God. He had a deep insight into the Mystery of Gods Grace, and Mans Corruption, as appears by his Commentary upon the Epistle to the Ephesians. He was one that sought not after great matters in the VVorld, being taken up with Comforts and Griefes, unto which the VVorld is a Stranger. One that had not all his Learning out of Books: Of a sharp VVitt, and clear Judgement. So that though his Meditations were of an higher Strain than ordinary, yet he had a good dexterity, furthered by his love to do good, in explaining dark points with lightsome Similitudes.

His Prayer in his Family was not usually above a quarter of an hour long, and having Respect to the VVeaakness, and Infirmities of his Servants and Children, he used to dissuade others from tediousness in that Duty.

It pleased God to make him an Instrument of the Conversion of that Holy and eminent Servant of Jesus Christ Doctor Sibbs.

The manner of his Death.

In his last Sicknes he had many Doubts and Feares, and God letting Satan loose upon him, he went out of this VVorld, with far lesse Comfort than many weaker Christians enjoy. He resigned up his Spirit into the hands of God, in Cambridge, Anno Chri. 1617.

THE

The Life and Death of Master William Bradshaw, who dyed
Anno Christi, 1618.

IT hath from time to time been the lot of divers persons of singular VVorth, and eminent Parts, that they have lived in obscurity, and in a low condition, and past their time without that due respect, and regard, which their excellent endowments might justly have claimed; partly through the shortness of our ward supplies; (for, they get not up easily, though never so well deserving, that are scanted in that kind) partly by reason of an inward bashfulness, and over-awing modesty, accompanied with an undervaluing repute of themselves, and their own Abilities; and partly through the iniquity of the Times, wherein they have lived, and the disaffection of those who have swayed most in the State and Government under which they have resided. Such was the condition of that worthy and faithful servant of the Lord, Master William Bradshaw, though a man richly endowed, as well with such spiritual Graces, as in Truth are of highest esteem, being peculiar to Gods Favourites, that have interest in his Christ, as with such Gifts and Parts also, as might, and did render him useful and instrumental for the publick good of Gods People; yet never enjoying any plentiful condition; howsoever never prone to complain of want; nor forward at any time, or in any place to put himself forth, as having ever a very low and mean conceit of his own Parts, and admiring in others, what his own Eye either could not descry, or would not take notice of (howsoever to others conspicuous enough) in himself; and being never suffered to continue long quiet in any settled place of more publick Employment, through the envy and malice of some that had a jealous Eye on him, and the disturbances of him in the work of his Ministry, set on foot by others ill-affected towards him, but accrewing from the same, pursued by some of those, who were of greater Power and Authority in Ecclesiastical affairs, and could not brook any, that did not in all particulars comply with them and their courses; as they conceived him not to do.

He was born at Bosworth, a Market-Town in Leicestershire, famous for the Battell fought near to it, wherein that bloody Usurper, Richard the third lost his Crown, (attained by the unnatural murder of his two Nephews in their Non-Age,) together with his Life. His Father Nicholas Bradshaw, though descended from an ancient Family of the Bradshaws in Lancashire, with the Crest of whose Coat therefore being a Beck-bromzing, this our Brother used to Seal; yet living but in a mean Condition, and being not so well able therefore to Train this his Son up in Learning as he desired, an Uncle that he had at Worcester undertook the Education of him, wether being Master of the Free-school there, as some have supposed, or of some other Profession, as some others conjecture: For that he hath been heard to report, that Master William May, (who was sometime by the Turkey Merchants imployed at Aleppo, and afterward lived and ended his Days in or about London, a Man of more than ordinary Skill in the Learned Languages, and in Exposition of Scripture very accurate and Exact) was Teacher in a publick School at Worcester, while he lived there; relating withal, what a near man he then was, howsoever in his after-dayes he grew Cynically fowle, and by his uncouth deportment and jealous disposition, made himself nothing so useful to others, as otherwise he might have been. But however it was for his Uncles Profession, under him (who by some Relations of his, may not improbably be deemed to have been a Scrivener or public-like Notary) he was brought up and kept at School, until it pleased God to bereave him of this Support by his Death. After whose Decease, returning home to his Father at Bosworth, he was enforced, though very much against his mind and desire, to intermit the prosecution of his Studies in Literature for some space of time.

Gods Providence in

Colledge.

His Diligence in his Studies.

His Father now designing him to some other course of life out of despair of maintaining him in a way so chargeable, as his meanes, being not large, would not reach unto, especially having other Children, three Sons and two Daughters to provide for, besides him. But while the disposal of him hung thus in suspense, it pleased the Lord (who is wont to have a more speciall Providence over those, whom in his secret purpose he hath fore-designed unto the work of his Ministry, to have them fitted for the same) to stir up the spirit of one Master Ainsworth, a man of much worth, then School-Master at Abby de la Zouch in Leicestershire to divert his Parents purpose of disposing him to any other imployment. For by his favour, (having taken notice of his capacity, industry, eager desire of farther progresse in good literature, fitnessse of disposition to be wrought upon to that purpose, and by some buds sprouting out from such seeds thereof as had already been sown in him, conceiving good hopes of such future fruits, as did accordingly ensue) he was taken into the Free-School there; where he so profited, and made so successfull a proceed, that after a years continuance, being then about eighteen years of age, he was deemed sufficiently fitted and furnished for the University; and in the year 1589. was, together with that worthy man of great renown, Joseph Hall, afterwards Bishop of Exeter, then of Norwich; and Hugh Cholmeley, (who had both been trained up in the same Schooll with him, and did continue also afterward a kinde affection to him, and friendly correspondence with him) he was admitted into Emmanuel Colledge in Cambridge; where with them also he followed his studies under the tuition of that reverend Divine Master Gilbie, then Fellow of that Colledge, being there maintained, partly by the allowance of some Gentlemen his fellow-pupils under the same Tutor; and partly by some supplies afforded him from two noble Knights of the honourable house of the Hastings, Sir Edward and Sir Francis, (on the latter of whom his Father also had some dependence) upon the recommendation, and at the motion of that worthy servant of God, now with God, Master Arthur Hildersham who was himself also allied to that Family.

In the Colledge with these supports, he continued, husbanding his time to the best advantage, with an abundant blessing of God upon his sedulous endeavours, to a clear evidence of large improvement, manifesting it self in such schollerly exercises, as his time and place there required (in the performance whereof speciall notice was taken of him, as an acute and eager disputant) untill he had taken both Degrees, first that of Bachelors, and after that of Master of Arts. But then, being not capable of a Fellowship in that Colledge, for that the Statutes of the House admitted not above one of the same Shire, and of that one for Leicester-shire Master Joseph Hall before-mentioned, being of the same time and standing with him, was already possessed; and having refused a Vicarage, endowed with some competent present yearly revenue, by that Noble Knight Sir Edward Hasting out of his Patrons rendered him; not daring yet to adventure on a work of that nature; Master Laurence Chaderton then Master of the Colledge, and the first from the very foundation of it, bearing a singular affection to Master Bradshaw, as well for his parts of learning, as for his pious deportment, but being unable for that cause above mentioned to bring him in there, cast about with himself, how to procure a place, and get some employment for him else where.

Dr. Chaderton's care for him.

Some years before, that right Honourable and thrice Noble Lady Frances Sidney, Countesse of Suffox, had by her last Will and Testament given order for the erecting and endowing of a Colledge in Cambridge, to be furnished with a certain number of Fellows and Scholars under one Master or Head.

Sidney Colledge built.

The Colledge was now in building, by the provision of the Right Honourable the Earl of Kent, and Sir John Harrington, instructed by her for the performance of that work; and Master James Mountague Sonne to Sir Edward Mountague, then living as Fellow-Commoner, but Student in Divinity, among the Fellows of Christs Colledge, was designed for Master. With him dealt Master Chaderton in Master Bradshaw's behalf, To have him set down for a Fellows place there: which through his Mediation was from those Noble Trustees without difficulty obtained. But because some space of time would runne out, ere the building of the Colledge could be consummated and made fit for receipt, it was thought good in the interim, to dispose of Mr. Bradshaw for some employment elsewhere, untill he might be settled there. It fell out (God so disposing it) that Sir Thomas Leighton Governour of Guernsey, wanting one to be employed about the instruction and education of his children, and having requested that worthy servant of Christ Master Carwright, abiding then at Cornet Castle with him, to write unto Master Chaderton, to furnish them with one fit for such a charge; this Letter of Master Carwrights arrived with Master Chaderton in that juncture of time, wherein he and Master Mountague had this businesse in agitation about Master Bradshaw; and the matter being by them broken to him, who referred himself wholly to what they should advise, it was joyntly agreed, that Master Bradshaw should be sene, or sent rather, unto them, to undertake that charge, and continue in the discharge of it, untill the Colledge building were compleated, wherein upon return thence he was then to reside.

Thither therefore without delay, being furnished with Letters of recommendation from those here to them there, he addressed himself; and through Gods goodnesse, arriving safe there, he was with all kinde and courteous entertainment by them received. By this occasion he became thoroughly known to, and inwardly acquainted with Master Carwright, who highly esteemed of him, and renewed, or pursued rather his acquaintance with him, after both Master Bradshaws and his own return also into England, from may appear by entercourse of Letters yet to be seen, written by him to Master Bradshaw, while he stayed behind him in Guernsey, and from Warrick also after his departure from thence; and to his dying day continued expressions of entire affection to him, and due respect of him, as also both before and after his decease, his Children, both Sonne and Daughters, and those that they were matched unto, and his Widow also, did.

His journey into Guernsey.

Mr. Carwrights love to him.

And indeed such was his demeanure, wheresoever he came, that he left behind him a gratefull memory of him, in the hearts and minds of all well affected, that had occasion to take notice of him, not unlike therein to musk or civet, that leave a sweet scent behind them, even for a long time after they be gone, in the Boxes wherein they were formerly kept, the which continued after his departure thence, not amongst the French Ministers alone in that Island, but among such also of the old Garrison Soldiers, on whom

Master Cartwrights Ministry had some efficacious and gracious work; Who, as Sir Peter Osburn, who had afterward the government of that place, hath been heard to relate, would be oft talking of one Master Bradshaw, that had lived sometime there, and speak with much affection of him.

His carriage in his place.

But for his constant carriage during his abode there, his piety, industry, integrity, fidelity in discharge of the trust reposed in him, and charge committed to him, together with his course of life and conversation otherwise unprovable; as also the love and affection to him, earnest desire, if it might have been, of his continuance with them, and loathnesse, to leave him, with these, who were, after some time spent among them there, then, to part with him, all these things will by no meanes better appear, then by the Letters of Master Thomas Cartwright, and the relations concerning him therein contained, being written and directed to divers in these parts, either neer upon, or at Master Bradshaws departure from thence.

Among others, in one to Sir Francis Hastings of September the fifth 1598, wherein he assures him of his diligence in following his studies, and of his sharp and ready capacity, likely through Gods blessing to bring forth such fruit of Learning, as he might have good cause to rejoyce over any cast that he had been at with him, or should farther bestow that way on him; as also, of his love to the best things, and his conversation in the Family without reproach, for ought he could learn, having had an eye constantly on him. In another to Master Chaderton of December the fifth, (the time, it seems of his departure thence) wherein he thankfully acknowledgeth the great benefit they had received by Master Bradshaw, procured by him to take so long and painfull a journey to them, and his wife and loving care in so good provision for them; returning thanks also to him, from Sir Thomas Leyghon the Governour, and his Honourable Lady for him; and withall requesting him, that they may once again taste of his accustomed love and care in that kind.

And in another yet more fully of the same date to Master Mountague in these words; The Law commandeth, that of things borrowed great care should be had for the well usnage and due restoring of them: Both which we have endeavoured in Master Bradshaw: But the full performance must rest rather in yours and his acceptation, then in pay. For as touching the former of them, his desert of care to profit those committed to his charge, and his Behaviour otherwise in the house, hath been more then every one is able to esteem, and therefore in all respects not so fit to reward. For the other, (unless unwilling parting with him on all hands be against duty) you shall (we hope in the Lord) have him duly restored; Out of all doubt with all thankfulness to your Worship, by whose kindness, both we have enjoyed him some good time, since you of right might have taken him away, and he hath received a supply of recompence for that we were not able to make good unto him. And so with hearty thanks and commendations from the Governour and his Honourable Lady, and my humble thanks for your love, and this fruit I have received thereof by Master Bradshaw, I commend you to the gracious keeping and blessing of God in Jesus Christ. Unto this Letter Master Mountague now Master of the Colledge, upon Master Bradshaws access thither, returneth answer, both thanking him, for the remitting of him to them; (so that on no side thanks for him were wanting, so well was he esteemed of on either part) and withall advertising him of a very great danger, and no lesse deliverance, that neer unto his journeys end had be-tided him.

His gracious deliverance in his return.

Whereunto Master Cartwright in a Letter of March 7 the same year thus replieth; Sir, It cometh from the abundance of your love, to thank me for that which duty it self required at my hands towards Master Bradshaw, and therefore the thanks are returned unto you, who esteem so highly of duty, as to let it go in the account of a Benefit or good turn. My hope is the same with yours, knows, that the Lord, who by deliverance of him from so great a death, bind the him to a stricter obedience, hath set such an impression of it in his mind, as will be in stead of a watch to waken him every morning to all cheerfull services, which his place will require. And indeed the Letter he wrote of that matter, carrieth that sound, and even undertakes so much in his behalf. And in one to Master Bradshaw himself, after receipt of that from him, touched upon in the close foregoing; That the Lord our most mercifull Father delivered you from so great a death, it pledges unto you deliverance hereafter, especially if they be inferiour to this. So much the rather, as the swimmer sunk like a piece of lead, and he that could no more swim then the Iron-head of the Scholars hatchet, was graciously borne up: And therefore by how much the Proverb is true: in die periculi erigetur, by so much we have cause to praise God, that by the Angel of the waters saved you: And withall you may help to encourage others against the excessive fear of drowning in passing the Seas: seeing it was more safe to you to passe the winter Seas, even when they rage most, then the small brook of Hawston Mills. I remembered you to Sir Thomas and my Lady; who told me, that if any entertainment would have holden you, they would not have suffered you to have gone from them; and rejoiced much at your gracious escape. Subscribed, Your assured loving Brother and Friend, Thomas Cartwright.

The Escape in those Letters mentioned was this: Master Bradshaw being to leave Guernsey, shipped himself for England. Nor was his passage by Sea wholly free from hazard, for with so violent a storm were they surprized at Sea, that the Passengers most of them expected nothing but wrack, and a Gentlewoman among them, with another, whom she much affected attending upon her, did in a cord, by the waste, fasten themselves either to other, that they might perish together, and draw their last breath, or breath it out rather, in the mutuall embraces either of others. But that storm being allayed, and the danger of it over, and the Ship with her Passengers now arrived in safety, Master Bradshaw having attained London, did there hire a Hackney, such as are commonly used on that Road, to convey him to Cambridge, there to enter upon the Fellowship prepared for him, and assigned unto him, by help of which Beast, he got so far on his way in safety, that he was now within three miles of his journey's end. But danger oft lieth in wait for us, when we least of all either expect or suspect it; and then many times overtaken, and surprizeth us unawares, when we deem our selves wholly past danger, and are near approaching our intended, much afraid, and now fully expected Port, and have alwaies need therefore both of an eye of Providence constantly on us, and of an hand of Protection continually over us.

For being there to passe a small Brook crossing the road near to a Village called Hawston, and the Water-mills seated on it, thence Hawston Mills; he that had escaped so eminent that apparent a danger at Sea, lighten on, and fell into that unexpectedly, and proved much more hazardous on land, where no experience was of ought in that kind: For being unacquainted with the course of the stream, otherwise passed ordinarily, and that daily without danger, and having not scized a compass far enough, as he ought to have done, the Beast that bare him plunged suddenly into the Mill-pond, or pit; and being not able to recover himself therein perished; and there left him floating in a strong veriginous current, unskillfull in swimming, (nor had any skill in likelihood been available in such case to have saved him) and altogether unable to shift for himself: where he must of necessity have perished, had not some way with the Beast, had not either some one occasionally stopping at the Mill, or some Passenger on the way, espying one floating in that manner, and at the very pitch of perishing, called hastily on the Mill-men, those next at hand to let slip down the Flood-gates, by means whereof the strong current of the water-course was stayed, and this Saved of God.

Gods special Providence over him.

A Miracle of mercy

God, though not without much difficulty, rescued out of the water, and delivered unexpectedly out of that his, in a manner, even desperate distresse.

And it may indeed justly be deemed a wonder of wonders, (in regard whereof that venerable Minister of Christ before-mentioned, seems to have apprehended the ministry of an Angel used in it) that he was not suddenly in an instant, either swallowed up in that whirling gulf, or hurried away with the violent course of the current, and that he should bear up and keep above water, so long in a place of that nature. For he hath been heard to relate, that while he continued thus floating and struggling with that wheeling surface, it troubled him not a little, that he could not address himself as he desired to prepare for his departure, though having nothing but death in his eye, while his ear was taken up with the voice of some talking in the Mill, from whom he supposed yet some help might come, though neither was he able to call unto them, nor they to hear him.

Thus even Gods Children themselves find a defect oft in themselves, that they cannot with such an exact composure of spirit, in times of distress address themselves unto God, untill he have pulled away all outward prosperity, as well hopes, as helps from them. But being by a special providence of God thus recovered: and as another Moses drawn out of the water, and brought into the Millers house, he was there shifted, and put into such dry apparell, as the Miller himself used to wear, in which Gale when some of his Acquaintance found him, who upon Tydings of this occurrent, came posting over to him from Cambridge, they could not forbear smiling to see him sitting in that Habit, though not a little affected with the casualty occasioning it, and no less heartily gladned for the gracious Issue that God had pleased to afford it, and expressing much thankfulness for his Mercy and goodness therein manifested. The Lord it may seem would hereby fit this his Servant reserved to other hot and hazardous services, unto a farther and firmer dependance in and under them upon him.

But thus his Horse lost, (which to the Carrier its owner, as by his default miscarrying, requiring it, was made good) being after his Escape and recovery somewhat revived and refreshed, and fitted again with a wonted Sult, he was with some of those his acquaintance accompaied to Cambridge, and repaired to the Colledge; where having presented himself to the Master, he was entertained in the Chamber of one of the Fellows, that assigned him, being not yet fit to receive him, (as indeed they came all to very raw Chambers at first) and the use of that offered him, untill his own could be fitted and furnished for him: which being his first entertainment there, albeit but a sorry courtesie to speak of, yet did so affect him, as upon occasion, to some of his familiar friends he afterward professed, (of so ingenuous and gratefull a disposition he was, and so prone with thankfulness to acknowledge, and to set an high rate on the least kindness shewed him, or meanest Office done for him) that it laid the ground-work, or first stone thereof at least with him, for such an Union of inward and entire affection, and well fastned knot of unreserved familiarity and strictest friendship, as did afterward ensue between them two, and so continued, not only while they abode in the Colledge together, by a mutual communication of their Studies, Counsels, Courses, and purposes either to other; but even after also, when through distance of abode they were severed the one from the other, by a constant course of Vicissitudinary writing, therein advising either with other, and discussing mutually such questions and doubts, wherewith either of them were occasionally encountered; by means whereof they received much help and light either from other, and albeit in some particulars either not so clear, or not so cleared to their joynt apprehensions, their judgement might, and did sometime differ, (which having on occasion professed to a Friend, desiring to know their joynt joynt judgment in a case then questioned, and seeming to marvell that they two should be of divers minds in ought, he made answer, that it was no wonder at all, it might rather be wondered, considering mans condition in intellectualls, so impaired and clouded, that any two seriously set upon the search of truth, should not in many particular cases dissent, yea that if in every particularity they should wholly concur, it might seeme to savour rather of a cunningly contrived compact or conspiracy, than a reall and rational consent, yet whereby force of argument they seemed convict, or any mistake manifested, they were ready to yeeld, and did indeed in not a few things, come home either to other, unto their mutual much advantage, nor did their remaining differences ever produce any breach, or abatement of affection between them, but that the knot once knit, from the first to the last, continued firm and inviolate, never loosed nor slackned, so long as God was pleased to lengthen out the line of his life.

His Humility.

His inviolable friendship.

In the Colledge he so demeaned himself, that though the Fellows were not all of one mind, or one way, and there were among them (as usually in Societies of that nature) men of divers dispositions, and sub-divisions consequently of companies, consisting of such as more familiarly consorted, and more inwardly conversed with some few, whom, Selected from the rest, they most affected, yet so loving and lowly, yeelding to all, and complying with all, was his carriage, that notwithstanding he wese by some deemed over-strict, and would freely as occasion was, speak his mind, and deliver his judgment, yet he retained ever the professed, at least, good liking, and external kind usage from them all: Where it will not be amisse to relate a speech of one of them, (a man by occasion of some discontents strongly and strangely possessed with a spirit of jealousy and suspiciousnes of every one, even his inwardest and entirest friends, which in the end proved his overthrow) who having entertained a conceit, that something spoken by Master Bradshaw in a dispute should have a glance closely at somewhat that concerned him, and having discovered that his suspicion to a common bosome Friend of them both, (by whom also upon disclofe of that groundless conceit, he was evidently convinced of his errour therein) he used these words of him, Although I am sure, he had a gird at me, yet the man is of so kind and loving a disposition, that I could not be angry with him, though he had broken my head. But I cannot let passe one remarkable Instance that may evidently manifest in him a due temper (which is not over-frequently found) of freedom of spirit, and discrete demeanure, wisely mixed, and well consistent the one with the other.

His prudent and winning Carriage.

During his abode in Guernsey, a Question was on foot, among Divines, of special note, on either side yet in debate, concerning the lawfulness of some pecuniary contracts, wherein Master Cartwright having by writing declared his mind, in way of answer to some arguments objected against it: Master Bradshaw being required by him freely to discover his judgement therein, and seriously to consider of that his answer, albeit of himself he would not have adventured to undertake such a task, yet being so put upon it, he did it freely and largely, with as much strength of wit and argument, (it may not without ground be deemed) as any have done, that have hitherto dealt on that subject, and yet so discreetly and respectfully managing the business, that though being then of a contrary judgement, he used his best forces, and strongest endeavours to shake and shatter Master Cartwrights grounds, yet did it not breed any breach, between them, nor did it (that could be discerned) lessen Master Cartwrights either affection to him, or esteem of him, which from time to time, as occasion was, and as in part hath already been shewed, he was ever ready to expresse. Howbeit it must withall for a truth be acknowledged, that Master Bradshaw, howsoever in the Colledge performing a

The occasion of his first trouble.

While he stayed in the Colledge, that he might with more freedome employ that talent that the Lord had committed unto him, he entred into the Ministry; the rather advised (as some other also were) so to do, while admission was yet more easie, and the way of entrance lesse obstructed, in regard of some things, which out of diversity of judgement, and tenderness of conscience he take stuck at; then was by prudent men, observing how State-busineses began to be carried, deemed like to last long. And at the motion of one Master Pigot, a religious Gentleman residing at Abington about eight miles from Cambridge, he rode weekly over thither, there to preach every Lords-Day for some good space of time; joyning also in a weekly Lecture, as he had opportunity, with some other neighbour Ministers, at a greater Town called Basingborn not farre thence distant. Afterward he was drawn over to Steeple Morden in the same shire, by one Master Martin, an ingenuous Gentleman, who enjoying the appropriation, entertained him as a Lecturer, in regard of the infirmity of the party that was possessed of the Vicarage.

But while he was thus taken up with employments abroad, there arose a storm against him at home, and that upon this occasion. About that time two Lecestershire Ministers of his acquaintance, Master Darrel and Master Moore, being questioned about the dispossession of William Somers and Thomas Darling, (besides some others) supposed to be by evil spirits possessed; the one of them, to wit, Darling stood stiffely in avowing the truth of the thing, and refused to acknowledge any deceit or collusion therein; yea though many flights were used to enduce him thereunto, and Letters forged and tendered to him in Master Darrells name, as beginning to grow somewhat suspicious of the businesse, yet nothing could prevail with him; But the other, to wit, Somers, being in like manner dealt with, and enticed by large Promises of such provision to be made for him, that he should be sure not to want, nor should need to go down into his Countrey again, was perwaded to accuse Master Darrell to have set him on work, and taught him how to act sundry strange feats and gestures, whereby he might be deemed to be a Demoniak.

Whereupon some of the Bishops, London especially, in whose house the boyes had been kept apart, eagerly pursuing the business, the two Ministers were cited into the High Commission Court, and there being charged with imposture, were suspended and imprisoned untill further cognizance, and Master Hafnet [Londons Chaplain] mean while set on work to pen and publish a virulent Pamphlet against Master Darrell, traducing him therein as a Grand Impostour and Fugler, and the whole action about the possession and dispossession of William Somers, as a meer Puppet-play. Hence Master Darrell thus traduced, was enforced to write and publish something for the defence of himself, and clearing of his guiltlesness herein; and so did first in a briefer Narrative concerning the manner of their proceedings with him, entituled his Triall; and afterward in a larger Answer to Hafnet, in way of farther Apology for himself. Of these Books some Copies being sent down to Cambridge, were directed to Master Bradshaw, and a parcell of them by him delivered to one Underwood a Taylor, who dispersed of them as well in the Colledge as in the Town. Intimation hereof being given to Bishop Bancraft at London, that such Books were in divers hands at Cambridge, he writes to the Vice-chancellor to make diligent enquiry after the dispersers of them. He lights on Underwood, whom upon examination, confessing that he had received a certain number of them from Master Bradshaw, he bindeth him in a bond to appear upon warning before the High Commission, and chargeth him withall not to give notice of ought to Master Bradshaw.

The next morning by seven of the Clock Letters came from the Vice-Chancellor to the Master of the Colledge, requiring him at eight of the clock to repair unto him, and to bring Master Bradshaw with him. About the same time that these Letters came to the Master, an unknown scholar repairing to Mr. Bradshaws Chamber, telleth him, that Underwood was in trouble, and he should do well to look to himself. Master Bradshaw upon these tydings thus brought him, went presently to Mr. Wright the Senior Fellow of the house, to ask advice of him what to do in this case: He wished him to withdraw himself, and withall, directed him to Gransden, a Town about Nine Miles distant from Cambridge, as a fit place of retire, where one Master Castle, a Gentleman well affected, and Master Wrights Brother-in-Law, he well knew, would be right willing to receive him. But Master Bradshaw resolved first to have an assay made by some other, whereby it might be discovered, what the Masters mind herein was. Hereupon Master Ward was sent for, who being requested to break the matter to the Master, was right-willing and ready to undertake that Office. The Master meanwhile upon receipt of the Vice-chancellours Letter, had sent his man presently to enquire for Master Bradshaw at Master Gatakers Chamber, which in his absence then discontinuing, he had the charge of; and kept most in, being more convenient than his own; He not finding him there, was returned back, just as Master Ward came in to the Master: Who upon his repair to him, having but named Master Bradshaw, the Master, before he could deliver any part of his errand, demandeth of him where Master Bradshaw was, and saith he must speak with him. Master Ward told him, It was not safe for Master Bradshaw to come to him, because he was in danger of the Vice-Chancellor. The Master replied, That therefore he must come, for that he had Letters from the Vicechancellor to bring him presently to him. Which Letters while he stept into his closet to fetch, that he might shew them to him, Master Ward, a fast and true-hearted friend, more carefull of Master Bradshaws safety, than fearfull of the Masters displeasure, and his own danger, stayed not the Masters return, but slippt away with all speed to acquaint Mr. Bradshaw how things stood. The Master at his return missing Master Ward, was exceedingly enraged against him, and threatned to punish him, by setting a deep fine for example upon him. But the hour being now elapsed, which the Vicechancellor had set, the Master wrote back to him, that Master Bradshaw could not as yet be found. Master Bradshaw hereof advertised, albeit that all his friends there, were earnest with him to withdraw, yet for the present refused, and requested Master Wright to repair to the Master, that by him he might understand from him, what his resolute will was, which he purposed not to withstand.

A special Providence.

Master Wright, according to his request, repairing to the Master, found him in much heat: no nay he would have, but Master Bradshaw must needs go, it would else endanger him, and endanger the Colledge, &c. Master Bradshaw informed hereof by Master Wright, not at all fearing to suffer in a good and just cause, as hee deemed it to be, and no less loath to have any other endamaged, or endangered for him, (notwithstanding that his friends were all utterly against it) without farther dispute or delay, went presently to the Master, and presented himself to him; who entertaining him with hot and high terms, the good man answered him in a calm and meek manner, that he had no cause to be so much offended with him, or incensed against him; he knew not of any such Commission that he had, when he sent at first to him, but sent only to him for counsell in that case, deeming it better for him to do it by some other rather than by himself; and being loath to come into trouble in those turbulent times: (for the Earl of Essex his business was then on foot) and that so soon as he understood his pleasure, he readily condescended thereunto. The Master thereupon charged him by the authority of his place, to bring him all Master Darrels Books, that he had in his hands, and to go presently with him unto the Vicechancellor; which without farther reply he yeilded unto. But while he was gone to fetch the Books, the Vicechancellor sent his servant to the Master, desiring him to come to himself; and the Master, his man to Master Bradshaw, charging him to stay within untill he returned.

He withdraws from the Colledge.

At his return Master Bradshaw of his own accord repaired to him; who then charged him, at twelve of the clock to repair to his Chamber, that he might take his Answer, and a Bond for his forth-coming. But Doctor Barwell, Master of Christs Colledge, in the mean space coming to him, (whether about that business or upon some other occasion is uncertain) by his advice (it seems) the Master altered his mind; and in likelihood the rather, after much mutual consultation, and better consideration past between them, because both the Masters had themselves bought of the Books: For he sends for Master Wright, and now tells him, that it would be the best course for Master Bradshaw to go out of the way: which accordingly he did. The Bishop of London not long after wrote again to the Vicechancellor to imprison Underwood, and to make farther inquiry after Master Bradshaw, concerning whom, the Master being by the Vicechancellor demanded; made answer, that he was not in the Colledge: whereunto he replied, that it was best so for him, not willing (as may be deemed) to be used as an instrument in molesting him, if it might be avoided. The carriage of this business, together with the several overtures and circumstances of it, is out of a Narrative of his own, the more particularly related, to shew both the discreet and modest, and yet ingenuous and courageous disposition of this Servant of God; and the remarkable passages of Gods providence in a concurrence of occurrences so unexpectedly managed, that he should thereby be kept out of the clutches of those that were so exceeding thirsty to seize on him, and so fiercely bent against him.

His Letter to a Friend
about it.

Master Bradshaw being thereof informed by some Friends, and considering how the Bishop persisted in enquiry after him, conceived that Cambridge for the present could be no safe or quiet place for him: and having therefore withdrawn himself, though retaining his place still there, he spent his time for the space of some moneths, partly with Master Pigot at Abington, and partly at Morden with Master Martine, in which places he had formerly exercised his Ministry, and as occasion required, so still did. Thus there hovering, in a Letter to a speciall Friend, whose good opinion of him he much valued, he thus writes; I fear it will be somewhat offensive unto you, and that you will condemne me for being too rash and indiscreet in this matter. But I trust you will consider that the thing I have done, was to pleasure most good and Christian Friends; that the cause, it is the cause of God, and the glory of God hath been much increased by it, by reason of the truth of God shining therein; unto which I could not perform a less duty; there being nothing in the Books (as I am perswaded) against the State; howsoever there are many hot words, that might have been spared, though none that have not been deserved. I wish they had past my poor censure before the coming forth of them, they should not then have given so much advantage to the enemies of the truth. I will (God willing) flee the danger as much as I can, especially in these troublesome and tragicall times, which seem of purpose to be chosen, that they might do the more injury, and the speech may be the less. And in another to the same party; My danger for Master Darrel troubleth me not a whit, I thank God; neither do I repent of any thing I have therein done, so long as you think never the worse of me: other matters trouble my mind more, yet such is the goodness of God, that though they distract my mind from other studies needfull for me to wade into, yet when I come to exercise my poor Ministry, and to study for my Sermons, my mind is free enough. Thus is the Lord wont in more special manner to support the spirits of his servants, for such particular impleyments, as he hath more specially assigned them unto.

The

The matter that more troubled him, was concerning his entrance into any settled place for the exercise of his Ministry, which he supposed would be, and upon some triall indeed found, every way so obstructed, that, albeit places of employment enough were offered, and his imploment in them much desired, yet he could not conceive how it might be cleared in regard of the tenderness of his Conscience, and scruple of some things that he stuck at, which were like to be tendred unto him, and pressed upon him, before admission thereunto; and that the rather in probability in regard of the prejudice now had of him for the business concerning those Books. For he had been offered the Rectory of Abington by Master Pigot the Patron, who would have compounded with the present Incumbent for the bringing of him in: And Master Wendy likewise, a Religious Gentleman in those parts, had, together with some others, been endeavouring to bring him in at Basingborn: but neither of them took effect. He was invited also to New-Castle in Staffordshire, whither also he repaired, but found not matters to his liking there: and after unto Tarmonth, to be Lecturer with them, with assurance of a liberal maintenance from them; for they very much affected him. But that their design was crossed by the Bishop of the Diocese, having a jealous Eye as well on them as on him, and being desirous to prefer and place a Chaplain of his own therefore there, To the Colledge he returned again after some time spent abroad, the storm seeming now to be over-blown, and howsoever there he met with no renewed molestation about the fore-mentioned business, yet had ye no heart at all there to continue, partly in regard of the departure thence of a special Friend, whom he intirely affected, of whose return thither, being now elsewhere settled, he was wholly out of hope; and partly because he perceived, that the Master did not then so affect him, as formerly he had done.

His return to the Col-
ledge.

Amidst these distractions, a Preachers place falling vacant at Chatham in Kent, where a great part of the Navy-Royal, and Officers of the same attending, did usually reside, the business of supplying them with an able and faithful Teacher was by general consent referred to Master Chaderton, being at that time in Kent not far from thence, thither drawn over from Cambridge, about the consummating of a Marriage between that Reverend man of God Master Fosias Nichols, who had passed many sharp Bickerings and Brunts in those times, and the relief of that famous Worthy Doctor Whitaker Deceased. He commended Master Bradshaw to them. Concerning whom the piously affected Party, after diligent inquiry, received such ample Testimony, that (whereas divers others made first for the place, and by their labouring with some Friends had wrought a siding among them, to prevent such Obstructions as thence might arise) they sent an express to Cambridge on purpose with instructions, in the first place to Master Chaderton, to entreat him, that he would not any wise give consent to have any other designed to the place, but him only whom he had already propounded: For that they rested in his Choise; and longed much to see and hear him. And in the next place to Master Bradshaw, to request him, that he would make no doubt or delay of coming to them; wherein he would not be slack, if he knew how earnestly they longed to see and enjoy him; and wishal to signifie to him, what had been delivered to Master Chaderton from them; that they desired only the Sincere Milk of God's Word, and a Pastor bearing a sincere Affection and tender Heart to his People: That they had wrought great meanes to obtain him, that if he refused to come to them, he did not know what he did; and if he came, and found them not worthy of him, yet his labour and charge should be fully made good. Thus being importuned, (as by his own Letter to a Friend of July the eighth 1601. appeareth) though by some still pressed for Abington, with hopes suggested of clearing the way there for him; he came up to London and after advice had with some Friends in the City, from thence went down to Chatham. And though it go for a common by-word, oft verified, that personal presence abateth much of foregoing Reports, and great Expectations preconceived, are wont seldome to receive full satisfaction; and if it be true that Master Bradshaw was not a man of much out-side, nor forward to put out himself, of a very bashful and demiss, but not fawning deportment; insomuch that his bodily and personal presence might (as the Apostles sometime,) seem weak, and not to promise much, with such especially, as look no further than the Face: Yet when he came and was heard, and his meek and discreet carriage by the generality observed, and by the wiser sort well weighed, he was by joynt consent agreed upon, and a solemn Letter of invitation appointed to be drawn up by Master John Cook, sometime Fellow of Trinity Colledge, then enjoying an Office under Sir Fulk Grivel, Treasurer to the Navy, and afterward Secretary of State to King James, subscribed by the Officers there belonging to the Navy, and the most of any Note and Repute in the place, intimating their Election of him by joynt consent to the place, professing a willingness to submit themselves to his Ministry, and promising to afford him all due support and assistance in the same. Upon the receipt hereof he fully now Resolved without farther Delay, to entertain the call, and accept of the place, and having signified so much unto them, was very lovingly received by them, and quietly for some good space of time (to wit, from July 1601. unto April 1602.) laboured in the Word and Doctrine among them, (together with Master John Philips, who enjoying the Vicarage did, as Pastor of the place, therein joyn with him) with good success and much comfort, and to the great contentment and gladfomness of People well affected in those parts. Being thus then settled there, with good hope of continuance, motion was made to him by some of his Friends there (supposing that might be some means of further Engagement of him for to stay with them, of a match with a Widow, an housewisely Woman, and one that had lived always in good Repute with them. Which not fore-seeing in likelihood, what would afterward ensue, he did, not unwillingly, so far forth hearken unto, as to entertain some good liking of the Woman; howsoever in regard of the ensuing change of things, the business was no farther then proceeded in, but by mutual agreement between them laid aside, and delayed, untill God should see good to make way by some meanes, for their more convenient coming together, and comfortable Cohabitation of either with other.

His faithfulness in his place.

A motion of marriage made to him.

Satans malice against the progress of the Gospel. He is accused to the Bishop.

For those Halcyon Seasons lasted not long; The common Adversary of God and Man, who out of his inveterate Envy and Enmity, can in no wife Brook the Propagation of the Gospel, and dilatation of Christs Curtains, began, at first more covertly and under hand to contrive some course whereby to cast a rub in his way, and to procure a restraint of his farther proceeding in a course so succesfull, and advantagious for the glory of God and the good of his people. For about the time above mentioned, some neighbour-Ministers, envying the recourse of people to his teaching, began secretly to plot against him, though they would not be seen in it, by suggesting to the Bishop of the Diocess, that he was a man not conformable to the Rites of the Church, nor well-affected to the present Government. This how far forth it prevailed with the Bishop that then sat there, doth not appear; but the business being smelt out, and by some means discovered, to prevent trouble from him, and settle Master Bradshaw (as they supposed) more surely in the place, it was by divers of his people and Friends there deemed most expedient, (though therein peradventure much mistaken) to have some means used to obtain a Confirmation of him therein from the Archbishop of Canterbury, unto whom Rochester was as Suffragan, and no man being deemed fitter to deal in this business with the Archbishop than that Noble and Religious Knight Sir Francis Hastings, he he was by a Letter from Master Bradshaw requested to make some tryal of his interest in, and power with Archbishop Whisgift, to that purpose in his behalf. He upon the receipt of Master Bradshaws Letter, the very same day, April 22. 1602. returned him this most kind, Christian, and affectionate Answer, My love to your self you know, and shall ever know it in any thing, wherein I can make it known: my duty, your duty, and all our duties to God, his Church, you know better than my self; and my duty to further a good people to a good Minister, a longing people to hear, to a labouring speaking Minister to teach them, is a bond of duty, that I may never forget, and a work of duty, that I must ever be ready to perform. Assure your self therefore, my velle shall not be slack; and if my posse can prevail, I shall be glad, I will say no more: but pray to my God to encrease his graces in you, to teach profitably; to encrease grace in your people, to hear diligently; and to multiply his graces both in speaker and hearer, that they may speak and hear fruitfully, &c. Subscribed, Your true Christian Friend, Francis Hastings.

Nor was he more ready to promise, then forward to perform, For within three daies after, to wit, April 25. he wrote to the Archbishop this modest, pious, and zealous Letter: May it please your Grace to pardon me, that I do not personally attend you, but presume to write: --- I make bold to become suitor to your Grace, for your favour to a young man, being one that I hold my self interested in, and to whom I owe my best help, to further him to some place of employment and maintenance, which causeth me to become an humble suitor for him to you, not without a special regard to that people, who so Christianly thirst after knowledge and instruction. The man for whom I sue, is one Master Bradshaw, a Master of Arts of Sidney Colledge in Cambridge: The matter I sue for, your Graces favour and allowance that he may preach: The place where his labours are desired, is at Chatham. And I most humbly beseech your Grace, that however you may find or hear, that he is fearfull to do some things that may be argued on him; yet seeing he is well qualified with gifts, and of honest carriage fitting for his calling; let not his fearfulness prejudice him with your Lordship, but vouchsafe him liberty to bestow his talent; and I will undertake to your Grace for him, that he shall not offer any disturbance to the peace of our Church either in word or action; but shall painfully bestow himself in that place, to preach Christ Crucified, and to arm his people with some measure of knowledge, to stand Christianly and courageously for the truth of Christ, and to resist all Errors broached against that holy Doctrine. And the rather I make bold to tender this suit to your Grace for him, because I find plenty of practising by Seminaries and Jesuites to corrupt and pervert the peoples hearts both in knowledge and obedience; and that through penury of preaching in some places it may prove dangerous: I never heard the young man preach my self, but I hear his gifts greatly commended, and I know him to be learned, and painfull also, and careful in that he taketh in hand. And though I know the tenderesse of his Conscience some waies, yet I dare engage my credit again, (as before) to your Grace for him, that he shall walk duttfully, wisely and discretely in the whole course of his preaching, without all offer of disturbance to the peace of the Church. And so longing to hear that my suit may find my desired success with your Grace, I commend my humble duty to you, and commit your Grace, and all your goodly proceedings to the protection and direction of the Lord Almighty. Subscribed, Your Graces most bounden, and ready to be commended, Francis Hastings.

Sir Francis Hastings his Letter to the Archbishop in his behalf not very well relished; who in cases of this kind, was seldome wont to do ought without the advice of Bishop Bancroft, in whose stomach the memory of Master Darrells business stuck still, and of Master Bradshaws act about his Books. For not without some animation in likelihood from above, those Master Bradshaws back-friends, who had before dealt in the dark, did shortly after begin to disclose themselves, and to manifest their malice, which had formerly lain hid, as embers raked up in the ashes. The first of them that openly appeared in the business, was one Master Bearblock Minister at Strowd, a Town or Village adjoyning to Roche-ster, a man of very mean parts for learning, and of a very scandalous life; but one of those whom the Prophet Jeremy speaketh of, that had a singular faculty of licking and smoothing his tongue, to sooth men up in their finnes. This man (among other) vexed at the concourse of people that repaired from the places adjacent to Master Bradshaws teaching, (although Master Bradshaw desirous to comply, so far forth as without offence he might, with him) used to frequent his week-dayes Lecture; stuck not both in Private meetings to tax Master Bradshaw for delivering Heretical Doctrine, and publikely also in a Sermon on the Lords-Day so to charge him therewith, that the Auditory, though he named him not, might well know whom he meant. Now, albeit the man himself were of no esteem, and his censure consequently little to be regarded, yet Mr. Bradshaw deemed, that a publick charge of that nature, should not be let pass with silence. Howbeit, not willing, nor esteeming it meet to pester the pulpit with Apologies, he chose rather to deal with this his Opponent and Traducer by a Letter, which it will not be amiss here to insert.

"Master Bearblock, I was informed by some of your Christian Auditors at Strowd, that in your fore-noons Exercise, you took occasion in the repetition of your former Sermon, to adde thereto something in bitter terms, against some Heretical Doctrine lately broached in some neighbour-Church; which divers of your most charitable, and the most of your judicious Hearers, conceived to be directed against me. At the first, I had no cause easily to entertain the Report, because I was no way guilty to my self so much as of the least shew of any occasion given unto you, to break out in that manner against me; and did presume you had better Learned the Laws of Charity, than in such an open manner to traduce a fellow Minister of the Gospel before you were better possessed of the cause. Besides, I thought, that reproachfull Reports, that have been bruited against your self, should have taught you, if you be innocent, that a Minister of the Gospel may be much abused and mis-reported of, both for life and Doctrine; and therefore that you would not teach by your own practice, me or any other thus in open manner, to make the Reports of men a sufficient Text to preach against your life, as you have made them to preach against my Doctrine. But since that time I am given to understand, that you have given it out at one Master Morelands Table, that I was the man, that you then before God and his Holy Angels indicted and arraigned; and that of no lesse a crime than gross Heresie, and that some of your Congregation were purposed to proceed in Law against me for it. You know there was a Law, (and it were well if it were now in force, to bridle distempered Tongues) that if one were accused of a crime, which could not be proved, the Accuser should suffer the punishment due to that crime; and then, Master Bearblock, if Heresie deserve a punishment, if you should but accuse me of that, which methinks you have already condemned me of, your back should bear the punishment of two Heresies. For, first, it is most untrue that I have taught any such Doctrine; and Secondly, if you could not prove that Doctrine, as I know you cannot, this you here so tax to be Heresie, your Doctrine that calleth it Heresie, deserves no less, lege Talionis, than Heresie; which I speak not so much "much in regard of your weakness, as in Grace, of the strength of the cause;

 "wherein though with the dim eye of mine own judgement I could see no"thing, yet I have cause to be confident, in regard of their judgement whose "shadows it would become you and me to give room unto, yea, and to run "away from. And I am verily perswaded, that though some of your spi"rit may be found to judge it an Errour to hold, That, a bare Reading Mi"nister, is not a Lawfull Minister before God; yet that none that deserves the "name of a man of judgement, will push with such horns against it, as you "do, that it is an Heresie, and that a gross and abominable one. I would I "might be worthy to know, upon your better consideration of the point,
 "whether that heart of yours, that set your Tongue on fire so against this "poor Heresie, would serve to set fire to the pretended Heretick. But blef-
 "sed be God, that Supream Authority keepeth the fire-brands from the hands "of such furies; else there were some cause to fear, lest the Saints of "God (I give them no other title, than your own Conscience gives them, "nay than your own mouth in publick hath given them) should find your hands
 "as hot, as they now feel your tongue; For methinks in your Divinity, to "make but a question of any thing in Religion established by Law, is no "less than Treason and Heresie. There must be some Mystery in it; that e"very poor man must not presume to look into; that one that is so full of cha"rity towards Adulterers, Drunkards, Blasphemers and other sinners that "swarm in the Church, should be so fiery against these new Hereticks of your "own making. What? Are they of all other past hope of Repentance? Or "do not the mercies of God, wherewith your mouth is so oft sugred, of all "other, belong to them? My self on the week-day am one of your Auditours, "and I hope, none of the worst-minded, and then you seem (as oft as ever
 "I heard you) as if your soul did overflow with Charity towards us all. You "cannot be ignorant of the words that so often were in your lips; That none
 "that hear you, but they are Gods faithfull Children; That though they
 "be foul, grievous sinners, yet they are repentant, and Gods mercy belongs "unto them; That no man is without sin, but the best and holiest are un"clean. This hath been your tenor for this half year; the Sermon is yet "to come, that ever with the least zeal you spake against Lewdness of life:
 "And yet now how full of zeal are you against Errours in Doctrine, of "this sort especially? whereas considering the slanders that run of you, (for
 "I call them so, as I desire for the Gospels sake they may prove) you could "take no better course, than to be most zealous in Doctrine against those "sins, that same hath gone about to brand you withall; and to condemn such
 "with your own mouth to Hell, rather than to set open Heaven gates so wide "unto them, as you use to do; as though your self were out of hope of "Heaven, except the fewdest of your Congregation go to Heaven. I may "be bold being the injured party, and knowing you better than you me, "to take this leave to tell you thus much of your self, who have so free"ly given leave to your self, to speak to others worse things of me; that if "the Lords judgements should pursue me so fast, that mine inward corrupti-
 "ons should break out into notorious crimes, and yet should dare for all that "to exercise an holy Ministry; that then of all methods of teaching that e"ver I heard, I would surely follow yours. To keep you from advantage,
 "I acknowledge the Doctrine that you have taught in my hearing to be ve"ry sound and true; But this is it that I affirm, and you may keep it to "your self if it please you, that in dealing against sin, in all the Sermons I "have ever heard you, you have said no more in substance, than what you "shall have always running in the wickedest mouthes; That All men are sin"ners; That the godliest do fall seven times a day; That men must not de"spair of Gods mercy; That they are sorry for it, when they have sinned;
 "That it is their corruption of nature, &c. which are all true words,

"and comfortable, Doctrines to a broken heart, but very poyson to an "impenitent; so that if a Minister should preach them to the stewes, he "should have as many applauses and Amens there to them; as any "where else. If therefore a foul life be as abominable in the eyes of God "and man, as false Doctrine; if this zeal of yours against false Doctrine
 "were of God, you would blow as strong a blast against the other, as you "do against it, and a stronger too, considering that the other having bor"rowed the wings of fame, is flying continually in your own face: This,
 "if you could have let me alone, would never have bitten you. But to "draw to an end, if my bare denial, and the voices of them, that with "best understanding heard me, and are best able to repeat the heads of "that Sermon, can perswade you, that there was no such Doctrine then "delivered, I hope you will satisfie that Congregation, whose ears you have "abused with that report; and especially the Gentleman, to whom you rela"ted the particulars. If you cannot be moved to this; yet be contented,
 "such you say the Law must proceed upon me, to stay the proceeding of "your tongue against me, till you have tried me guilty or not. If you can"not yield to this, but have a purpose to pursue the matter, let Religion o"ver-rule you thus far, to deal with me in the points by private writing.
 "But if you have resolved to go on in this indirect course, openly thus to "injure me, do it I pray you, in your weekly exercise, that I may not trust

The Antino-mians practice.

This Letter, though somewhat large, it seemed not amiss at full to relate;
 because it representeth to the Life, both the Character of many such Teachers, as were forwardest to oppose Gods Faithful Messengers in those times, and the manner of their Teachings, which the most of our Antinomian Party that give out themselves as the only Gospel Preachers, come so near unto now adaies; And the most unequal and unchristian courses also, that were by such then commonly practised, to work them into disgrace with the People, and to procure trouble to them from the State. But the malice of the man stayed not here; which, of it selfe for ought he was able to do,

was

was not much to be regarded. For being Nettled by this Letter, upon Consultation had with some of his complices, a Knight of Note in that County, a man of some parts of Learning and Wit, but of loose Life, utterly averse from, and adverse to the profession and practise of Piety, was by them procured, to come down from Rochester, where he then was, to Chatham on a Lords Day, to hear Master Bradshaw, and that for no other end, but to pick somewhat, (if it might be) out of his Teaching, for which, upon his information against him, (a Practise most unworthy a man of his Ranck) his Mouth might be stopped, or he inhibited at least from farther employment in that Place. And according indeed to their wicked design and ungodly desire the Plot proceeded. For, whereas Master Bradshaw being then entred upon the handling of the story of Christs Temptations (related by two Evangelists, on which his Sermons, much desired by many that heard part of them, and though not fully perfected by him, yet by some small supplies being made up, may peradventure hereafter see Light) had observed, that this was the main scope of Satan in his first encounter, to bear our Saviour in hand, that howsoever he had been put in some hope by a Voice, as from Heaven, that he was the beloved Son of God; yet God by his present neglect of him, and leaving him in such difficulties, destitute of all necessities, did thereby manifest that he did not respect, or regard him at all. Hereupon he took occasion to admonish all true Christians, to Arm themselves diligently against this Temptation, and to strengthen their Faith in the assurance of Gods favour towards them; care of them, and undoubted Truth of his Promises made to them; using this as an Argument to incite them unto the greater care in this kind, for that (said he) If this Temptation do once fasten upon us, that we shall come by Satans sleights to be persuaded, that there is no such matter, that God hath no such respect or regard unto us; it cannot but cool our love unto God. Which words of his, very wholesome and good, the Knight perverting and misreporting, enforced underhand against him, that he should deliver, That a man was not bound to love God, unless he were sure that God loved him. Hereupon Master Bradshaw was shortly after, by a short note under Doctor Buckeridges hand bearing date May twenty six, 1602. and directed unto him at Chatham, made acquainted, that it was the pleasure of his Lords Grace of Canterbury, and his Lord of London (the main prosecutor of the business against him) that he should the next Day by nine of the Clock appear personally before them at Sharn, a Town situate between Rochester and Gravesend: VVhither accordingly he repaired, and thereupon appearing, after some questions moved, and Answers thereunto returned, the Bishop of London began to charge him with teaching of false and ungodly Doctrine, such as had been suggested by the Knight before-mentioned; whereunto when he answered Negatively, relating withal truly and sincerely, what he had delivered, and offering to produce not a few of good Credit, who could and would testify what then he taught, that would not be admitted; London affirming, that what had been enforced, was avowed by such, as were able to conceive, being learned; and to understand aright what it was that he delivered, and received it not by report from others, but had been Ear-Witnesses of it themselves. However at last, to strike all dead sure, subscription was tendered to him, whereat they knew he would stick: which because he professed that he could not condescend unto, they inhibited him to preach any more at Chatham, and having bound him to appear, when he should be farther called upon, for the present so dismissed him.

The next Lords Day was long suborned, in the habit of a Traveller, to repair early in the morning to Master Bradshaws lodging at Chatham, who asking to speak with him, pretended that he came on purpose out of his way to hear him, and demanded of him whether he preached that Day or no? Whereunto he answering, that he did not, being by Authority inhibited, he made shew of such sorrow, as being frustrated of his Expectation, but he was descried to be no other than a Spie, sent to sound Master Bradshaw what he intended to do; so greedy were they to have farther enlarded him, if by any means they might. The same day Master Bearblock was observed at Strowd, as triumphing after a Victory atchieved against some great Adversary, to have appointed to be sung before his fore-noon-Sermon, the former part of the 27 Psalm. Those of Chatham much affected with the inhibition of their faithful Teacher, and grieved in their Souls for the restraint of that precious Food, which they had formerly received from him, were not backward to use what means they might for the taking off of the inhibition, and removal of the Restraint. To this purpose a Supplication was framed in the Name of the Parishoners of Chatham unto the Bishop of Rochester, their mediate Diocesan; in these Words, Right Reverend Father, and our very good Lord, If we were not by manifold Trial and long Experience assured of the Love that you bear, and the care that you have over that Flock, which the Lord hath committed unto your Charge, we could not with so good hope and comfort, as now we do, become Petitioners unto your Lordship, in the behalf of our too much wronged Preacher, Master Bradshaw; Unto whom, in sincerity of a good Conscience we do voluntarily yeeld this Testimony, that he is a man so far in every respect from desert of those misreports, wherewith his causelesse Adversaries have endeavoured to infence your good Lordship against him, as his Accusers have been from the remembrance of that Duty, which they ought to bear to your Lordship, whom they have abused with sinister and unjust informations; his Doctrine always Holy, Wholsome, True, and Learned, utterly void of Faction and Contention; his Life so thoroughly garnished with unblemished Vertues and Graces, as Malice it self cannot reprove, or suspect him; directing all his Labours only to the beating down of Sin and Wickedness, the comfort of the Faithful, and the instruction of the ignorant, without intermeddling at any time, with the needless and conceited Controversies of this factious Age. May it therefore please your good Lordship with Favour (according to your wonted goodness) so to tender this your little poor Flock of Chatham, as to restore unto us our Vertuous and faithful Teacher; lest otherwise we be as sheep without a Shepherd. Which being obtained, we your humble Supplicants will account it so great a Blessing of God from the Hands of your Reverend Father-Hood, as that we shall hold our selves bound faithfully to pray unto the Almighty, for your good Lordships endless prosperity. This their Petition after their own frame conceived, is the rather here inserted, to shew their reverend estimation of Master Bradshaw, and their earnest desire to have retained him still with them. But the business was in higher Hands, London was the man that must do it, if ought were done. With whom Master Chaderton going up to London upon occasion of some Colledge-Affairs, promised to deal in Master Bradshaws behalf; and in likelihood did: but (as appeared) without success.

Gods Providence for him.

He departs from Chatham;

Thus was this blessed Servant of God tossed to and fro, and could not be suffered to abide long in a place; though a man of peaceable carriage, a most meek and humble Spirit, and a kind and loving Disposition. But Gods pious Providence over his, and gracious Provision for them, never faileth. He is oft working for them, when they least see it, and where or whence they least look for it. He was then preparing a retiring and resting place for him, when he seemed to be now utterly out of hope of any. For being now driven from Chatham, he came up to London, whence after some short stay with a Friend, having at present no employment, he thought good to look down into Leicester-Shire to visit his Friends there. And he indeed intended the journey only as a Visit: Howsoever the Lord in his hidden disposal, unknown unto him, had a farther aim in it than he was then aware of; as by the

as by the event appeared, and he afterward took special notice of, and did thankfully acknowledge.

For upon his coming down into those parts, by the good hand of God, using that his worthy Servant of blessed Memory, Master Arthur Hilderham (as formerly sometime, so now again) as an instrument therein, he was brought into some notice with, and commended unto one Master Alexander Radich a religious Gentleman, then residing at New-Hall, an House of Note, situate neer to Burton upon Trent. in the confines of Darbyshire, Leicestershire, and Staffordshire. He not only received him into his house, but obtained also for him from the then Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, being a moderate man, a Licence to Preach in any part of his Diocese: Which favour and liberty, Master Bradshaw without any interruption enjoyed in those parts during that Bishops Life, yea, and after too, without any trouble (a light and short storm only excepted, and that soon again laid, the Year before his Decease, (whereof somewhat hereafter) unto the time of his Release-ment.

He is settled at New-hall.

For his entertainment there, though the means allowed him were very small, in regard that the Gentlemans estate was much encumbered, and he by reason thereof disabled to do what he otherwise desired; the Lady Ferrers his Wives Mother yet surviving, who had an estate for life in that part of the Land, which was to come to his Wife, whereon he then resided; nor, in regard of Religion (for a strong and zealous Papist she was) so well-affected towards them, being forward another way, and some other part of it, by concealment of some Evidences being wrongfully detained from him, as in process of time upon discovery thereof did evidently appear: Yet the small pittance that was allowed him, together with their kind carriage toward him, and the loving affection to him that he found generally in the Family, did give him very good content. For in a Letter to an inward Friend he professeth, that he found both the Gentleman, and his Wife, very tender hearted and sincerely Religious, so kind unto him, as his heart could not desire more; and that in gifts they were otherwise beneficial unto him; and the truth is, (saith he, for you have his own words) it is impossible to find more love in a place than I do find, more and more both of great and small in the House: so that the Lord; I see, hath not clean forsaken me. And in another to the same party; Never let your mind be troubled about the smallness of my Maintenance, it is more than he from whom it cometh can well spare, yet as much as my labours upon them deserve; and more than many of my betters have. To adde hereunto some farther matter of encouragement, and contentment, he withall signifieth, that the Lord had blest him there with a most kind neighbour, (abiding in a house not far from thence with the Lord Paget) a young man of Oxford, and a Londoner by birth, one Master Hassal, a man of very rare parts for all kind of learning, of most prompt and ready speech, and of a very courteous and affable disposition. With him he entertained familiarity, and maintained a good correspondence, while they abode so neer together. For he was not nice to embrace acquaintance with any moderate man, of endowments especially; and very forward to take notice of the good parts of others, and to set them out as occasion was offered, to the utmost: so far was he from that malevolent humour so rife with too many in these times, of extenuating or blurring the endowments and abilities of others; such especially as do not in every particular conceit, though but groundlessly oft fancied, comply with themselves, as also together with his ingenuous composure of spirit, his pious disposition may herein be observed, in taking notice of, and acknowledging a passage of divine providence in every accommodation, that might any way, or in any measure, improve the comfort of his present condition.

His small means of Maintenance.

His contentment.

His Letter to a Friend about it.

His humi-ty.

But that the great moderation of mind in one of such worth as was this Servant of Christ, may the better appear, we shall compare the means of maintenance afforded him, and his employments, whereof he professed before, not to deserve so much as so small a pittance amounted unto, the one with the other. That the allowance was very small, may very justly be deemed, when his friends were so much troubled and grieved, to think that one of his endowments should be driven to accept so low and slender conditions: and the truth is, as by his own relation appears, the allowance at first agreed upon, was but ten pounds by the year, his diet, fire, candle, and all kind of attendance, as himself draws it out at length to make the most of it. That which is here specified not in any wise to asperse the Gentleman, whose present condition would not then well afford better termes, and yet shewed his good will by free addition to what he stood engaged for, even in his first year of abode with him; and afterward also, as charge grew upon Master Bradshaw, though means were not much amended with him, yet strained himself unto a farther enlargement, as hereafter shall be shewed. But to manifest the exceeding, and almost unparallel'd modesty of the man, esteeming his labours beneath so poor an allowance. For his employments that himself so much undervalued, what were they? Besides his private exercises at set times performed in the Family; he preached at first constantly twice every Lords day in a Chappel of some capacity, belonging to the Gentlemans House, and situate within the park wherein the House stood; and afterward, when the resort from other parts more remote, grew so great, that the place could not well contain them; (that the more might enjoy the fruit of his Ministry, and with the more ease to them, though the less to him and the Household) he was easily induced, (the Governours of the Family, out of their religious disposition, well approving thereof, and condescending thereunto) to bestow his labours, as he had before done in the Chappel, in a more Publick place, at a Parish-Church (where a Reading Vicar only was) at a Village called Stapenhill or Stapenball, about a mile distant from the place of his abode.

pains.

And this he did constantly for above twelve years at least, at such times as the Gentleman abode with his Family at Newhall, which was the Principal place of his settled abode: receiving for such his pains among them, no consideration at all from the people of the place; (the most or them deeming him more beholden to them, for coming and staying to hear him, than themselves to him for coming to preach to them;) save that on the Lords day for his better ease and refreshment, between his forenoon and afternoons employment, he was usually entertained at the House of one Master Alexander Buckley, who had sometime belonged as a Bayliff or Steward to Master Rediches Family, and whose Wife, Mistress Anne Buckley, a very sweet natured, humble and godly woman, was both a Mary and Martha to him, no lesse diligent to attend his teaching with the one, then sedulous to make fitting provision for him with the other; and that some of the better affected sort among those that heard him, would now and then gratifie him with some kind of Countrey-courtesies, When He kept House by himself.

Monstrous
ingratitude.

Having thus spent above a twelve-moneth or more with Master Redich his thoughts began to be more solicitously renewed concerning that business of Marriage propounded to him at Chatham, and so farre forth, as hath been formerly shewn, embraced then by him; which in regard also of some other emergent occasions had hung hitherto in suspence. This to Proceed in and consummate he much desired, not so much in regard of himself, as in regard of the other party, who had been held in expectation thereof so long already, and might deem it some wrong, if it should be be still so delayed. But how this might consist with his continuance in Master Rediches Family he was not able well to conceive; and how very loath he was to part with a Family, where he had found so much love. Howsoever he resolved to break the matter unto them, before he would proceed any farther therein, that if no fit meanes of compliance there could be contrived, he might with their good leave look out for some other place of employment, and they have some convenient space of time for the fitting and furnishing of themselves with some other to succeed with them in his room. Upon relation hereof, according to such his resolution, (having taken a fit time for it) made unto them, enforming them truly and freely in all circumstances, how the case stood with him, and how he stood affected towards them, it was strange to see (it is in his own words related) how great affection they shewed to bear unto him, expressed even with teares, that on no condition he must depart from them; such course should be taken, as that, when he should in that kind change his condition, he might still conveniently and comfortably abide with them. Whereunto he subjoyneth; And this indeed is the first hour of my solid comfort, that the Lord hath vouchsafed me a standing place, where I may settle my self. And indeed God was pleased to work in some particulars somewhat strangely and unexpectedly, beyond what he was than able to foresee or fore-cast, toward the farther accomplishment of his desire in this kind; as hereafter shall be shewed.

Mean while Master Redich by occasion of businesse drawn up to London, and having taken some lodgings for himself and his retinue neer unto Christ-Church, with purpose to make stay some good space of time in the City, Master Bradshaw abiding there with him, was requested to preach sometime at Christ-Church: which accordingly he did, and that with such approbation and good liking of the well-affected in the Parish, that the afternoons Lectures there becoming vacant, albeit Doctor Milward, a man of some note in those times, stood for it, yet by the greater number of votes, in a Vestry purposely for that end assembled, Master Bradshaw was chosen to be their Lecturer, though not having sought it himself, but having been without his privity propounded by some such of them as had been much taken with his former Sermons. But the will of God (it seems) was, that he should still adhere to that Family, which he was fallen into, and where he had found so much affection; that which to his dying day also he did. For though by some of those, who earnestly desired him, great means were made to the Bishop, yet would he in no wise condescend to give way thereunto.

He is chosen Lecturer at Christ Church London.

During his stay in these parts, looking down to Chatham, he there consummated that businesse, which hitherto had been delayed. And in regard that Master Redich with his Wife and retinue were by reason of his urgent affairs in divers kinds likely to continue for a longer space of time in the City than at first was expected, Master Bradshaw having brought up his Wife with him from Chatham, did for awhile board her with a sister of hers, before married and seated in the City, and afterward took part of a tenement for himself and her, who being a woman that affected employment, for their better support, taught there a few Scholars. Much about this time, by occasion of that formall conference acted and transacted at Hampton-Court, wherein some of our chief Prelates endeavoured to possesse the Kings Majesty with a prejudice against those that made suit for a Reformation of things amisse in Church affairs (his disaffection to whom, he had himself also in some writing of his, partly discovered already) and to perswade him, that for Ecclesiastical affairs all things were so well settled, that no Reformation needed, but some strict injunction only of a precise conformity unto, and constant observation of things already established, which began thereupon in many places with much vigor to be pressed; It came to passe that many Books came abroad, being private-ly

of his Wife.

Gods mercy

For Books of this nature, search was made in the City; for one, more especially among the rest, that had (it seems) given our great Clergy-Masters most offence, and Master Bradshaw being known to abide then in the City, a man in much suspicion with them, two Pursuivants, accompanied with Master Norton the Kings Printer, were sent with Commission to search his house both for it and him. Whither accordingly repairing, but not finding him at home, they enforced his Wife to open his Closet or Study, the Chests, Trunks, Boxes, and Presses, to make search for such Books, but found nothing. For the truth is, (and there was a good Providence of God in it) after that Master Bradshaw was that morning gone out, not above half an hour before that this business fell out, his Wife looking into his Study, and seeing some of those Books there, to prevent future danger, (which yet she then little deemed or dreamed to be so near at hand as it proved to be afterward) had taken them out from thence, and cast them into a hole between two Chimneys, where being covered over with old besomes, they remained undiscovered. But howsoever they could meet with nothing of that which they looked for, yet on his Wife they seized, who would rather have had him; her they took and led unto Doctors Commons, where having presented her before Doctor Stanhop, Doctor White, and a third party, whom she knew not, a number sufficient to make up a compleat High Commission Court; they examined her, yet without oath: first, Where her Husband was: whereunto she answered, she knew not; then, What means of Maintenance she had, and from whom? To which she made answer, that she gat her living by her work, and teaching of a few young Children; after that, What Children she had: she told them, none yet; but on she hoped in her belly, being then great with Child: which was her first-born Son, now a Minister of the Gospel, afterward born in that House they then dwelt in, in Thred-needle street, and baptized in the Church near thereto adjoining, where the Minister of the place, somewhat thick of hearing, by a mistake, instead of Fonathan, nam'd him Fohn, which name therefore he bare afterward, and doth to this day. But after divers such questions to little purpose propounded and answered, in conclusion they told her, that they knew well enough that the Book they then searched for, was none of her Husbands making, though he might have a hand in the venting of it; and withall, that if they had been disposed, they could have had him, for all his keeping in a Lancashire Gentlemans house. So they termed Master Redich, because his own Lands of Inheritance lay in those parts. Thus having parlied with her, they dismissed her, not suffering those greedy Harpyes the Pursuivants, who were eager upon her for their fees, ro exact ought from her only binding her at a daies warning to appear again before them.

Thus through Gods goodness and watchfull eye over his Servant, too regardlesse in some sort of his own safety, having escaped the snare that was set for him, he returned after some space of time, Master Rediches main businesses being now dispatched, together with him and his, unto their former place of abode at New-Hall, taking his Wife and little one together also along with him.

His return
to Newhall.

Being there arrived, the Gentleman both enlarged his maintenance, and assigned him and his Wife certain Chambers in his House conveniently furnished; as also herbage in the Park for a certain number of Kine, and of Swine, and some Poultry, together with a convenient Room for a Dary, wherein she might exercise her huswifery; which she very well could do, and accordingly did.

Now

Now while they thus lived together in Master Rediches House, Master Bradshaw went on cheerfully in his wonted course, both of private exercises for the instruction of the Family, and of publick employment on the Lords day for the benefit of others also abroad. But the old Lady Ferrers, Mistresse Rediches Mother, a woman of a great spirit, and a resolute Papist, though not an absolute professed Recusant, could by no meanes brook Master Bradshaw; and the lesse now because married, and for that he had brought his Wife also to live with him in House with them: yea she had conceived such an extream hatred against him, professing to bate him above any man in the world; that she had made a vow, that she would never set her feet in the house where he was, and it was therefore feared, not without some just ground of suspicion, that the Family might from her, fare the worse for him. But she hearts of all men, and women also, are in Gods hand, and he can wind and turn them which way he will: and when a mans waies do please the Lord, he can, if he see it good, yea, doth oft, when he seeth it will be for the good of his, make of his utter foes, his Friends. And even so fell it out here. For the Lady notwithstanding this her extream disaffection, so deeply Rooted, and so vehemently expressed, yet in proesse of time being enduced by some that were in credit and repute with her, to visit her Son-in-Law and Daughter, and make a stay for some time (which they much desired) in house with them; and being withall informed and assured by them of Master Bradshaws mild and moderate demeanure, and his meek, kind, and lowly carriage, she was over-wrought by them, contrary to that her former unnaturall and irreligious engagement, to repair thither, and take up her lodging with them: where it pleased God, withall, not long after her accessse thither, (being now an eye-witnesse her self of what she had formerly heard by report of him from others) so to alter, that her former disaffection to Master Bradshaw, and to cast it into a clean contrary mould, that all that beheld and observed her carriage on all occasions towards him; wondered exceedingly at it, to see so strange an alteration, and such not unexpected only, but unusual carriages in her. For, albeit she were otherwise, a Gentlewoman, as of very proper and personable presence, and in that regard much admired by the Scottish Queen that suffered here, whom she also much affected, so of her self no lesse forward to take and keep state; yet she used Master Bradshaw with very much courtesie and complement, at table drinking to him, and carving for him; resorting twice a day constantly to prayer with him and the Family, and speaking reverently of him; yea whereas formerly she could not be induced to hear any of our Ministers preach; howsoever for fashion sake, and to escape penalty of Law, she might sometime repair to hear the Liturgy read; yet was she content to hear Master Bradshaw, and commended his Sermons. Which the better to work upon her, he wisely framed to such subjects as he deemed would best serve, to take off such false imputations, as are wont by the adverse party to be cast upon our Profession and Preaching, as if we were utter enemies to mortification and good works. For first out of Math 5. 16. he took occasion to speak of the necessity and nature of good works; the ground from whence they spring, and the end that must be aimed at in them; and after that out of Psalm 51. of repentance and mortification, with both which discourses she seemed to be very much affected. What farther work these things had upon her after her departure thence, we are not able to say; but certain it is, that while she abode there she seemed to be much better disposed, not towards Master Bradshaw only; but (contrary to what was formerly feared, and strongly suspected) toward her Son-in-law and Daughter also. For before she went thence, she sealed them a Lease for three years, of the Land they held from her, with abatement of an Hundred pounds by the year of the Rent formerly paid; and a remission of thirty pounds by the year besides, otherwise accruing to her; (God might bless the issue, for his Josephs sake) and her continued good opinion of, and affection to Master

Bradshaw

Bradshaw she farther Manifested, by her free Consent, to have a House built for him and his Wife to live in, on a parcell of land that she had interest in; which was accordingly with as much speed as might be, not long after effected. Then which (saith he, so modest and moderate were his affections for the things of this life) I desire no more worldly things, than that I may be settled in that little House, and rest there in quiet, which these times give small hope of.

This he conceived the lesse hope of, because the Bishop under whom he had hitherto lived quietly, about this time, was deemed not like long to continue, and indeed shortly after deceasing, it was given out, that Bishop Neal, translated from Rochester, was to succeed (that which he much dreading, in divers of his Letters had oft up, Lord keep us from Rochester) and so he did indeed, though not immediately, yet not long after. For Doctor Abbots Dean of Winchester, who came in between them, fate not long there, but before many moneths expired, stept from Litchfield to London.

Bishop Neal But Bishop Neal was the man, whom all the pious, as well private men as Ministers, in these parts mis-doubted would do the most mischief. And it was reported, that the Bishop was minded to reside from the space of time at Drakelow, a place not far distant from New-hall; whose neighbourhood was like to prove no more beneficial to Master Bradshaw, than the brass pots

Gods Providence over Him. company in the Fable to the earthen pitcher. But, as dangers oft befall us, where we least mis-doubt or suspect ought much less expect any; so (the Lord on that wise disposing things for the safety of his servants, and the enuring of them to a constant dependance on his providence) it falleth out sometime on the other side, that we prove least assailed or annoyed from thence, whence we have been most affrighted with the greatest expectation of much damage, or sore distresse. So it fell out with Master Bradshaw here. For, howsoever in one of his Letters he manifesteth his fears to that purpose, that in regard of the considerations before-mentioned, he much doubted, that Zone would be too hot for him; yet in another afterward he signifieth that he had not as yet heard ought from him, or of any complaints that had been made to him against him. Nor indeed doth it appear that he was at any time after molested, or disturbed in the exercise of his Ministry by either of them, by what means soever the Lord was pleased so either to repress or divert, as well the malice of the one, as the might of the other, that neither of them should fasten to any purpose upon him, untill the year before he died.

About this time Master Redich bestowed his eldest Daughter, Mistress Grace Redich in marriage with Sir Robert Darcie, Son and Heir to Sir Edward Darcie, a Kentish Knight, a very religious Gentleman, in great favour and repute with that Illustrious Prince Henry, of rare parts, and great hopes, of whom this land was not worthy, and one that highly esteemed Master Bradshaw, as he justly deserved. He, making his abode most at New-hall untill his Fathers decease, (where his Lady a very gracious Gentlewoman according to her name, not inferiour to her Husband, either in piety, or in sincerity of affection to Master Bradshaw, was the Second time delivered of twins, and became Mother of four Children, within compasse of a year) Master Bradshaw by his company there received much comfort and encouragement in the work of his Ministry, and furtherance also in his Studies. For Sir Robert being a Scholar and studious, had a Library furnished with many of the best Writers, as well in Divinity, as in other kindes of literature, whereof Master Bradshaw had the free use; and he brought also upon his motion, divers others on purpose, that might be usefull for him. And this his affectionate and courteous carriage to Master Bradshaw, toward whom he ever demeaned himself with much reverence and due respect, was continued by him untill his decease, which did not many weeks precede Master Bradshaws.

In the year 1613. it Pleased God to take from him that worthy Gentleman Master Redich, his Patron, who in a very holy and Christian manner at New-hall departed this life. His frequent removals from Newhall to Longford, another house that had befallen him in those parts not long before his decease, was occasion of much distraction to Master Bradshaw, now settled with his Family at Stanton Ward near to Newhall, but his decease much more: Concerning which he thus writes, among other things in a Letter to a Friend, Master Rediches decease hath made an heavy alteration in this Family; and for mine own estate, Mistresse Redich giving over house, as she intendeth to do, and to live somewhere hereabout, as privately as she may, for the better discharging of her Husbands debts, it will be the lesse comfortable, and more chargeable to me then it hath been. But I am willing for her good to undergo any thing. Master Redich on his death-bed was willing to have assured me of something during my life. But the force of his disease did so grow upon him that he could do nothing. If God lend Mistresse Redish life, till the debts be discharged, or a sure course taken for them, I hope she will, if it lie in her power: for she hath promised so to do; and I assure me, she will do her uttermost to effect it. But whatsoever fall out, I trust I shall be content, having been hitherto at the Lords finding; who hath shewed himself at all times a loving Father to me his unworthy Child; and our time here, though it be full of wants, is but short. Thus it pleased the Lord to inure this his Servant to a dependance from day to day for provisions upon his Providence; and as a grave man of God sometime said, Whereas many other have, and eat their bread stale; to receive his bread, and eat it daily new from his hand; that which he also, you see, was very well content to do. Mean while the good Gentlewomans incumbered and unsettled estate she was left in, being to take course for the payment of her Husbands debts, and to compound for the Wardship of her younger Daughter, who was afterward matched to one of the Lord Chief Justice Cooks Sons, could not but exceedingly distract Master Bradshaw, as well as her self, and drew him up to London together with her, oftner then he had any mind of himself, or desire thereunto. But from that Family the main means of his maintenance accrued; and to it therefore he constantly addicted himself, as in duty he deemed himself obliged to do.

His Letter about Master Rediches Death.

At Stanton Ward, not far from Newhall, as was before intimated, his Family still abode in the little house there built for him: Where, while Mistresse Redich abode in those parts, or when he had any liberty to get down from these parts, while she was longer then usually detained in or about the City, he went on constantly in his wonted course, teaching freely at Stapenhill every Lords day, as formerly he had done. Only in the year 1617. coming down from London, (upon what occasion, or through whose instigation, is uncertain) he was welcomed home by the Bishops Chancellour, with an inhibition to preach there, till he heard further from him. But by the mediation of a couple of good Angels, the one from himself, (so willing and forward was he to redeem his liberty, for the benefit of others, without advantage to himself) and the other from a Friend, the Chancellour was soon pacified, and the restraint removed; whereby it appeared that the Prohibition proceeded Principally from his own avarice, rather then from mis-information from any thereabout, or injunction from above.

He is inhibited from Preaching.

But soon Restored.

Amidst this his restless and distracted condition; and constant pursuit of his religious employments, the Lord was preparing a place of settled rest for him, and a royall reward in the highest Heavens, for his faithfull service here upon earth, drawing on apace now to its utmost period. For in the year 1618. being come up from Stanton, to attend Mistresse Redich, while he lodged with her at Chelsey, not far from the City, visiting a Friend at Rederith, whose house he usually frequented when he was in these parts, he complained of some malady that by his present distemper he mis-doubted might be growing upon him, and though by his Friend he was earnestly urged to take some speedy course, by the Physicians advice, for preventing the farther growth of it, yet being too regardlesse of himself, while he neglected so to do, he was suddainly surprized with a violent and (as the Physician affirms) malignant Fever, which so fiercely set upon him, that in its very first apparent encounter it cast him down upon his couch. And notwithstanding all the means used, that either were desired, or could be procured; no care being omitted, or cost spared, by that worthy Gentlewoman, who most tenderly and intirely affected him, for advice of Physician, who constantly repaired to him, assistance of Apothecary, according to direction with all requisite necessities supplying him, and diligent attendance, as well of those in the Family, as of some other also for that end procured from abroad, without intermission successively about him; even the Gentlewoman her self (though advised to forbear, in regard of some malignity deemed to be in the disease) frequently resorting to him, sitting by him, and with her own hands offering, for his better ease, to be helpfull unto him, which yet he was very loath to admit; in all which from the first to the last she expressed a very great measure of cordiall affection unto him, and no lesse an earnest desire, both of his present relief, and future recovery also, if God should see it so good; yet the time being now come wherein the Lord had determined to put an end to his faithfull Servants labourious employments, continued distractions, and restless condition, and to translate him hence to a place of endlesse rest, and peace never to be interrupted again; the force of the disease within the space of a few daies fretted asunder those bands that kept soul and body together, and leaving the one behind to be laid up in the bowels of that element whence it had its first original, set the other at full liberty to return unto him, from whom alone it immediately received its existence at first.

His Death
1618.

His behaviour in his sickness.

During the short time of his sickness, wherein yet, through Gods goodnesse, he continued free from any notable sense of pain, and was accompanied with much freedom of mind and memory, he had his heart and tongue in meditation set wholly upon God, acknowledging his special favour and goodnesse unto him, who had so far forth vouchsafed to cast a gracious eye upon him so vile and loathsome a creature, while he yet continued in his native condition, as to give him an interest by Faith in his Christ; yea so farre farther to grace so unworthy a wretch, as to call him to be a Minister of his Word, and Publisher of his Will, and to make his weake endeavours and worthlesse labours, at any time in any measure efficacious to any of his people, (as he hoped in some sort with some at least they had been) either for the conversion and bringing of them home unto him, or for the establishing and building of them up in the saving knowledge and belief of his truth, and in the graces and comforts of his Spirit. Withall seriously professing this to be his comfort, the testimony of his conscience in the sight of God bearing witness in his behalf, that in sincerity of heart, though with much weaknesse and amidst many failings, through the whole course of his Ministry, his main end and scope in all his labours and endeavours had been both in publick and private, to seek the glory of God, the delivery of his truth, the peace of his Church, the spiritual good of his people; in all things to approve himself to him, and continue faithfull with him, who hath been pleased to take him into his service; and desiring now nothing more, than that he might be so enabled through the support of his good Spirit, that by his Christian and comfortable carriage under his Fatherly hand, in this close of his day-work, he might confirm and seal up to others the truth of those things that he had formerly Professed and Taught, Withal earnestly Exhorting all that came about him, to Learn now to Die before they came to it, to be sure to lay a good Foundation in time of Life and Health, for matter of firm Support and sound Comfort in time of Sickness, and at the hour of Death; and to make as much Provision

to his Friends.

Provision and strong Preparations against that time as they could, assuring themselves, that they should find all their utmost endeavours and carefullest Addresses to be little enough, when they came once to that Work.

Amidst these and the like Religious Meditations and Pious Employments, perceiving his desired end now to Approach, and having requested Prayer to be conceived in his behalf by a special Friend, who had accompanied him most part of his sickness, not long after that Office performed by him, he quietly and peaceably resigned his Soul into the hands of his blessed Saviour, no less ready (doubtless) to receive it from him, than himself was desirous and forward to recommend it unto him.

His Funeral Rites were performed at Chelsey, where he drew his last Breath; most of the Ministers of better Note about the City, either constantly residing, or occasionally detained there, besides a very great multitude of private Persons well affected, repairing thereunto. Who were all there, after the usual manner in such cases and on such occasions, entertained at the Charge and by the Bounty of that worthy Gentlewoman of singular Piety, in whose House he Deceased. From which Place his Corps being conveyed on the Shoulders of six of his Reverend Brethren of the Ministry, who of their own accord offered themselves unto that Office, to the place of publick Assembly, where it was to be interred: Master Thomas Gattaker his ancient and inward Friend, though full of Grief for the loss of one, who so entirely affected him, and whom as well for the high esteem he had of him and his worth, as for that entire affection which he constantly bare to him, was most deservedly exceedingly dear to him, and in regard thereof not so free or fit for performance of that Office, yet enforced himself to Preach at his Funeral, and to give, though very briefly, such Testimony of him, as was generally approved of by his Reverend Brethren there present. And he was indeed a Man of eminent Parts, for sharpness of wit, clearness of apprehension, soundness of judgment, exactness of Method, and Powerfulness of Delivery, and singular dexterity in beating out perplexed and intricate Debates, descrying and discovering where the Knots lay, stating of Controversies aright, and dissolving of difficult cases of Conscience, to which purpose not only many even from remote Parts resorted unto him, either of their own accord, or directed and recommended unto him by other his Brethren of the Ministry, as one most likely of any to give them Satisfaction in their doubts, but divers of them also, of good note, (as by their Letters to him may appear) deemed it no disparagement to seek resolution from him in questions of that nature themselves. Neither was he one that kept his Talent wrapt up in a Napkin; though he were cooped up mostly in an obscure corner, through the harsh courses of those, that would not suffer his Light to shine forth in any eminent place; yet was he exceeding laborious in those parts wherein he lived, both in private employments at constant set times in the Family, and in publick also; where he might be permitted, though without benefit to himself: That which may appear by abundance of papers and Note-Books yet extant, though by many Casualties a multitude of them have miscarried. Besides his constant course of Preaching at Stapenhill, for the most of his time from his first Admission into that Family, save only by interruption, through occasion of Removals, which neither usually lasted over-long, nor, though distracted him in his Studies, did any whit lightly lessen his Labours; he was frequently drawn forth to join with other his Reverend Brethren in their Meetings and Exercises, at Asbie de la Zouch in Leicester-shire, at Repton in Darby-shire, and at Burton upon Trent; at some of which Meetings the manner being, that some one of them Preached his Hour on the Scripture propounded the meeting before, and the rest or a certain number of them spent afterward, each one in his halfe Hour or thereabout on some other portion of Scripture, one being appointed to moderate derate, by minding each that spake, if occasion were, of the time, and to close up all with some succinct Rehearsal of what had been Delivered, together with an Additament, if it seemed good, of somewhat of his own. It hath been reported by some of those Ministers, who frequented these Exercises, that when they could get this our Brother, into that Number, or into the Chair, which latter he could hardly be drawn into, he was observed to have a reach still beyond the rest; and in regard of his depth of judgment, and Dexterity in due ballancing of Points controverted, and differences in Opinion concerning the same, he was commonly filed among them The weighing Divine, as hath been attested by that worthy Servant of Christ now at rest with him, Master Oliver Bowles, from the mouthes of some of them, who in his hearing related it.

in teaching.

For his ordinary manner of Teaching, it was in some kind somewhat different from the usual Method of most Teachers in those times. For he seldom made any Excursion into the handling of common places, or drew his subject matter out at length by any prolixly continued Discourse: But the main frame both of his publick Sermons and private Exercises, for the most part, if not wholly, consisted, after some brief and genuine Relation of the context, and explication of the Terms, where need required, of Notes and Observations, with much variety and great Dexterity drawn immediately from the Text, and naturally, without constraint, issuing and flowing either from the main Body, or from the several Limbs of it, with some useful Application annexed thereunto: Which though neither of them long insisted upon, yet were wont with that vivacity to be propounded and pressed by him, as well might, and oft did, pierce deep into the Hearts of his Hearers, and not only rectifie and clear their judgments, but have a powerful Work also upon their Affections. Nor was it his manner to quote many Scriptures, finding it troublesome to his Memory, and supposing it would be so to his Auditours also: (that which was the practise and Opinion also of Doctor Chaderton, as they well know, that heard him on Matth. 21. 13.) besides deeming it the less needful, in regard that his Observations being grounded immediately on the Scripture he handled; and by necessary consequence thence deduced, seemed to receive proof sufficient from it. A constant form of Prayer he used, as in the Family, so in his publick Ministry; only varying or adding upon some special occasions, as occurrences intervening required; The reason he gave thereof, was this, because hesitation, (which he said he was much subject unto) was in prayer more Offensive, than in other Discourse; unto prophane ones especially, whereof in mixt Multitudes, and Meetings some lightly, too many usually, were; that which he affirmed also to have been Master Carwrights Practise, with whom sometime he conversed.

The efficacy
of his Ministry.

He used a form of prayer,
and

The Scriptures which he preached
over.

In such manner of Teaching he went over divers Portions of Scripture: Among others, the fifty first, and the hundred and nineteen Psalms: the story of Hanna, 1 Sam. 1. and of Naamen the Syrian, 2 Kings 5. Part of Christs Sermon on the Mount, Matth. 13. and of the Rich man and Lazarus, Luk. 16. the Relation of Christs Temptations, Recorded by two of the Evangelists; the whole History of Christs Apprehension. Arraignment and Execution; together with Judas his end; the four first Chapters of the Epistle to the Romanes, the three last Chapters of the Epistle to the Hebrewes, beside many other more particular parcels of Scripture.

X His works that were published.

Of this sort was by himself published in his Life-time, A Preparation to the Sacrament of the Lords Supper; at first written out at the request of that right Religious Lady Darcy for her private use, and by importunity afterwards, more publick for the farther benefit of others. Therewith many have been much taken, (by means whereof it hath oft been reprinted) and among others one Thomas Foster, a Mercer by Trade, living at Shefford in with a small catechism

in Bedford-Shire, a very honest, humble-minded, and sincere hearted Christian, hath heard to professe, that that Book, and that part of it more specially wherein are laid down certain marks and signs of Faith and Repentance, was as far (as he was able to deem) the only outward Instrumental means of his Conversion, through the gracious co-operation of Gods Spirit working powerfully and efficaciously upon his heart in the reading thereof. And since his death have been published, A Nuptial Sermon, entitled; A Marriage Feast, on John 2. 1. - 12. A Meditation of Mans Mortality, on Psal. 90. His Sermons on the second Epistle to the Thessalonians. A Treatise of Christian Reproof, on Matth. 18. 15, 17. And another of the Sin against the Holy Ghost, on Matth. 12. 22. - 32. which in his life-time he had been, by that worthy Knight Sir Robert Darcy, who died not long before him; much pressed to publish; but could not prevail with him, being very backward in that kind; much undervaluing his own works, and very rarely, if ever, satisfying himself in ought that he undertook. For the use of the Family wherein he lived, he drew up a twofold Catechism as they Term it; the one somewhat large, the other more brief, for young beginners extracted out of the former; which latter, to save labour of Transcribing, he permitted to be Printed.

What spare time he had from his constant Employments, either private or publick, when not taken off by occasional Occurrences, he spent most of it principally three ways.

First, In labouring to clear some Points about the Doctrine of Faith and Justification; Concerning the latter whereof, after many Debates (first occasioned by some Lectures of Doctor Grey, sometime Fellow of Trinity Colledge in Cambridge, then reading on that Subject at Gresham-Colledge in London) that passed to and fro by reciprocal Letters between him and a special Friend of his, he began to set upon an exact Treatise of that Argument: Which being upon the first Draught of it communicated to that Friend of his, upon some Advertisements from him, he in divers particulars farther cleared; he being afterward imparted to divers of prime Note in either University, he was by them not much incouraged only, but earnestly invited to divulge it; that, which though by much difficulty drawn unto, yet at length he did. And howsoever that accurate Piece was but courtly entertained by one of his Brethren in the Ministry, then living in the City, traducing it publicly in a Lecture at Pauls, quarrelling with him who had Licensed it for the Press, and framing a bitter Invective against it; which upon perpetual was found so Virulent, that he could not get it permitted to the Press; yet was the Work so well approved by many Learned and judicious in both our Universities, that divers of them have professed to have received more Light thence in that Point, than they had ever before from the Writings of any that had dealt in that Argument. Hence it was that having occasion to be sometime on the Act-Day at Oxford, one of those that had seen it, and deeming not undeservedly of the work-man by the Work, seeing him passe along in a plain russet Clock, is reported by some that were then in Company with him, to have said to them, Do you see the man that goeth yonder, in that plain Habit, and in that self-neglecting Garb and Posture? He hath more sound Learning in his Head, than twenty of us have. And that famous Professor Doctor Prideaux, after his Decease, in some Company hearing his Son yet surviving then present there Named, demanded of him whether that Master Bradshaw, that wrote the Treatise of Justification where his Father? And being informed that he was, he professed himself heartily glad to see the Son of that man, for the old Acquaintance he had; not with his Father himself, but with that Work of his; For those were the Doctors own Words. Hereunto may be added the Verdict of the great and grave Counsellour of State, so much esteemed for his judgment in Law-Cases, the Lord Cook,

Cook, who visited the Gentlewoman (by the marriage of her Daughter to his Son, now neerly linked to him) at her house where Master Bradshaw then lay sick, and finding the Book lying accidentally in a Window, after the perusal of some good part of it, freely professed, That he had seldome Read a thing more Pithily and Pregnantly Written.

Nor was this work of his in such esteem at home only, but with other learned also abroad. Among whom Master Lewis Chappel, a man of special Note for variety of Learning, and Professor of Divinity at Salmure in France, having received the Book sent him from London by Master Aaron Chappel his kinsman, then Minister of the French Church there returneth him many thanks for it; requesting him withal, to enquire after the Authors place of abode, and convey from him unto him the Letter enclosed; In the Superscription whereof he stileth him, Doctissimum, ornatissimum, clarissimumque virum; and in the Superscription, out of his respect to him, and estimation, yea admiration of him, in regard of that piece alone, thus writes of himself, Tui non studiosus modo, sed cultor & admirator. In the body of the Letter, after signification, how upon some occasion being to part with the Book, he had taken pains, before he would let it go out of his hands, to translate it out of English into French, he passeth this Censure of it, A little Book, small for bulk, but for Learning, Wit, and Acuteness a grand one. --- To speak ingeniously, I never hitherto read ought in any humane writing of Doctrinal Divinity, that so exceedingly liked me; so learnedly, acutely, soundly, pithily, plainly, and yet with admirable Brevity is this Argument so fully comprised, and thoroughly handled therein, I want words wherewith to commend and extol it according to its due desert; I have oft read it over, and yet never have enough of it; but the oftner I return to it, and read it over again, the more egerly is mine Appetite stirred up unto it, so much Light and Brightness of Learning, Wit and Art shineth forth in it. And whereas treading then precisely in Piscators steps, he propounded his doubts withal, concerning some particulars, wherein Master Bradshaw seemed to swarve from Piscator; Master Bradshaw to give him farther satisfaction therein, and yet save much writing at large to and fro, reviewed his own work, and endeavoured to clear those things somewhat better; wherein also he was farthered by some Exceptions from Master Wootten imparted unto himself, unto which he had returned an Answer; and having turned it so revised into Latine, he sent a Copy of it in Writing unto Master Chappel, who upon receipt thereof, wrote back at first briefly, but not long after more fully, in these words; Right worthy Sir, I wrote before to you, that I had received your truly golden Book, enlarged by you and turned into Latine, and that presently I read it over, but in haste; so eager an Appetite had I unto it, by reading the other Edition of it in English before. Since that I have read it over again, not once, but often, and taking leasure thereunto. Which the oftner I read over, the more it pleaseth me, and is approved of by me, so accurately and exactly is it Composed by you. I hope this Birth and Issue of your Mind will find Approbation with peaceable and moderate Dispositions, on whether side soever, albeit you condescend not unto them in all things that they require. You so space in the middle between either Opinion, that neither of them ought to be displeased with you, if they truly love Peace and Concord.

Thus that learned man word for word translated out of his Letters in Latine, which in the same language have been represented also, and published elsewhere. Whereby may appear, what entertainment, approbation, and estimation this Treatise (which yet the Author speaks so meanly of himself in private Letters to his Friends) found with the learned in foreign parts, and he himself also, where otherwise wholly unknown, for it. And whosoever shall with a regardfull eye read over the generally well approved, and deservedly much esteemed writings of those worthy Servants of God, now with the Lord, Master William Pemble and Master Samuel Torset, concerning this subject, collated with this of Master Bradshaw, which came forth some good space before either of them had writ ought; he shall easily discern, on whose foundation they built, in whose steps they trod, with whose heifer they ploughed, at what Torch they lighted their Tapers, and from whence they received much of their light in that Argument. For it may be with good ground of truth be averred, that amidst the extream opposition of Divines in this point dissenting, this our Brother did herein beat out such a middle tract between them, as appears not to have been formerly discovered by any, wherein these two men of special note coming after him for the main matter of their principles, have kept close to his footsteps, in the path by him cut out and cleared to their hands. Of this latter in Latine, a Copy being sent over by him to Doctor Ames not long before his decease, was by him not long after it printed. Unto this his purpose was to have added a Treatise of Justifying Faith, the proper nature, peculiar act, and Office of it in that work, and great pity it was that such an head as this one piece shews him to have had, was not set apart for such like employments. How many points of much difficulty might haply been clear, if one of his parts received encouragement, and means of support, to apply himself and his main studies unto so usefull an employment? Surely what he saith of another, might be well said of him, That if such as he was, had the handling of Controversies, Questions would not be so infinite and intricate oft as they are, and being aright stated, some that now fight most eagerly one against another, would be found to agree, being brought at length aright to understand either other.

A second businesse whereunto he applied himself, about which he took much pains, was in the discussion of the matters then in controverfie, for which he so much suffered, about Subscription, the Ceremonies then pressed, the Civil Power, and the Prælatial, in affairs of that nature. Of this kind discourses penned by him were underhand printed, and published as they could be secretly got out and dispersed, these following: A Protestation of Supremacy: The English Puritanism: A Treatise of True and False Worship: Twelve Arguments against the Ceremonies, and conformity thereunto: Of the Nature of things Indifferent. Of which Argument also he wrote in Latine Answer to Master Gabriel Powel, which yet was not published. And it is well known to some yet surviving, that the greatest part of that which was done in that grand Controversie with Doctor Downham concerning Episcopacy, for the main matter of it, came forth of his forge; (howsoever of his labour and paines therein taken, another bare the name, and received the reward of the work) the tart and bitter language only, wherewith it was rather pickled than seasoned, proceeding from another pen somewhat too much steeped in Vinegar and Gall, that which he complaineth of as much milking, in a Letter to a Friend: for he was a man of a very mild and meek spirit, and of a moderate disposition; and how farre forth in his judgment and practice he could have acknowledged, submitted unto, and complied with some kind of Superintendency, or Episcopacy, as it is commonly stiled, may appear by his demands propounded to Master Francis Johnson in his Answer to his Reasons for Separation, of which more anon.

Divers other subjects he had set upon, and made entrance into, but afterward laid aside; whether for want of time and opportunity, or for what other cause, uncertain, among others, of the former sort, was a Refutation in Latine of Dutch Thomsons Diatriba, de amissione & intermissione justificationis & gratia; which upon notice given him of Doctor Abbots undertaking of that task, he surceased; of this latter sort, in English, An Answer to Master Hookers Ecclesiasticall Polity, a work so much cried up, and

and admired by the most; and it were greatly to be wished, that he had had life and leasure (had the Lord seen it good) to have gone through with it: but the Lord had otherwise disposed.

His Zeal against Sectaries and Separatists.

In the third and last place, amidst these his labours about, and suffering for those controverted matters, he bent his forces as much also another way; to wit, against Sectaries and Separatists. To this purpose he had divers bickerings with them, and with some of the chief leaders among them, both by Conferences with them, and by writings against them, and the courses taken by them, whereby many were stayed from going those wayes, and some also reclaimed and brought back again. Among other, at the request of a Gentleman of Lincolns - Inne, (for the stay of some that were staggering, and warping that way, that one Master Clifton had gone before them, seduced by Master Smith sometime Fellow of Christs Colledge, who had thrice been baptized) having imparted to him a Relation in writing, of what had past between Smith and Clifton, who by that their mutuall Collation pretended, as upon good and just grounds, being convict in conscience, to have past over to him; he wrote a large Discourse, wherein he discovered a great deal of weaknesse, as well in the Arguments of the one, as in the Answers of the other; thereby making it manifestly to appear, by what slight and ill-wrought twine rather then twist, that might have easily been inapt asunder; Master Clifton had been drawn away, and induced to leave his former station, and abandon his wonted profession; nor was his labour herein without its desired successe with those, for whom it was undertaken: As also thereby he took occasion to write A Defence of the Baptism of Infants, against the same parties. Against Master Francis Johnsons Reasons for Separation, he wrote a Book Entituled, The Unreasonablenesse of Separation, and that upon this occasion. One that was deemed to be a man of an ingenuous disposition, was earnestly solicited by some with whom he conversed, to withdraw from our Congregations, and seeming to be much perplexed with Master Johnsons Arguments, was yet perswaded by some of his discreet Friends, to do nothing inconsiderately in a businesse of that concernment and consequence; but to consider seriously first of it, and have conference with some grave and godly Ministers, such as he deemed as well judicious as consciencious, whereby it might be descried, whether the grounds that he was in this course intended to go upon, were such as would endure triall or no; This advice of theirs was hearkened unto, and choice made by himself of Master Bradshaw and another, whom he conceived to be both understanding and moderate men. The place for conference was agreed upon to be in a common Friends house, and the meeting intended to be very private, not above two or three of that party, besides himself, the two Ministers and those of the house; but such of them whose presence alone he desired, having acquainted divers others of their complices therewith, a multitude of them intruded themselves. Now in regard of such an unexpected company, it was deemed meet to proceed the more warily. And the party in the conference principally concerned, being put to his choice, whether he would Argue or Answer; was willing rather to Argue, and to make use of Master Johnsons Arguments, then to frame others of his own: that which very well pleased those of the separating side, as deeming Master Johnsons Arguments unanswerable. To prevent mis-reports, it was mutually agreed, that two persons, one of either side, should write down each Argument, as it was propounded; and each Answer, as it was returned thereunto; and should read audibly, what had passed in the prosecution of any Argument at the close of it, before entry upon a new, which was accordingly done; and so many of Master Johnsons Reasons discussed as the straits of time would permit; in pursuit whereof was so evidently shewed how how grossely Master Johnson had abused divers passages of Scripture, quoted for proof of those propositions, whereunto he had affixed them, that the whole company of them were exceedingly puzzled with it, and some of them to save their Champions credit, would faine have fastned some fault upon the Printers, but could not well find how to do it.

The evening coming on, the debate ceased for that day: and Copies on either side taken, being read, collated, and interchangeably delivered, the conference was adjourned till afternoon the next day, what time the other Arguments were to be scanned. But the party, whom the businesse concerned, being perswaded by the rest of them, (as it seemed) to desist, did the next morning make known his unwillingnesse for some pretended causes to go on, and so it brake off. Howbeit Master Bradshaw having waded so fare in examination of Master Johnsons Reasons, was much importuned to proceed on therein, and to go through with the rest, considering how needfull a work it was, and how usefull it might prove. Which being at length drawn unto, and that the rather because Master Johnson had fetcht some Arguments from grounds laid by him in that Treatise against Conformity, which stood Master Bradshaw upon therefore to confider of, and give satisfaction unto; that which was drawn up by him, after perusall and approbation of some, on whose judgment he much relied, was by their advice sent over to Master Ames, who with an Epistle of his own prefixed, caused it to be printed in those parts, where he then abode. Neither was there any Reply ever returned unto it, in defence of Master Johnson, either by himself, while he lived, or by any other in his behalf, so long as Master Bradshaw survived; only many years after Master Bradshaws decease, an attempt was made against it by one Master Can of Amsterdam, which was not long after returned back upon its Author by a Friend of the deceased.

And indeed to Separation he was ever very adverse, and to withdrawing from the publick places of Assembly, or from any part of Gods Worship there used. To which purpose shall be related out of his papers in his own words the ensuing passages, delivered by him in a Sermon at Longford on Matth. 5. 1. It is the great mercy of God toward us, that we have no cause to seek the word in deserts and wildernesses, in woods and caves and desolate mountains; but such worthy edifices as these to assemble in, dedicated only to this use. And where Gods people have by publick authority such places as these appointed and allowed ordinarily to assemble and meet in, we are fowly at least to suspect those Assemblies, and the worship done therein, which forsake those places, and fly into woods and deserts. It is true, that among the Jews at this time there was the Temple, and besides sundry Synagogues, answering to these Churches of ours; and which is more, the doors of the Pulpits were generally open to Christ himself; and yet our Saviour often taught in other places, but this was upon extraordinary occasions, such as seldome or never fall out with us; and so carried by our Saviour, that there was no Schisme or Separation made by him, or any of his speciall Disciples or followers, from the Assemblies then established. And after concerning the places of Assembly themselves. It is indeed in honour, that those which are in Authority and ability, should do to the Worship of God, to see that comely and seemly places be dedicated and separated from other common uses thereunto; and it is a disgrace and contempt to Gods Worship, when men that may remedy it, care not how base and contemptible the place of Gods Worship is; when men have not that care of the place, where the holy Assembly of God meets, as they have of their barns and stable. As also concerning some circumstances of Gesture used in them, From Christ sitting to teach, we learn that such externall behavious to follow our Saviours example; that is, in matters not doubtfull, and controversal, at least to conform our selves to such outward fashions as are generally used in these times, and thus Church wherein we live. For example, in the like case; It is the general custom in our Church, that the Ministers nisters preach standing in a seat higher than the People, and bare-headed: and this gesture is no peculiar gesture, but borrowed from the common practice of Orators, and such persons as make speeches to solemn Assemblies. It is meet therefore in such cases, that we should not be singular and odde, but conform to the received fashion of the Church. So that if we should sit and preach as Christ did, we should not conform to Christ; because we should cross that, which was the ground why Christ sate. Lastly, concerning repair to all parts of Gods service, from those words; And his Disciples came to him, &c. This also is a matter of order, that, as much as may be, divine Worship should begin, when the Congregation is assembled and come together. Therefore the Members of an Assembly should make more conscience than usually they do of coming together sooner. I urge this the rather, because it is a general fault in our Assemblies, not committed only by them, that care not which end of Religion goeth forward, but generally of most, that so they come to some part of Gods Worship, it is well enough especially if they can come time enough to the beginning of the Sermon. Hence many times the Minister with the Clerk are fain to perform a great part of the publick Worship of God alone, or with one or two at the most, and the rest of the Church come dropping in one after another at their own leisure, as though the publick prayers of the Church, and reading the Scriptures were a Worship that concerned the Minister, and Clerk only, and not the whole Church. This is the rather related, and here inserted, because not published, to manifest the moderation of the man, notwithstanding so much hard measure as he sustained from the hands of those, who so grievously abused the power they had in those times.

Thus have a rude and crude delination of this blessed and faithfull Servant of Gods course and race, whose life was indeed as a continual peregrination here upon earth; extracted, partly, from Letters written to him by others, communicated, for the better making up of this module, by Master Samuel Hildersham, Pastor of the Church at West Felton in Shropshire, Son to that famous man of pious memory Master Arthur Hildersham, and Master John Bradshaw, at present Minister of the Word at Echingham in Sussex, Son to this worthy Champion of Christ Jesus, both genuine heirs of their Parents best parts; and partly from Relations of his own and others of good credit, his Letters especially to a bosome Friend, whom he was wont from time to time thereby to acquaint with most occurrents of Note that befell him, or did any way concern him, while they lived at a distance. It might have been more exactly and intirely performed, had not some Letters of his been lost, and a bundle of others to him miscarried, torn by Rats in his absence from the place where they lay, the Loss whereof in a Letter he much Laments, and wishes that as many of his Books, to save them, had undergone the like ill-usage.

His death was much lamented, as by all that knew his parts, and how usefull he might farther have been to Gods Church, had the Lord been pleased to Lengthen out the line of his Life; so more especially by the well-affected of that Family, whereunto he had adhered; but in a degree farre above the rest by the head thereof, Mistresse Katharine Redich, the Relict of Master Alexander Redich, deprived now of a second stay, and principal support, for spiritual helps especially, since her Husbands decease; a very tender-hearted Gentlewoman, much addicted to Hospitality, and of very remarkable devotion and piety, Reported by those who were inwardly acquainted with her more retired courses, to have been wont constantly to spend privately twice a day, at several set-times an hour at least, in meditation and prayer, mixed oft with many tears. She, good soul, was so affected with his departure, and so feelingly apprehensive of her own losse thence ensuing, that albeit she survived him about, if not above, some twelve years; yet was it observed by those that conversed with her, that to her dying day, she could very seldome with dry eyes, either speak of him, or hear him spoken ken of by others; that which made divers forbear speaking of him; what they well might, in her presence, for the renewing of her grief. Nor was her hearty affection to him, and due esteem of him manifested in such kind of expressions alone, (wherein, even counterfeits, though not so constantly, yet can at sometimes exceed) but it was made to appear in beneficence to her ability, and in carefull provision to her power for those he left behind him; for what by her Husband was intended, though she met with many obstructions in the pursuit of it, the estate was so entangled, she at length got made good, and settled according to his desire. And for his eldest Son, (for he left three, whereof two yet survive, and a Daughter,) being set apart for a Scholar, she maintained him at Grammar-School, untill he was fitted for the University, and at the University in part also, so long as she lived.

With those in general, among whom he lived, and that knew him but at a distance, he left behind him the estimation of one very studious, humble, plain, honest, loving, free, liberal, charitable and compassionate. Very studious they deemed him, because they seldome saw him walking abroad without a Book in his hand; and reading usually, if alone, in it, as he walked, though he walked commonly somewhat fast, being therein farthered through the quicknesse of his eye, and the steadinesse of his hand. And for his humility, it so readily offered it self to the eye in his whole deportment, that they could not but take notice of it, reading it as written in text Letters, therein, that saw ought at all in him.

A plain man he was, as Jacob, without Welt or Gard; and a plain-dealing Man, as Nathaniel, without craft or guile; free from all Courtship, either for counterfeit, or complement. Among the meaner sort he was the more beloved, because, though his means were but mean and scant, yet they perceived him to be of a free and liberal disposition; and were willing therefore to work with him ordinarily before any other, because he used to give them somewhat above their hire or agreement, which few others did. His charitable mind and tender-heartednesse many waies manifested it self. It hath been known, that he hath borrowed money, when he had none about him, or by him, to relieve some that have been in want, and to have been as carefull to repay it, as forward to part with it. His Char-ty.

While he was at Chatham, some gallies that had sometime been built for service, and lay along time after there idle, being found unusefull for our Seas; yet being than on foot, and some put into them; he walked down one day with some company to see the manner of them: which when he had viewed, it seemed to him so dismal a sight, to see men, Christian-men, put to such kind of servitude, that he could not endure to behold it without tears, and having given them a little money, so left them, returning back in a very sad and pensive moode. Yea, he was one of those, whom Solomon speaks of, whose commiseration reacheth even to the bruit beasts, which he could not endure to see unmercifully used: and would oft say he was perswaded that men took too much liberty to themselves in killing and misusing some, even contemptible creatures, without cause. Riding homeward sometime with his Son behind him, whom he had taken out with him, the waies being bad and deep, and the beast that bare them travelling heavily and wearisomely, he took occasion thereby to enter into a discourse to the lad behind him, what hardship the poor unreasonable creature was put to, to be serviceable to us; what misery such sustained for mans sin; and so affectionately he spake of it, that to his Son, whom he spake to, he seemed to weep with it.

He may be thought to have had some presage of his end approaching, before his Last Accessse to the City. For it is reported by his Son now in the Ministry, and treading in his Fathers steps, that being very earnest in soliciting of him, that he might then go up to London with him, which since he sucked, it seems he had never seen, he willed him, not to be so desirous sirous to see London; for whensoever he saw London, he should see it to his cost. And to his great grief indeed he did, coming up with his Mother, a heavy Widow, not long after his Fathers departure hence, and funerall rites here performed.

Doctor
Halls character of him.

We shall close all, with that free and ingenious Character, which that Illustrious late Bishop of Norwich, his old, true and loving Friend (he is pleased so to stile himself in some Letters to him) truly giveth of himself: He was saith he, of a strong brain, and a free spirit; not suffering himself for small differences of judgement to be alienated from his Friends; to whom notwithstanding his seeming austerity, he was very pleasing in his conversation, being full of Witty and harmlesse Urbanity: he was very strong and Beger in arguing, hearty in his friendship, regardlesse of the World, a despiser of Complement, a Lover of Reality, full of digested Learnings, and Excellent Notions; a painfull Labourer in Gods Work, and now, no doubt, gloriously rewarded.

This Life was drawn up by my Reverend, Learned, and worthy Friend Mr. Thomas Gataker of Rederith.

M. STOCK

The Life of Master Richard Stock, who dyed Anno Christi 1626.

Richard Stock was born at Yerk, and after he was thoroughly furnished with Countrey Learning, he went to Cambridge at the age of Eighteen or Nineteen years, as most in those Northern parts in those times used to do, where he was admitted into St. Iohns Colledge, and after a while was chosen Scholar of the House. At this time Doctor Whitaker was Master of Saint Iohns (under whom his younger Brother had a Sifers place) who favoured Master Stock very much for his ingenuity, industry and proficiency in his Studies.

There he remained till he had taken his degree of Master of Arts, at which time he had had a fellowship, but that his Countrey was full, whereupon he left the Colledge, and lived some space of time with Sir Edmund or Edward Cope, at Cannons Ashby in Northamptonshire, from whence he afterwards removed to the Lady Elene at Banton on the water in Gloucestershire, to be her Chaplain.

Before he left the University he was designed to a Fellowship in St. Marys Colledge, then intended and beginning to be built; but having long discontinued before the building was accomplished, he had then no mind to return to the University again.

His Birth and Breeding.

His removal from Cambridge.

But

His coming
to London.

But coming up to London he was chosen Lecturer at Austins in Watling-street, after which he preached twice every Lords day at Mildreds Bred-street, during the life of an old man who had the charge there: Whence he removed a little higher to All-hallows, where he continued preaching constantly, one Mr. Edmunds retaining the charge, but by reason of age and infirmities accompanying it, unable to Officiate and discharge the place himself. His Ministry was so gratefull and acceptable to the people, that after the death of Master Edmunds, the Pastorall charge of that place was conferred upon him, which he held to his dying day.

His marriage.

Being seled there he Married a Wife yet surviving, by whom he had three Daughters.

His character by Mr Cataker.

He was a grave and Reverend Father in the English Church, a faithful Minister and servant of Jesus Christ, and a vigilant Pastor over his Congregation. His Life and courses and constant Labour in the Work of the Lord were well known through the whole City of London; wherein he constantly continued the Work of his Ministry by the space of about thirty two years.

His study
of Humanity.

During his abode in St. Johns Colledge in Cambridge, even from his first beginnings, he was of eminent Note for his unwearied Industry, and singular Proficiency in those Studies of Humanity, that are as Hand-Maids to Divinity, and help to lay a good ground for any future Profession. So that his Care was to intertwine Piety and Humanity the one with the other, that as Web and Woof they ran on even along together, through the whole course of his Studies. Nor was he only careful of this Practise himselfe, but

Heb. 10. 24.
'Εἰς τὸ κατασκευάσαι

(according to that of the Apostle, Observe one another to whet on to Godliness and well doing;) he was no less forward to incite others to the like Practise: Yea, not only to incite them thereunto, but to assist them therein, and to afford what helps he could (which well also he could do) unto any that were desirous, yea or but willing to embrace them, so that many of his Friends had Cause to bless God that ever they come acquainted with him. In a word, whilest he stayed in the Colledge, he gave before hand e're he came to it, evident signes of one likely to prove a skilful Master-Builder in Gods Work, and a winner of many Souls unto God.

His painfulness.

Nor was he one of those rath-ripe Wits, that promise fair in the Blossome, but fail in the Fruit; that like Comets, blaze brighter than the fixed Stars for a time, but after a while vanish and come to naught, the matter of them being either wholly spent or dispersed. But his proceedings in publick were correspondent to his beginnings in private. When it pleased God to call him out, and to set him apart to that employment that he had ordained him to before, he proved a painful and faithful Minister of Jesus Christ, a skilful and powerful dispenser of Gods Word. And if any proof hereof be desired, Not to insist upon his constant and incessant employments with generall approbation and applause of those that were Religious and judicious, continued for so many years (as aforesaid) together, nor a Sabbath intermitted wherein (if health served) he preached not twice, either in his own charge (where he was most frequent) or elsewhere abroad, besides his Catechizing of the younger sort in the week dayes at certain times, and other such Offices as to the Pastorall Function are necessarily annexed, and are privately to be performed; wherein also he was no lesse diligent than in the execution of his publick Ministry. Nor to insist (I say) upon this (which yet were sufficient proof of it) as the Apostle saith of the Corinthians, You are the seal of my Apostleship, and my Letters Testimonial. So may it well be said of this reverend man of God, Many Christian Souls having professed themselves to have had their first effectual Calling and Conversion from him, the like whereunto few others could say at that time; Besides the multitudes of those which have acknowledged themselves to have been edified, built

built up, and bettered by him, are the seal of his Calling, and of Christ speaking in and by him, and not verball or vocall, but real Letters testimoniall of the efficacy of his Ministry, through Gods blessing upon the same.

One faith that the Apostles were like Fishermen, the succeeding Ministers like Huntsmen. The Apostles like Fishermen that caught many at one draught: The succeeding Ministers like Huntsmen, that with much toil and clamour running up and down all day, scarce take one Doe or Hare ere night. And such is the hard condition of many of Gods Servants, that notwithstanding the faithfull and painfull discharge of their duty, yet are enforced to complain with the Prophet, Who hath believed our report? and, I have laboured in vain. Scarce able to produce, or instance in any one, of whom they can with some good ground of assurance presume that they have gained; at least him unto God. But well might this worthy Servant of Christ, through Gods blessing upon his labours, stand out and say, not of one or two, but of troops, in the words of the same Prophet, Behold I, and the children that God hath given me. And with the Apostle, These have I begotten unto God by the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

Yea more then that, many famous lights in Gods Church, and faithfull Ministers of his Word do professe to have lighted their candles at his Lamp; yea some of them to have received their first beginnings, not of Light only, but of spiritual Life and Grace (without which all Light, be it never so great, is no Light, but meer Darknes) from his Ministry. It's no small honour for a man to win, if it were but any one Soul (He hath saved a Soul, saith Saint James, as a matter worthy the glorying in.) For to win a Souls, is to win more than the whole World besides is worth. But what an honour then is it to be, not a winner of a Soul, but a winner of such as prove winners of Souls; and so by winning of some one immediately, to be a mediate winner of many others by him? They shall shine (saith he) as the Heavens, that instruct; and they that Convert others, as the Stars. And how gloriously then (suppose we) doth this blessed Man of God shine now in the Kingdom of God, that was an instructor of those that are instructors of others, that was a Converter of those that are Converters of others themselves!

Many then did this worthy Man (as the holy Ghost saith of John the Baptist) win unto God. Many he won, though all he could not; that was more than the Apostle Paul was able to do. The Jews opposed themselves against his Ministry, and Blasphemed, Act. 18. 12 and 2 Thess. 3. 2. All men (saith he) have not Faith. But yet many he won, and his desire and endeavour (with the same Apostle) was to win all, his own Flock especially, of whom he used to protest, That is was more comfort to him to win one of them than twenty others. But some refractory Spirits (as what Minister doth not?) He met withal, that would not be reclaimed; that by their cross-grain carriage and behaviour, were as Thorns in his Eyes, and as Goads in his Sides, and proved a vexation of Heart to this faithful Servant of Christ. But against such Persons, not only the dust of the Ministers feet, but the sweat of his Brows, and Tears of his Eyes, and his strength wasted amongst them, and his Spirits spent upon them, shall one day rise up in judgement against them, to make their Doom the heavier, if it be not prevented by speedy and unfeigned Repentance.

But because a man may win others, and yet lose himself, he may save others, and yet not save himself, They may beget life in others that have none themselves. The Word may work by a man, and yet not work in him. He may be like a stone gutter (saith St. Austin) or a leaden pipe, that conveyeth water into a Garden, yet receiveth no benefit thereby it self. Or like the hand on the high-way that pointeth others the way, but never walks thither it self. Or like an Harp (saith the Psalmist) that maketh others melody, or a Trumpet that sounds loud, but heareth nothing.

What

man.

What makes a Minister.

His manner

nothing it self. Or like to the water in Baptism (saith Gregory) that helps men to Heaven-ward, but afterwards is poured down the sink it self. He may preach to others, and not preach to himself. He may convert others, and yet himself prove acast-away. Though yet indeed it's seldome seen, that much good is done where a due consent is wanting between tongue and hand, between lip and life. It was far otherwise with this reverend man of God; he was none of those that say and do not; but as he taught so he wrought; his Doctrine and practice concurred, and went hand in hand together. His actions were, though silent, yet reall and affectual Sermons of that which he Preached in the Pulpit. The course of his life was uniform with the tenour of his teaching; and both joyning and concentrating in one, were a means to draw on many; who by the one alone probably had not been so easly won to Christ.

In a word, for his teaching, many that were his constant Hearers, have given him a large testimony; and they that knew his conversation have done the like for his life. He was not a flash, one of those which shew all in a Sermon, or that spend all upon one curious good work that they mind to make their Master-Piece. But both in his life and teaching he held on such a constant tenour, that the most men, especially such as were wise and judicious, were acquainted with either, the more they revered and esteemed him for both.

There are two things (saith one) that make a compleat man, Integrity and judgment; the one whereof is but lame and maimed without the other; and yet in few they use to meet together; yet there was an happy conjunction of them both in this worthy man. One sign whereof will appear by the frequent practice of many, who made use of him for to be an overseer of their last wills, and craved his assistance by way of direction for the disposall of their outward estates (and all know how cautious men use to be in that kind.) Another testimony of it was by those Reverend Brethren of the Ministry, as well as others; who either by Letters or otherwise, out of all parts of this Realm, did usually seek to him, as to one more than ordinarily able to give them satisfaction for the resolution of their doubts.

These two then made him a compleat man; but there is something more required to make a compleat Minister, viz. That he be able to speak his mind sirly (for what use can there be of a mute Messenger) and that he dare do it freely (for of whom is courage and freedom of speech more required than of Gods Messengers?) Nor was Mr. Stock defective in either.

For as for the former, how well able he was, not to expresse only, but to urge and presse too; not to confirm alone, but to commend also that that he delivered with clear method, sound proof, choice words, fit phrases, pregnant similitudes, plentifull illustrations, pithy perswasions, sweet insinuations, powerfull enforcements, allegations of antiquity, and variety of good literature; that both the learnedest might receive satisfaction from him, and the very meanest and dullest might also reap benefit by him, and so as might well leave a deep impression in the hearts and minds of the Hearers, they cannot be ignorant, that for any space of time heard him. In a word, in this kind he was such an one as many strove to imitate, but few attained to equalize him.

Again, Because it is in vain to be able to speak to good purpose, if a man dare not use his tongue: if (as one said of the Eretrians) he be like the sword-fish that hath a sword in his head, but no heart in his body: or like a cowardly companion, that carries a weapon to ruffle with, but dares not draw or make use of it, though just occasion be offered. For his freedom of speech therefore in reproving of sin, and that even to the faces of the greatest, whether in publick or private, when occasion required; many even now living are able to testify, and some accidents made it more Publickly known, then his desire was that it should have been.

He was very zealous and earnest for the reformation of some prophane-
 tions of the Sabbath. Wherein he prevailed also for the alteration of something offensive in that kind, as well with the main body of the City, as with some particular Societies, as for their meetings upon St. Thomas day. He perswaded also some of the companies to put off their solemn Festivals from Mundaies to Tuesdaies, that so the Lords day might not be prophaned by their preparations for those Feasts.

His prudence also appeared in his order of Catechizing the young persons of his Parish, by examining them apart, the youths on one day, and the maids on another. The riper and forwarder first in the presence of the ruder and rawer, and the ruder and rawer apart by themselves, when the former were departed, that so they might reap what fruit they could by hearing the others; and yet might receive no discouragement by being heard of them.

His prudence.

Neither was his pious diligence and care lesse seen in the Religious instruction and education of those that were under his private charge, as Children and Servants, for whom his care was greater to provide for their souls than their bodies, for their spiritual than for their temporal estate (yet not neglecting that neither) by bringing them up in the nature and fear of the Lord. In a word, time and speech would sooner fail then matter, If I should proceed to write of all the gifts, graces and praise-worthy qualities of this eminent servant of Christ.

His care of his Family.

In his publick Ministry his usuall manner was upon occasion to quote the sayings of many of the Fathers, which some taking exceptions at, he thus Apologized for himself, If any (saith he) take exceptions at my acknowledging of Fathers (as some have taken offence at my using of Reasons to confirm the Doctrine, but with very little Reason as I suppose) I must pray them, to give me leave to use them, till I can see that unlawfulness which they affirm to be in the practice, and to censure me in charity for the use of them, as I do them for not not using them. I will look as well to my heart in the use of them, as God shall enable me; and when I shall see the hurt of them, I will endeavour as much to avoid them. In the mean time I will make as much use as I can of them, to Edifie the Church of God.

His Apology for quoting the Fathers.

In his younger dayes being called to Preach at Pauls Crosse, he dealt somewhat plainly and freely in taxing some abuses in the City in unequall Ratings, whereby the meaner sort were over-burthened, whilst the rich and great ones escaped with more ease. This was ill taken by many of them, who checked him as over-rash for dealing in such matters, calling him a green-head: but in his latter daies being called to preach at the Lord Maiors Election, he fell again upon the same subject, and told them a gray-head spake now what a green-head had done formerly.

His faithfulness in reproving.

But to draw to an end together with his end, The end of his labours, but the beginning of his rest; The end of his work, but receipt of his reward. In the aforementioned and such like employments, publick and private, he spent his time: He spent his strength like a Torch or Taper, wasting and consuming himself for the profit and benefit of others, having his work with God then, and his Reward for it from God afterwards. And for these employments sake was it principally, that he desired recovery of Health and Strength: Unto the performance whereof also (though therein injurious to himself, and contrary to his own desires) he oft strained himself, and that in the midst of his infirmity and weakness, not to uncertain hazard only, but to evident impeaching and impairing of either, What is the sign (saith Hzekias, when he was promised recovery) that I shall go up to the House of the Lord? As desiring continuance of Life, and recovery of Health for no one end more than that. And therefore also was it that this worthy man was desirous of Recovery, that he might repair to Gods House again, and that he might return to Gods Work again. To which purpose the very last Lords Day before his disease, having after many relapses recovered a little Strength, he made shift to get out to a Neighbour Congregation, there to joyn with Gods People in publick performance of such solemn Service of God, as that day is usually spent and imployed in. And having held out with them to the end in both parts of the Day, he rejoyced much therein that he was able so to do, the rather because he thereby conceived some good hope, that he should be strong enough ere long to return to his wonted Work and Employment again. But the Lord saw it better (for his will appears by his work) to put an end to his incessant Labours here, and to translate him to the Place of his endless Rest elsewhere, and that upon the twentieth day of April, Anno Christi 1626. having been Preacher at All - Hallows Breadstreet during the space of thirty two years, where he was an example to his People in Word, in conversation, in Charity, in Spirit, in Faith, in Purity. But as one saith, An exact Face is seldom drawn but with much disadvantage; so neither is his Character, so that we may well say as one doth of Basil, There wanted but his own Tongue to commend him with.

His Death.

1 Tim. 4. 12.

THE

The Life of Master Richard Rothwel, who dyed
Anno Christi, 1627.

Richard Rothwel was born in Lancashire, at, or near Bolton in the Moors, about the year of our Lord, 1563. After he took the Ministry upon him, and God gave him another heart, he disposed his temporal estate amongst his friends, and ex vi Evangelicæ Civ, 1 Cor. 9. 11, 14. He lived of the Gospel.

His Birth and Education.

His education was in the Schools, and afterward in Cambridge; in the one he attained to an exact knowledge of the Tongues, (especially Greek and Hebrew, wherein he was a Critick) and in the other of the Arts, so that he became a skilful-Linguist, subtil-Disputant, Copious Orator, and of a deep insight into any kind of knowledge, Humane or Divine.

In this first course of his studies appeared presently to his observers, the buds and blossomes of that fame which after he attained unto; for he had a prompt wit, a quick apprehension, a clear understanding, a sound judgement, a ready speech, and a strong memory. All these seldome meet in one man, but did in him very eminently, and were improved by diligent study, which (out of a desire of Learning and knowledge) he continued to his last without weariness.

His Constitution of body, and morall endowments of mind, were great props and supporters to his intellectual habits, Gratior est virtus veniens à corpore pulchro. This is not the Ordinary Lot of Scholars; He was tall, well set, of great strength of body and activity; of a stern countenance, of invincible courage, of approved valour, and of a very goodly and majestick presence: Grief; nor any misery could ever break him, but joy would presently melt him into tears.

He was of a generous spirit and deportment, yet withall very humble and Courteous; His Language was sententious and proverbial. I have heard many others say, what I must needs my self, Nunquam illi accedo quin doctior evadam, I never came to him, but I went the Learner from him. He had a great Dexterity in Communicating his mind to another, and speaking to his understanding; God gave him a great in-let into the hearts of men.

After many years spent in the University, he betook himself to the Ministry, and was ordained Presbyter by Doctor Whitgift, then Archbishop of Canterbury, who forbade him meddling with interpretation of Moses Types, the Book of Canticles, Daniel, and the Revelation. Which then he thought himself, as the Bishop did, were not so usefull for him to study as some other Scriptures.

His entering into the Ministry.

But alas! all these natural dispositions, intellectual habits, personal deportments were but as so many weapons in the hands of a mad man: Judge how able he was by these to resist the truth; For he remained some years without any change of heart, or sensible work of grace upon his soul, but preached learnedly as they called it, and lived vainly; abhorring debauchery, and debauched companions, nions, through the height of his spirit, but gave himself to hunting, bowlling, shooting, more then became a Minister of the Gospel, and sometimes he would swear Faith and Troth, and in his passion greater blasphemies. I have heard him tell that there were two Knights in Lancashire fallen out, and a great fewd betwixt them; That the one had a very good Park with store of Deer; That the other had excellent good Fish-ponds, and store of Fish: He robbed the Park of the one, and presented what he got to the other; and the Fish-ponds of the other, and presented the Fish to his Adversary; thus he pleased himself in the daies of his vanity, with such kind of follies. In doing this one night, the Keeper met with him, his Dog having killed a Buck; at the fall of the Buck, the Keeper came in with his sauchion and staff, and met Master Rothwel who had a staff also; They fell from words to blows; He got the Keeper down, bound him by the thumbs, and drew him up to his full height, that he could but touch the ground with his toes, and so left him tied to a tree till next morning, where others found him and loosed him. At length God pleased, who separated him from his Mothers womb, as he did Paul, and called him by his grace, to reveal his Son in him. Which because it was famous, and he himself afterwards proved the meanes of the Conversion of so many, I shall set it down, as I remember, I have heard him speak it.

The means,
and manner
of his Conversion.

He was playing at Bowles amongst some Papists and vain Gentlemen, upon a Saturday, somewhere about Rachdale, in Lancashire; there comes in to the green to him one Master Midgley, a grave and godly Minister of Rachdale, whose praise is great in the Gospel, though far inferiour to Master Rothwel in parts and learning; he took him aside and fell into a large commendation of him, at length told him what pittie it was, that such a man as he should be a companion for Papists, and that upon a Saturday, when he should be preparing for the Sabbath-day. Master Rothwel sleighted his words, and checked him for his meddling.

Power of Prayer.

The good old man left him, went home and prayed privately for him; Master Rothwel when he was retired from that company, could not rest, Master Midgley's words struck so deep in his thoughts; The next day he went to Rachdale Church to hear Master Midgley, where it pleased God to blesse that Ordinance so, as Master Rothwel was by that Sermon brought home to Christ. He came after Sermon to Master Midgley, thanked him for his reproof, and besought his direction and prayers, for he was in a miserable condition of nature; and under the spirit of bondage he lay for a time, till afterwards, and by Master Midgley's hands also he received The Spirit of Adoption, wherewith he was so sealed, that he never lost his assurance to his dying. Though he was a man Subject to many Temptations, the Devil assaunting him very much, yet God was mightily with him, that out of his own experience he was able to comfort many. He esteemed and counted Master Midgley ever afterward for his Spiritual Father. This makes me think upon Augustines speech to God, when he came to hear Ambrose preach: non ut ad Doctorem veni (but upon another account) ad eum; per te dusebar nescius, ut ad te per eum sciens ducerer. So did the Lord by Master Midgley's plain kind of teaching, put forth the evidence of his Spirit upon this mighty and learned Rabbi.

Confess. 1. 5.
c. 13, 14.

His going into Ireland.

Whether it was before or after this his Conversion that he went a Soldier, and Chaplain to a Regiment under the Earl of Essex into Ireland, I know not; but there he was, and did very great things. And certainly wisdom and courage were so eminent in him, that there were few of his Calling his equals, I think none at all his Superiours.

He now becomes another man, forsakes all his wonted courses and companions, preacheth in another manner than formerly, opens the depths of Satan, and deceitfulness of the heart, so as he was called the Rough Hewer. He had the power of God that went with his Ministry, when he preached the Law

Law to make men tremble, yea sometimes to cry out in the Church: and when he preached the Gospel, he was another Barnabas, and had great skill in comforting afflicted consciences.

The efficacy of his Ministry.

He studied now the point of Non-conformity, which was as the joynt in Abahs armour, through which the Prelates hit, and deprived so many godly and able Ministers in those times. In these Controversies he was so well versed, that he satisfied many, and silenced any that disputed with him. He was so fixed in his judgement, that he would never either marry, (expecting daily persecution; and the word he used in all his Books, was Persecutio pignus futura felicitatis;) nor take any Benefice, (though divers great livings were proffered him) because he would still say, My head is too big to get into a Church-door. But he betook himself first to a Chappel in Lancashire as a Lecturer, and afterward (to decline the storm of the Prelates) to be a Domestic Chaplain to the Earl of Devonshire, and at that time I first knew him, and came (I beseech God) acquainted with him.

The place of his first employment.

There now ran nothing more in his mind; but why the Bishop should forbid him preaching upon those Scriptures before mentioned; and he began to conceive that there was sure something there, could he find it, which would mightily batter down their Hierarchy; He prayed therefore much to God; (wherein he was mighty) and studied them; and God opened those mysterious passages of his Book to him more than to other men; that he seldom preached abroad out of any other Scriptures, and did write an exact Commentary upon Moses Types, which he unveiled with very much profit and delight to the Reader: But that Book is lost to the great losse of Gods Church thereby.

The study of the Prophecies.

Learned and godly Master Cotton enquired of me whether that or any thing else might not be found amongst his papers after his death: I told him there was little found, but what was in Characters. He prayed me to send him what I could gather, to Boston, where men were that were expert in Characters. I did so, but I believe they could make nothing of them. That and some other of his learned and judicious labours he hath lent out, I suppose, and I fear they will not be recovered. Learned men that have seen them, judge them a rare treasure. He had some contests with the Prelates, especially with Bishop Neal then of Litchfield, afterwards of Durham.

His contests with the Bishops.

At length he came to spend most part of his time in the Bishoprick of Durham, by means of an honourable and Elect Lady, the Lady Bowes, afterwards the Lady Darcy in the North. Of whom it was truly preached at her Funeral, (Alas, that it was at her Funeral) Whosoever this Gospel shall be preached in the whole world, there shall also this, that this woman hath done, be told for a memorial of her. She gave about one thousand pounds per annum, to maintain Preachers where there were none, nor any means for them, and all her Preachers were silenced, men by reason of Non-conformity: Such as Master Baynes, Master Dike, &c. She would lay out all her interest to get them their liberty, and then she would dispose of them, where there needed in the North, or in the Peak in Darbyshire, or other places, and allow them pensions; O! That God would raise out of the ashes of this Phoenix some more such Mothers in Israel. Sir William Bowes her husband dying, his Funerals were kept at Bernards-Castle, where he had some honour: Master Dike (Father of the Writers of that name) was then her household Chaplain, and went into the North to that Funeral; at his return he represented the state of the people destitute of a Minister to my Lady, who would have sent him thither; but he told her he durst not venture on so surly a People, but commended Master Rothwel to her. She sent to him, then at the Earl of Devonshires house, and proffered him this employment; His answer was, he would go thither, and if the people called him, he would then accept of her motion.

Mat. 26. 13.

The Lady Bowes, her great Charity.

At his first dayes labour, they all desired him; he returned to the Lady, and told her he would go; she replied, though for their sakes she was glad, yet she was afraid to send him; understanding that they were of a fierce disposition, and having never heard the Gospel, might deal unkindly with him; he answered, Madam, if I thought I should never meet the devil there, I would never come there; he and I have been at odds in other places, and I hope we shall not agree there.

He desired to have me with him, and with much ado prevailed; and so I (blessed God) he not only fitted me for the University, but was a means to bring me to the first saving knowledge of Christ; I remember, and shall do ever, the first Sermon and point which God blessed to my soul for that purpose. I was about eight years his bed-fellow and eye witness of the great success he had in his Ministry there, and over all the Countrey, where he was worthily called, The Apostle of the North. The Lady allowed him forty pounds per annum, and such as God wrought upon by his Ministry contributed to him, but he would not have a penny from any other.

His self-denial.

There was once in his absence collected 30. li. by Sir Talbot Bowes, that lived there, from the people; but when he returned and knew it, he caused it to be restored to the Parties, that gave it, and told them, He sought them, not theirs.

His patience, and courage.

His carriage amongst his people.

At his first entrance he had great opposition, and sometimes was way-laid to take away his life; but he overcame all that with his patience and courage, and at length his greatest enemies were afraid of him; and few Sermons, but it was believed, he gained some souls.

His manner was to spend the forenoon at his Studies, and the afternoon in going through his Parish, and conferring with his people; in which, as he excelled, so he gained much upon them; and within four years had so many judicious and experimental Christians, that they came from London, York, Richmond, New-Castle, and many other places, to see the order of his Congregation: And many lewd Gentlemen came oft, ten or twelve Miles to hear him, to carp and get somewhat to accuse him: Many of which God took hold on, and they returned, some Convinced, and some Converted.

His last sickness.

Not long after, (saith mine Author) I went to the University, and after eight years continuance there, came over into England upon some opportunities, and stayed about halfe a year, ere I returned. When I came to Mansfield in Nottingham-shire, I found him there their Minister, and sick unto the Death; at my coming he revived, and in the strength of that joy so far recovered, that within a week he went about the Town with me to divers places; but relapsed, and engaged me to Preach for him once the next Sabbath following, and in the afternoon at Mansfield Wood-house, within half a mile of Mansfield. On Fryday we looked for no life from him, he was almost past his understanding; There came a Vicar of Mansfield, one Master Brittaine to see him, and desired him now, that he was not like to live, to tell him what he thought of the Ceremonies, he knew he was learned, and therefore would be glad, to be informed by him. Master Rothwel either understood not, or minded not what he said, but answered sometimes Yes, sometimes No, as he apprehended. Master Brittain went away telling him he was satisfied, and reported that Master Rothwel recanted his judgement of Non-conformity.

He foretels his Death.

The next day [Saturday] he had some lightning, and sat up in his chair, and discoursed freely, cheerfully and heavenly all that and the next day; some sent to enquire on the Sabbath how he did, he answered, I am well, and shall be well shortly; and whispering with me, said, Do you know my meaning? I shall be with Christ ere long; but do not tell them so. He caused me to repeat my Sermon preached in the forenoon for him, after which which, with tears in his eyes he laid his hands on my head, and lifted up his eyes to Heaven, and with a short Prayer blessed me: Then he bad me go to preach at Manfield Wood-house, and tarry there all night, (for he had promised it to one Master Dund there;) but to be sure to come when he sent for me: This he did next morning about six a clock, when I came I found him in pangs of death, he had not known nor spoken to any in an hour before: The chamber was full, and one was praying for him; after Prayer, I spake to him, he turned about his head, took me by the hand, and bade me pray, pray; I desired a Reverend Minister to go to prayer again; Master Rothwel said, Pray you, pray you; I did so: after that he smiled, Now (saies he) I am well: Happy is he that hath not bowed a knee to Baal: He bad us sing Psal. 120. he sang a while, but in the singing of the Psalm he died; Anno Domini 1627. and in the year of his age 64.

His Death.

Thus have I given you as true an account as I could of this famous Champion of Christ, who notwithstanding his Non-conformity, may be called with Austin, Hereticorum Mollus, The Hammer of Hereticks, and with Ambrose, Orbis terrarum (Anglicarum) oculus. The eye as bright as any other in the English Orbe.

Two things (amongst many others) I think worthy the inserting into his life, which have been omitted in the fore-going story.

The one is a strange sickness and recovery he had once at Bernards Castle. His sickness was a Vertigo capitis, he would have forty fits at least in an hour, and every one of them accompanied with mischievous temptations, which when the fit was over, he dictated, and I writ down; these held him about three weeks, in which time he had the advice of learned Physicians from London, York, New-Castle, Durham, and other places, they all jumped in their judgments, imputing it to much study, fasting, and inward trouble of spirit; their Prescriptions wrought kindly, but removed not his disease: He desired divers Christians to pray for him on a day prefixed, and promised to joyn with them as well as he could, with some others that should be with him, assuring them, That he was confident that disease would not be removed but by Prayer and Fasting. The morning of that day he had a fit continued four hours together upon him, and the devil set upon him all that while, with most dreadfull temptations, telling him he would make him the Idol of Religion, and every man should reproach it for his sake, that had before by his means looked towards it: That he should never preach more, but should Blaspheme the name of God he had preached, with many like suggestions: God gave him courage, comfort and Victory over them all. The devil told him if he did fast and pray that day, he would torment and hinder him, &c. We met at the time appointed, and Master Rothwel would needs have me to perform the duty, which through Gods goodnesse I did; and the devil was not permitted to hinder or interrupt him or us, and God heard our prayers, so that he had never a fit after that, and the Sabbath-sevensnight following he preached, but after many wrestlings with Satan, who told him he would make him mad, and before all the people in the pulpit make him a scorn if he did adventure to preach; Nevertheless his Faith in Christ overcame his fear of Satan, and he preached with great assistance and comfort upon that text, Psal. 116. 9. I will walk before the Lord in the land of the living, Nevertheless that sickness did so weaken his brain that ever after he was enclining to some infirmities, Which love must cover.

His strange sickness, and recovery.

Satans Malice.

The power of prayer.

The other is a relation which I had from himself, and from divers others to whom the story was known, that are yet alive: As well as I can recollect it, it is thus: There was one John Fox living about Nottingham, who had no more learning then enabled him to write and read: This man was Possessed with a devil, who would violently throw him down, and take take away the use of every member of his body, which was turned as black as pitch in those fits, and then spake with an audible voice in him, which seemed sometimes to be heard out of his belly, sometimes out of his throat, and sometimes out of his mouth, his lips not moving. He lay thus (if I mistake not) some years: many prayers were put up to God for him, and great resort, especially of godly Ministers to him: amongst the rest Master Bernard of Batcomb, then of Worktop; and Master Tangle of Truswel, betwixt whom and John Fox, I have seen divers passages in writing, he relating by pen his temptations, and they giving answers when he was stricken dumb.

As Master Rothwel was riding to see him, the Devil told all that were in the House, Tonder comes Rothwel: but I will make a fool of him before he goes. The people looked forth, and saw him coming about a quarter of a mile from the house. As soon as he entered the Room, the Devil said, Now Rothwel is come: and as some say spake thus. Rothwel, Thou sayest there is no possession, what thinkest thou now? Here is a man opens not his lips, and yet he speaketh? And after a while he further said:

Devil: Say nothing to me of this man, for I tell thee he is damned, and he added thereto many fearfull Blasphemies.

Rothwel: Thou art a lyer, and the father of lies; nor art thou so well acquainted with the mind of God concerning this man, which makes thee thus to torment him, therefore I believe thee not, I believe he shall be saved by Jesus Christ.

Devil: He is a murderer, and thou knowest no murderer must come into Heaven.

Rothwel: Thou liest again, for David murdered, and is in Heaven; and the Jews with wicked hands crucified the Lord of Glory, yet both Christ prayed for them, and Peter exhorts them to repentance, that their sins may be blotted out.

Devil: But this man hath not, cannot, shall not repent.

Rothwel: If he had not, thou wouldst not have told him so; but if he have not, I believe God will give him repentance, and thou shalt not be able to hinder it.

Devil: Thou art a murderer thy self, and yet talkest thou thus?

Rothwel: Thou liest again, I have fought the Lords Battels against his known enemies, the idolatrous and bloody Papiests in Ireland, Rebels to the Queen my Sovereign, by whose authority I bore armes against them; otherwise I have killed no man.

Devil: ( Sware and blasphemed ) Thou didst murder one this day, as thou camest hither, and there is one behind thee will justifie it.

Rothwel looked over his shoulder, and with that the devil set up a hideous laughter, that nothing could be heard for a great while, and then said:

Devil: Look you now, did not I tell you I would make Rothwell a Fool? and yet it is true, thou didst Murder one this day; for as thou camest over the Bridge (which he named) there I would have killed thee, and there thy Horse trod upon a Flie and killed it.

Master Rothwels Horse you must know stumbled there, it seems the Devil had Power to cause it, but without hurt either to Master Rothwel or his Horse.

Rothwel: Thou hast oft beguiled me, I hope God will in time give me Wisdome to discern, and Power to withstand all thy Delusions; and he it is that hath delivered me out of thy Hands, and will I doubt not also deliver this poor man.

The Devil Blasphemed fearfully, quoted many Scriptures out of the old and

and New Testament, both in Hebrew and in Greek, cawled and played the Critick, and backed his Allegations with Sayings out of the Fathers and Poets in their own Language, which he readily Quoted, so that the Company Trembled to hear such things from one that understood no Learning, and that moved neither Tongue nor Lip.

Master Rothwel was mightily enabled by God to detect the Devils Sophistry.

Devil: What stand I talking with thee? All men know thou art BOLD ROTHWEL, and fearest no body, nor carest for words, therefore I will talk to thee no more, (that name he carried to his grave; They would say, That is he the Devil called BOLD ROTHWEL.)

Rothwel (turning to the People) said, Good People, you see the goodness of our God, and his great Power; though the Devil made a Fool of me now, through my weaknesse, God hath made the Devil dumb now; do you see how he lyeth? Therefore let us go to Prayer; That God who hath made him dumb, will (I doubt not) drive him out of this poor Man.

Devil Raged, Blasphemed, and said, And wilt thou go to Prayer? If thou do, I will make such a Noise, that thy Prayer shall be distracted, and thou knowest God will not hear a distracted Prayer: But thou hast got a device, because thou wilt not be distracted with thy Eyes in Prayer, thou winkest (so he always did,) but if thou Pray, I will pull out thy Eyes.

Rothwel: I look to find thee as great an Enemy in this Dury now, as I have done heretofore, but I fear not thy Threat, I know thou art limited; God heareth the Prayers of the upright, hath promised to give his Spirit to supply infirmities, therefore in confidence of his Promise, and powerful assistance of his Spirit, and in the Name and Intercession of his Son Jesus Christ we will go to Prayer.

They did so, Mr. Rothwel kneeled by the Bed on which the poor man lay; The Devil for a quarter of an hour together, or more, made a horrid Noise; nevertheless Master Rothwels Voice was louder than the Devils. After a while the Devil Roared at Master Rothwels Face (this was the first motion of any part of the mans Body) Master Rothwel opened his Eyes, mer, and brought down the Hand, which he held with great ease, two men being scarce able to hold the other hand: Prayer was still continued; at length the Devil lay silent in the man, and after that departed from him. The man fetcht divers deep sighs, insomuch as they thought he had been expiring, but his Colour returned to him, and the use of all his Members, Senses, and Understanding; and at the next Petition, he said (to the Glory of God, and amazement, but comfort of all the company,) AMEN: and so continued to repeat his Amen to every Petition: Prayer was now turned into Thanksgiving, and so concluded. After Prayer, John Fox said, Good Master Rothwel, leave me not, I shall not live long; for the Devil tells me he will Choak me with the first bit of Meat that I eat. Master Rothwel answered, Wilt thou believe the Devil that seeks thy Destruction, before thou wilt trust in God through Jesus Christ, that seeks thy Salvation? Hath not God by his Almighty Power dispossed him? Had he had his will, thou hadst been in Hell before now; but he is a Liar, and as he is not able to hinder thy Souls Life, so neither shall he be able to destroy the Life of thy Body. Wherefore get me something ready (saith he) for him, and I will see him eat before I go, and will crave a Blessing upon it.

When it was brought, eat saith Master Rothwel, and fear not the Devil, shewing him that he might do it in faith of that Ordinance by which God appoints meat for means to preserve Life, and urged that place of Marcs Daughter restored to Life: He Commanded to give her Meat, Luk. 8. 35. With much ado, and in great trembling at last, he took, and eat it. Look, (saies Master Rothwel) you all see the Devil is a Liar, the first bit hath

Chocked him, nor shall the rest. Master Rothwell left him, after which he was stricken Dumb for three years together. I had a Book written with his own hand, of the Temptations the Devil haunted him with afterwards, and the Answers divers godly and Reverend Ministers gave to those Temptations: But the Cavaliers got them, and all my Books and Writings.

Thus the poor man remained Tempted, but no longer possessed; At length by Prayer also (which was instantly put up to God for him, every Sabbath and Lecture Day, in many places,) the Lord opened his Mouth, and restored his Speech to him: one using this Petition, Lord open thou his Mouth that his Lips may show forth thy Praise. He answered in the Congregation, Amen: and so continued to speak, and spake graciously to his dying Day.

D<sup>r</sup> PRESTON

The Life of Doctor Preston, who dyed
Anno Christi 1628.

John Preston, the Son of Thomas and Alice Preston, was born at Heyford in Northamptonshire, a town divided by a little River into the upper and lower Heyfords, and is in Maps oft written in the plural number. It is a Rectory, and hath a fair Church in the lower Heyfords, but yet stands in divers Parishes. That Farme wherein Master Thomas Preston lived, is in Bugbrook Parish, where they buried and Baptized, where we find that John the Son of Thomas Preston was baptized Octob. 27. 1587. but was descended from that Family of the Prestons that lived at Preston in Lancashire, from whence his great Grandfather removed upon occasion of a fatall quarrel with one Mr. Bradshaw, a neighbour Gentleman, whom in his own defence he slew, and satisfied the Law and was acquitted for it; but not the Kindred, who waited an opportunity to be revenged, as the manner in those Northern Countries then was.

It fell out not long after, that Master Bradshaw's next brother meets Master Preston near to the place where he had slain his Brother and told him he should do as much for him, or he would revenge his Brothers blood. Master Preston told him he had slain his Brother against his will, and in his own defence that he bare no evil will unto them; desired him he would forbear, but when nothing would prevail, they fought, and Bradshaw fell again.

But Master Preston, was troubled and grieved at it, for he saw a fire was kindled that would not easily be quenched, and therefore resolved that he would leave that fatal and unlucky Countrey, though he was a Gentleman of a very fair estate; and walking one day pensive in Westminster-Hall, one Master Morgan of Heyford, with whom he was acquainted, came unto him, and asked why he was so sad? To whom for answer, he relates the former story. Master Morgan knowing him to be a gallant man, was very sensible of his estate, and told him if he would go with him to Heyford, he should have a good Farm to live in for the present, and what accommodation he could afford him. Master Preston thanked him, and after some consideration of the matter, resolved to take his offer, and so Master Preston of Preston in Lancashire, became a kind of Farmer in Northamptonshire, where he afterwards lived and died; and his Son succeeded him, and so it came to Thomas Preston, as we have said.

His Education.

His going to Cambridge.

His Mothers name before she married, was Marsh, but she had an Uncle by the Mothers side, whose name was Craswel, a man of means and good esteem in Northampton where he lived, and where he had been several times Mayor. This Uncle being rich, and having no Child, was very carefull of her, and took this Son, whilst he was young unto himself, and sent him to the Free-School in Northampton, where he was a Scholar under the Government of Master Sanderson, then Master of the School, and after under Master Wastel, who succeeded him; and when he had been there some time, his Uncle was perswaded to remove him into Bedfordshire, unto one Master Guest, who had sometime taught a private School in Northampton, and was accounted a better teacher of the Greek tongue, from whence after he had perfected his Studies in the Greek, he was sent to Cambridge, and admitted of Kings Colledge, under the tuition of Master Busse, one of the Fellows, Anno Dom. 1684. where he did, as young Scholars use to do, that is, applied himself to that which was the genius of the Colledge, and that was musick; and finding that the Theory was short and soon attained, he made account the practice would also be so; and accordingly adventured on the Noblest but hardest Instrument, the Lute, but here he found that Art was long, and was not willing to attend it; he used to say within himself, while he was fingering of his Instrument, quantum hoc tempore legi potuit? and whilst his fingers were thus distempered and foundred upon the Lute, it fell out that his Tutor, Master Busse, was chosen Master of the School at Eaton, and so removed from the Colledge about two years after he was admitted. Coming not from Eaton School, but from another, he could not be of the foundation, and was therefore incapable of those preferments in the Colledge that were of most worth, and the sooner perswaded also for to remove, which he did unto Queens Colledge, where he was received and admitted under the tuition of Master Oliver Bowles, one of the Fellows of that House, a very godly learned man, and a noted and carefull Tutor, under whose Government he settled to his Book and left his Musick, and by whose conduct and directions he grew in knowledge, and was improved unto very thriving and undertakings in his Studies.

His remove to Queens Colledge.

It is not nothing to be well descended, series creantur fortibus & bonis, sheep and Neat bred in Lancashire, or on the Peak-hills, and after driven into Northamptonshire, and planted there, produce a very gallant race. These Prestons though removed from their native soil, and much impaired in their pedigree retained yet the garb and metal of their Ancestors, they carried themselves and were accounted Gentleman; something there was in this young Prestons spirit that was not vulgar; I have seen in a Book of his, under his own hand when he was young, such sparklings of aspiring ingenuity, as argued in him something that was not common. He

He was as yet but Junior Sophister, but looked high, and grew acquainted with those that were Gentle, and fancied state affairs and Courtship, that had desires or dispositions to be Secretaries or Agents in princes Courts; thought it below him to be a Minister, and the study of Divinity—a kind of honest silliness, and accordingly got in with a Merchant, by whose means he did procure that he should live in Paris, and learn the language and garb of France; and another Gentleman in recompence, should be received and entertained in London, to learn our garb and language. Master Creswel of Northampton was by this time dead, and had bequeathed certain Lands in that Town to him after his Wives decease; These Lands he sold to put himself into a posture fit for that design; but here he now began to find that he had reckoned without his Host, and that he should have said, if the Lord will I shall live and do this or that, Jam. 4. 15. for the Merchant dies before the exchange could be accomplished, and so these blooming hopes, that had thus long held up his imagination, died with the Merchant.

He was of an able, firm, well-tempered constitution, brown, comely His Character, vigorous and vivide eye, but somewhat inclining to that kind of Ser. melancholly that ariseth from addust and parched choler, which now began a little to be discovered in him. For being mated in his first design, he grew discouraged, went not so much abroad among the Gallants, but struck sail to fortune and retired; yet his appetite was rather dammed than dried up; for after a very little pause and boyling over of his sullenness, he begins to steer again the same course, although by more certain and domestic mediums, and if he must be shut up and confined to the Muses, resolves to be no ordinary Servant to them; His genius led him unto natural Philosophy, which by that time was become his proper task; which he undertakes, not as boyes use to do, to serve their present use, but with devotion, resolves to leave no secret unattempted; adoreth Aristotle as his Tutelar Saint, and had a happiness to enter often where others stuck, and what broke others teeth, was nuts to him, no dark untrodden path in all his Physicks or Metaphysicks, but he was perfect in it; and so drowned and devored was he, that he seldom or never could be seen abroad, to the wonder and amazement of his former brave companions, so that no time passed, fine linea, not that between the ringing and rolling of the Bell to meals; and for his sleep he made it short; and whereas notwithstanding all endeavours, there was one in the Colledge that would alwaies be up before him, he would let the bed-cloths hang down, so that in the night they might fall off, and so the cold awaken him; insomuch that his Tutor was constrained to read unto him moderation, and to tell him, as their might be intemperance in meats and drinks, so also there might be in studies; but the evil of it as yet he felt not, the sweet and good he did, came off with honour and applause in all his acts, and was admired in the Regent House when he sate for his degree, both by the Posers and all the Masters that examined him, and from that time much observed throughout the University. His study

About this time his Tutor [Master Bowles,] was called to the Rectory of Sutton in Bedfordshire, and so left the Colledge, and another of the Fellows, then Master, (afterward) Doctor Parier became his Tutor, a very learned man and great Philosopher, who never went about for to dissuade him from his studies, but gave him all assistance and encouragement. The year following it came unto his Tutor to be Head Lecturer in the Colledge, and Sir Preston being to probleme in the Chappel, made such an accurate and strong position, and answered so understandingly, that his Tutor borrowed his position of him, when he had done, to look on and peruse, and finding it elaborate, resolved to make more use of it, than ever his pupil did intend. The

He is chosen Fellow.

The Master of the Colledge at that time was Doctor Tyndal, who was also Dean of Ely and resided for the most part there; Thither his Tutor goes, and carries his position with him, which he shewed to the Master, and acquainted him with what he had observed, that he was a youth of parts and worth, and deserved some encouragement; The Master was an honest gallant man, and loved a Scholar, and was glad of any opportunity to shew it, and so bids his Tutor send Sir Preston over unto Ely to him, where he assured him, he should not want what was in him to do him good; and bad him hold on, and he would take care for him: and there being an Election in the Colledge, soon after he was chosen Fellow by the unanimous consent of Master and Fellows, and his Tutor, Master Porter, brought him word of it, as he was at study, not thinking any thing, and told him that he must come down into the Chappel presently to be admitted, and accordingly was admitted Fellow of Queens Colledge in Cambridge Anno Dom. 1609. That is, five years after his first admission into the University: He was not so much moved at it, as young Students use to be, because he looked still at higher things, and had not quit in his retired thoughts his first design of being some body at Court, to which he thought this honour might be a bar: This courtesie was not compes to him, yet it was not manners to be discontented, but attend what should ensue.

He studies Physick.

He was by this time grown a Master in Philosophy, had waded far in Aristotle, and had met with few that were able to encounter him, and therefore now resolves to go another while to School to Hippocrates and Galen, and verifie what is so often said, ubi desinit Philosophus, incipit medicus; He had a very penetrating wit, and exact and solid judgment, to conjecture at effects in causes, and prognosticate events; and being skilfull in Philosophy before, soon made the Theory his own, but because perfectio scientiarum est in summitate, the life and vigour of a science is in the practice, he resolves to make enquiry after that. Books make not men Practitioners in any Art, Nemo ex libris evasit artifex, he retires unto a friend of his in Kent, who was very famous for his practice, where he earnestly attended and waited on the trade and way of knowing Simples, and compounding Medicines, wherein he attained to that sufficiency, that had Divinity failed, he might have been another Butler; yet what he had was not in vain; for when any of his Pupils were amisse, though he sent them alwaies unto Physicians, yet himself perused, and many times corrected their Prescriptions.

He study of Astrology.

It was not easie to allay his eager, and unsatisfied appetite and apprehension with any one art, Eccl. 5. 10. He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver. Crescit amor nummi quantum ipsa pecunia Crescit. The more you put into the soul, the wider presently it reacheth. He thought he could not be a good Physician, that could not read the powers of the Herbs and Plants in Stars and Planets, and therefore acquaints himself with Ptolomy, and other Authors in Astrology, and other curious Arts and Calculations, as they are called, Ast. 19. 19. that he might be able to study, not only Books; but Men, and to read mens fortunes in the heavenly bodies; but he could not, nor did not read his own.

There was a Soothsayer that told Agathocles he should be slain the next Moneth: Who asked, How long he thought he should live after him? He Answered, Many Years. He told him he would prove one of the two false, and leave the other to the Issue, and so commanded for to hang him presently. Master Preston was very busie among the Houses of the Planets, but saw not there his own Domestick Doom, nor what his Maker had determined concerning him; For as he was in these celestial Contemplations, it fell out, that Master Cotton, then Fellow of Emanuel Colledge, Preached in Saint Marries,

Maries, where Master Preston hearing him, was set about an other exercise, constrained from his Contemplations in Astronomy, to look into himself, and consider what might possibly befall him. It was his manner, as it is of other Students, when they come home from Saint Maries Sermons, to run unto their Studies presently, or what is worse, but this young Student was forced to retire and ruminate: This Sermon had bereaved him of two beloved Notions, one was his low Opinion of the Ministry and Preaching; For he saw an over-ruling gravity and Majesty in that Sermon, that he thought had been impossible to Pulpits. I have heard it often in the Colledge, that he took away sixteen Answers in a Probleme in the Chappel; but here was one he knew not how to take away: Sed haec lateri lethalis arundo, no cunning in Philosophy, or skil in Physick would suffice to heal this Wound. Another was his great Opinion of, and Ambition after State-employments; For these were higher things that now were offered to him, concernments of eternal influence, which nothing could divert that he had studied hitherto; There have been divets eminent and great Physicians that began in meddling with their own Infirmities. Self-love rides alwaies on the fore-horse. His own Accounts and Aking Conscience, set Luther first upon the study of Divinity.

Master Preston after this Affront and baffle in the Pulpit, wanted ease, and when he could not find it in his other Books and Studies, begins a little to look into the Bible, and to consider of the study of Divinity. In the prosecution of his study in Philosophy, he found many of the Schoolmen quoted, and so was willing for to look a little into them, and finding those he light on, pithy and sententious, went on: It gave him ease, that he was now a student in Divinity, and had left Albumasar and Guido, and such high-flown speculations, yet it pleased him for to see and find his Master Aristotle, so often quoted, and in such request among them, and thought if that were to be a Preacher, he might adventure well enough upon it, and so was drawn on very far in the study of the School-Divines. I have heard him say, There was nothing that ever Scotus or Occam wrote, but he had weighed and examined; He delighted much to read them in the first and oldest Editions that could be got. I have still a Scotus in a very old Print, and a paper not inferiour to Parchment, that hath his hand, and Notes upon it throughout; yet he continued longer in Aquinas, whose Sums he would sometimes read as the Barbar cut his Hair, and when it fell upon the place he read, he would not lay down his Book but blow it off, and in this Tune he continued, until a Rumour came into the University that the King would shortly come to visit them. King James was happier in his Education, than his Mother would have had him. It pleased God to breed a Buchanan on purpose, for to guide his younger years, and by that time he was Ripe, Scotland was grown acquainted with Geneva, and the King no stranger unto Calvins way. The News awakned all the University, and there were few but promised to themselves some good from this fair gale, that seeing Promotion came neither from the East, nor from the West, nor from the South, Psal. 75. 6. it must and would come from the North; and the Proverb be inverted, and be, Omnia bonum ab Aquilone.

Doctor Harsnet, Master of Pembroke-Hall was then Vice-Chancellor, a prudent well-adviced Governour, who knowing well the critical and able apprehension of the King, was very careful and solicitous to pitch upon the ablest in every faculty, for Actors in that solemn entertainment, and himself made choice of Master Preston to answer the Philosophy A&Q, and sent unto him to provide himself. He was ambitious enough by Nature, and had this News come a little sooner, nothing had been more suitable to his design and inclination. But now the Gentleman was Planet struck, grown dull and Phlegmatick; Master Cottons Sermon had so invaded him, that Kings and Courts were no such great things with him, especially when he understood that another was resolved on for Answerer.

He is chosen to oppose before the King.

Doctor Wren was then a very pregnant Scholar in Pembroke-Hall, and also Chaplain unto Bishop Andrews, and thought fit to be employed in this Commencement service, but was not willing to have any other place but Answerer: The Vice-Chancellour urged his Promise and engagement unto Master Preston, and his Opinion of his great Ability, but nothing would serve. The Vice-Chancellors Colledge, and the Bishops Chaplain must have Precedency, which he most seriously excused to Master Preston, and endeavoured to reconcile him to the first opponents place, which he declined, as being too obnoxious unto the Answerer, who is indeed the Lord and Ruler of the Act; but there was no removing now, and so he goes about it with much unwillingness, being rather driven than drawn unto it.

His great and first Care was to bring his Argument unto a head, without Affronts or Interruptions from the Answerer, and so made all his Major Propositions plausible and firm, that his Adversary might neither be willing nor able to enter there, and the Minor still was backed by other Syllogismes, and so the Argument went on unto the Issue: Which fell out well for Master Preston; for in Disputations of Consequence, the Answerers are many times so fearful of the event, that they slur and trouble the opponents all they can, and deny things evident, which had been the case in all the former Acts; there was such wrangling about their Syllogismes, that sullied and clouded the Debates extreamly, and put the Kings acumen into straits; but when Master Preston still cleared his way, and nothing was denied, but what was ready to be proved, the King was greatly satisfied, and gave good heed, which he might well do, because the question was tempered and fitted unto his content; namely, Whether Dogs could make Syllogismes.

The opponent urged that they could; An Enthimeme (said he) is a lawful and real Syllogisme, but Dogs can make them; He instanced in an Hound who had the major Proposition in his mind, namely, The Hare is gon either this or that way; smels out the minor with his Nose; namely, She is not gon that way, and follows the Conclusion, Ergo this way with open mouth. The instance suited with the Auditory, and was applauded, and put the Answerer to his distinctions, that Dogs might have sagacity, but not sapience, in things especially of Prey, and that did concern their Belly, might be nasutus, but not logici; had much in their Mouthes, little in their Minds, unless it had relation to their Mouths; That their lips were larger than their Understandings: Which the opponent, still endeavouring to wipe off with another Syllogisme, and put the Dogs upon a fresh scent, the Moderator [Dr. Reade] began to be afraid, and to think how troublesome a pack of Hounds, well followed and Applauded, at last might prove, and so came in into the Answerers aid, and told the Opponent that his Dogs, he did believe, were very weary, and desired him to take them off, and start some other Argument, and when the opponent would not yield, but hallooed still and put them on, he interposed his Authority and silenced him. The King in his conceit was all the while upon New-Market Heath, and liked the Sport, and therefore stands up, and tells the Moderator plainly he was not satisfied in all that had been answered, but did believe an Hound had more in him than was imagined. I had my self (said he) a Dog, that stragling far from all his fellows, had light upon a very fresh scent, but considering he was all alone, and had none to second and assist him in it, observes the place and goes away unto his fellows, and by such yelling Arguments as they best understand, prevailed with a party of them to go along with him, and bringing them

The Opponent also desired leave to pursue the Kings Game, which he had started, unto an Issue, but the Answerer protested that his Majesties Dogs were always to be excepted, who hunted not by common Law, but by Prerogative. And the Moderator fearing the King might let loose another of his Hounds, and make more work, applies himself with all submissive Devotion to the King, acknowledged his Dogs were able to out-do him, besought his Majesty for to believe they had the better, That he would consider how his illustrious influence had already ripened and concocted, all their Arguments and Understandings; that whereas in the morning the Reverend and Grave Divines could not make Syllogismes, the Lawyers could not, nor the Physicians; now every Dog could, especially his Majesties.

He was reserved naturally, and could keep counsel; few knew how Master Cottons Sermon had affected and wrought upon him. But this not failing when the wind blew, begat suspicion. Some judged he was modest, and wanted opportunity to bring him on; some that he was melancholy, and so neglected what was proper for him to intend; some busie and intent upon his Pupils, who now began to come from all parts. But the Politicians assured, it was some inclination unto Puritanisme, a name now odious at Court; For it could not be, (said they) that he should let so fair an opportunity miscarry, if he had not something else in view. Kings think themselves extreemly undervalued, if a word be not enough; Cardinal Poole being chosen Pope at midnight by the Conclave, and sent unto, to come and be admitted, desired it might be let alone untill the morning, because it was not a work of darknesse. An honest Argument, but not Italian enough; Quis nisi mentis inops? And so they went back and chose another. When Balaam came not at the first call, see how Balak reasons, Numb. 22. 37. Am I not able to promote thee? But Master Preston had indeed another King in his thoughts, when he had found treasure in the field, he parts with all for that, Mat. 13. 44. A purchase is not worth the having, that hath not either some convenience annexed, or may not some way be improved. God was a greater good than man, Heaven than earth, a Crown of Glory than a

Pupils.

Crown of Gold. But this neglect and self-denial, was well interpreted by good men, and that opinion of affecting Puritanes, which blasted him at Court, began to blazon him at home, and work a reputation, that to him was more acceptable. Men thought him meet for to be trusted with the care of youth; and many had their eyes upon him, for their Sons or Friends. Master Morgan of Heyfords, had been some-time dead, and had left his Son and heir an Orphan, in trust with some that were his Kinsmen, and like to manage his estate to most advantage. This Master Morgan's Son, under whose shadow these Prestons had for some time lived, was by his Guardians now commended to his care; not only for that relation he had to Heyfords, his native Town, and to the Family, but also that by that means the young Gentleman might be preserved from the influence of his other Friends, who were many of them Popish. King James had been so well pleased at the Commencement held before him lately, that he resolves upon another visit. The Heads agree to entertain him with a Comedy. There was one Buggles of Clare-hall, that had made a jeering Comedy against the Lawyers called Ignoramus. This was resolved on for to be acted before the King, and great care was taken for to furnish and accommodate all parts, with Actors answerable. Master Morgan was a comely modest Gentleman, and it was believed would well become a womans dresse, and accordingly his Tutor [Master Preston sent to,] that he would give way and all encouragement unto the service. He liked not the motion, could not believe that his Friends intended he should be a Player, and so desired to be excused. But the Guardians were not so exact and scrupulous, but thought if he played this Game well, he might win more than could be hoped for elsewhere; and so Master Morgan was allowed by his Guardians to play his part, and afterward removed unto Oxford, and suffered to play what part he would, and so relapsed unto Popery, which hath proved fatal and infortunate to him and his.

His Zeal.

But here was matter for Master Preston's back Friends, to argue he was not a Courtier, that would envy so small a courtesie to those, that had so freely offered greater unto him; and it was resented with a kind of angry indignation, that their offers had so little influence upon him; and there were some that watched opportunities to make him sensible of this neglect. There is no such Solacisme at Court as Independency. Si non vis ut per illos tibi bene sit, efficiens ut sit male. But Master Preston by this time had cast up all accounts, and resolved to stand unto his bargain whatsoever it cost him. Only he thought if he must be a Puritan, and bid farewell to all his Carnal and Court-designes, He would not be one of the Lower rank, but would get places if he could. Mediocribus esse Poetis, non dii, non homines, non concessere columnæ. That counsell of the Wise man, Ecl. 9. 10. Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might, he alwaies practised. And what is commonly said, was true in him. In magnis ingentiis nihil mediocre. This faithfulness to Master Morgan, attended with so great a shadow upon himself, increased his Reputation in the Countrey, so that now he was accounted the only Tutor; and being carefull to read unto them, and direct their studies, he found himself abridged of his own time, and was constrained to take up time, that should have been bestowed on his body. He also grew acquainted now with many eminent and godly Ministers, as Master Dod, and Master Hilderham, who would come often to his Chamber, and he was so hardened in his way, that he would get them many times to go to Prayer with his Pupils, a boldnesse not adventured on by any other: But by these labours his able body was debilitated. It was a great Orator that said, Primo desii velle causas agere, deinde desii posse. At first, said he, I would not plead, at last I could not. Master Preston in his youth would not sleep, but let the bed-clothes hang down, and awaken him: Now he could not, but about midnight still awakened, and slept no more; whereby in time his body languished, and could not answer as in former times.

His diligence.

Master

Master Butler of Clare-hall, was then the Oracle in Physick, to him he goes, and opens his condition to him; who after some few questions bids him take Tobacco, and so leaves him. He knew that Butler was odd and humorous, and thought he might give this advice to try him, and therefore resolves to wait a while before he medled with so odde a Medicine, which Hippocrates and Galen had never ordained to any of their Patients, and was at that time not so common, and of no good report; but his want of rest continuing, and his appetite unto his Book encreasing, he goes again to Master Butler, as a stranger, and propounds the case again. Master Butler gives the same advice, and being satisfied that he was serious now, falls to taking of it, and found that this hot copious fume ascending, did draw those crudities from the stomacks mouth, that hindered Concoction of his meat, and vapours from it that occasion sleep, and so restored his rest, and that in time his strength, and so he went on in his work, untill Doctor Tyndal [Master of the Colledge] died. He was an old man, and that preferment of the Mastership of Queens, was more accounted of than now it is. There were very many that had their eyes upon it, but Doctor Mountain in a special manner, who was often heard for to professe, he would rather be Master of that Colledge than Dean of Westminster. But Master Preston had another in his eye, Doctor Davenant, was a Gentleman descended, and was a Fellow-Commoner, when under Graduate, but very painfull, and of great capacity, and grew accordingly in learning and in reputation, and for his worth and parts was already chosen Margaret Professour, and read in the Schools with much applause those excellent Lectures upon the Colossians which now are printed; Him Master Preston pitched upon, but knew it must be carried very privately; for the mountain was already grown into some bignesse, was one of parts, and first observed in acting Miles gloriosus in the Colledge, and had been Chaplain unto the Earl of Essex, but like the Heliotrope or flower of the Sun, did now adore Sir Robert Carr, already Viscount Rochester, the only Favourite.

When it was agreed among the Persians, that he should reigne, whose horse first saw the rising Sun, and neighed at it, one turned his horse head towards the mountains, believing that the Sun would first arise there; but it fell not out so here. Master Preston having laid his plot before-hand, and seen what mountain was in his way, had taken care that word should be daily brought him how the old Doctor did, and when he found him irrecoverable, laid horses and all things ready; and upon notice of his being dead, goes presently and was at London, and in White-Hall before any light appeared on the mountain top; the Court was quiet, and he had some Friends there. His businesse only was to get a free Election, which he made means for to procure: But knowing also with whom he had to do, makes some addresses unto Viscount Rochester, in the behalf of Doctor Davenant, who being unacquainted with his Chaplains appetite to that particular, was fair and willing to befriend a learned enterprise. So Master Preston returns unto the Colledge before the Masters death was much took notice of; and assembling Doctor Davenants Friends, acquaints them with what had past at Court, and so they went immediately to Election, and it was easily and fairly carried for Doctor Davenant, who being called, was admitted presently. But when Doctor Mountain understood that Doctor Tyndal was departed, he sends and goes to Court and Colledge for to make friends: But alas the Game was played, and he was shut out. Never did Aena or Psuvius more fume, but there was no cure; only he threatens and takes on against the Actors, but they were innocent and not obnoxious. This Doctor had made great promises, gave a very goodly piece of Plate unto the Colledge with this Inscription, Sic incipio, but now he vowed it should be Sic desino. However the Colledge for the present was well paid, and grew in reputation very much; and because they wanted room to entertain the numbers that flocked to them, built that goddly Fabrick that contains many fair Lodgings both for Schollars and Fellows, towards Kings Colledge.

It was not long before it came to Master Prestons course for to be Dean and Catechist, which he resolved to improve by going through a Body of Divinity, that might be a guide unto the Schollars in their Studies in Divinity: For it was not his opinion that others should do as he had done, that is, peruse the Schoolmen first, and then come to the modern Writers; but first, read Summes and systemes in Divinity, and settle their opinions and judgements, and then read Fathers, Schoolmen, or what they had a mind to. This being known, and some honest Townsmen hearing him at first by chance, there came the next day, very many for to hear him, and the next day more, both Townsmen and Schollars from other Colledges, so that the outward Chappel would be often full before the Fellows came. Master Preston was of a very meek and quiet spirit, never refented injuries, nor provoked any unto avernesse, yet had some enemies: Si injuria multos tibi fecit inimicos, faciet invidia multos. What had Paul done, Act. 13. 45. for to deserve so sharp an opposition, but envy moved them: There had been other Deans and Catechists before this Gentleman, yet no such crowding. Complaint was made to the Vice Chancellour of this unusual kind of Catechizing, it was assured, not only that Townsmen and Scholars mingled, but other Colledges intruded also, that the Fellows for the crowd and multitude could not get through, and come to Chappel to their places; that it was not safe for any man to be thus adored, and doted on, unlesse they had a mind to cry up Puritanisme, which would in short time pull them down; that the Crozier staff would not support them long, if such Assemblies were encouraged: Obsta principiis, sero medicina paratur, &c.

Well, upon the whole an Order was agreed on in the Consistory, and sent unto the Colledge, that the Scholars and Townsmen should be confined to their proper preachers, that no stranger, neither Townsman nor Scholar, should presume on any pretence whatsoever, to come unto those Lectures, that were proper only to the Members of the Colledge. The Edict was observed punctually, and the Auditory by it much impaired. Had strangers still been suffered to attend, those Sermons had been printed as well as others: for there were divers that exactly noted, and wrote out all fair, unto the time of this restraint, but no one after that could go on with it, and so it rests. But he went on, and was assiduous to the years end, and waded through it, which was a very great help unto many of his Pupils, who made the greater benefit of those things because they were not common and in print.

About that time the Lecture at Trinity-Church, and the Sermons at Saint Andrews were prohibited, and the Scholars all confined to Saint Maries, which did occasion Master Preston to read Divinity unto his pupils on the Lords days, at three of the clock in the afternoon, which he also often did upon the week days; But the Townsmen and the Scholars of other Colledges, that had tasted of his spirit in the Chappel, endeavoured that he would do it where they might hear. Buttolphs belongs unto Queens Colledge, and is usually supplied by one of that House, there he is willing to make a tryal, how it would take, and resolves the next Lords day to preach at three of the clock after Saint Maries Sermons should be ended, which though but very little known, occasioned such a throng and crowd, as was incredible. Men were not cloyed with preaching then, nor waxed wanton.

There dwelt then in the Parish one Doctor Newcombe, a Civilian, and Commissary to the Chancellour of Ely, who being in the Church, and seeing ing the crowd, commanded that evening Prayer only should be read, but no Sermon; The Minister intreated that for that time Master Preston might be allowed to preach; so did the Earl of Lincoln and others in the Church; but he was resolute, and because he would not be further importuned, went home with all his Family, and left them to determine at their perill what they would do; so upon advice it was concluded that the Sermon should go on, and Master Preston preached a very favoury and holy Sermon, upon 2 Pet. 3. 17, 18. There was so much time spent in debates about it, and messages before the Commissary left the Congregation, that it was too late to do both, and therefore they adventured for that time to forbear Common-prayer, that so the Scholars might depart, and be at Colledge-Prayers. But this instructed Doctor Newcomb in his complaint. The Court was then near hand, that is, at New-market; Thither the Commissary goes the next day, and having the Bishop of Ely there, and many other Clergy men, assures them that Master Preston was in heart, and would quickly be in practice a Non-conformist, and was so followed and adored in the University, that unlesse some speedy course were taken with him, they might cast their caps at all Conformity, and see their power troden underfoot, and told them, gentleness was not the way, for he was cunning, and would recover all if he were not seriously and throughly dealt with.

There was no Advocate for Master Preston, but the Doctor being first in his own cause, seemed just, Prov. 18. 17. And speak to those that were willing to believe. The Puritans began to be considerable, and they doubted he might come in time to head them. It's a great security to a man to be despised: Contempto nullus diligentius nocet. A Fellow that hath nothing in him, nor is not owned, may be exorbitant, as he of one in his time: Contemptu jam liber erat. But David that hath a Party following him, must have an Army to attend him. And therefore he did wisely to Professe himself to be a dead dog or a flea, 1 Sam. 24. 14. The King was made acquainted with this complaint, and assured that Master Preston had as strong an influence into the Puritans as the Principal of the Jesuites, which was Aqua Viva, had upon them, and therefore it behoved him to consider what to do. A word was enough to a wise and jealous King, who did not love to play an after Game, and therefore hears himself the Doctors information; enquires whether the Bishops and Chancellors Jurisdiction extended unto Members of a Colledge, and finally concludes to Proceed against him by the power of the University.

A Letter is framed unto Doctor Scot, Master of Clare-hall, Vice-Chancellour at that time, and to the Heads, to call before them Master Preston, to give a strict account of that notorious disobedience unto the Commissary; He answers mildly, that he was not guilty; refers himself unto the Auditory, that evening prayer was omitted; because the Scholars might depart in due time, seeing the time allotted for it, was spent in treating with the Commissary, not out of any disrespect unto the service, which he himself did usually attend at other times. When the Wolf complained that the Lamb had fouled the water, that he was to drink; The Lamb answered that if he had defiled it, yet that could not prejudice the Wolf who was above, and the mud would certainly be carried downward; but this answer did not fill the hungry belly of the Wolf. Master Prestons innocency did aggravate his crime, which was his popularity, and therefore they told him they were engaged to support by all just means the Bishops Jurisdiction: That the King had honoured him, in leaving that affront to be examined by his proper Judges, and that except he could take off the Court, they must and would proceed to a very round and serious censure.

Quidve dolens regina deum, tot volvere casus,
Insignem Pietate virum, tot adire labores Impulerit? Tantane animis caelestibus ira?*

That a Fellow of a Colledge for Preaching of an innocent and honest Sermon, in a Church belonging to the Colledge, by the consent and in the hearing of the Incumbent, should be thus vigorously undertaken.

Among many other Gentlemen of quality, that were pupils unto Master Preston at this time, there was one Sir Capel Bedels, an Orphan, of a very fair estate in Huntingtonshire, a Daughters Sonne of old Sir Arthur Capel, who being Guardian to his Grand-child, had recommended him as he had done many of his own Sons unto his Government. It was a great trust, and Master Prestons care was answerable. And because plus vident oculi, he had his spies, that gave him notice of all their carriages and correspondencies; by one of these he was informed that Sir Capel haunted Doctor Newcombs house, and was familiar with his Daughter [Mistress Jane Newcomb,] a very Proper well-bred Gentlewoman; His Tutor asked if they were contracted, he answered, no, but would be very shortly, as he was told, for he was resolved to have her. Master Preston charged him to keep all secret, that Sir Capel might not think he was acquainted with it, and immediately appoints a journey unto Saffron-walden, to take the aire, and see that stately pyle at Audley-end, and takes divers of his Fellow-Commoners along, as he used to do at other times; and among others, this Sir Capel Bedels: When they had dined and viewed the house, it was propounded by one of them, that they might go that night to Haddam, and visit old Sir Arthur Capel, seeing they were thus far on their way, and it was late. Master Preston seemed to be indifferent, and so the Proposition took, and with none more then with Sir Capel, who knew his Grand-father would fill his pockets, and that would sweeten his Newcomb Mistresses next embraces, and make him welcome to her. The old Knight was glad to entertain such welcome guests, and that night there was no discourse, but of the stately Rooms, and goodly Gallery at Audley-end, and so the young men went to bed pleased, that the Colledge-bell next morning would not awaken them; but Master Preston slept not in utramque aurem, but awakened betimes, and acquaints Sir Arthur with all the business, adviseth him, by no means to permit the Gentlemans return unto the Colledge; for though the wound might seem quite cured, and he never so much engage forbearance, yet frequent apparitions would reintegrate: Et nihil facilius quam amor recrudescit. Sir Arthur was a very wise man, and had experience of the world, thanks Master Preston for his faithfulness; pretends Sir Capel wanted something, and desires his Tutor to give him leave to stay a little while untill he could be furnished, and then he should be sent, to which the Tutor easily consented, and so the rest went home; and after a while the old man tells Sir Capel he grew in bignesse, and it would be fit for him to travell before he settled, and he prevails with him to be content.

But what saies Mistresse Newcomb, who is robb'd by this means of her vowed and resolved servant, and her crafty Father that beholds so good a morsell snatched from between his teeth; do ye think he had forgotten this when Master Preston came to preach within his Jurisdiction? Pulvere qui ledunt, sed lesi marmore scribunt; other injuries perhaps may be forgotten, but losse of mony is not; ploratur lachrymis amissa pecunia veris.

Master

Master Preston was not altogether a stranger at the Court, however now there was no remedy; when he came to New-market, he found that Bishop Andrews, then Bishop of Ely, was chief, and that his Jurisdiction in the Commissary, was it that was pretended to be affronted, and therefore applied himself to him, and told him that he did not purpose to offend, but being engaged for to preach at that time, could not with honour disappoint the Auditory; if he suspected him for any thing, desired he would examine him, and satisfy himself. The Bishop told him the King was told he was an enemy to Formes of Prayer, and held no Prayer lawfull but conceived; and therefore being popular, his judgement and opinion might do hurt. Master Preston answered that it was a slander, for he thought Set Formes lawfull, and refused not on all occasions to be present at the Colledge Prayers, and when it was his turn, to read them. The Bishop answered, that he was glad, and would inform the King, and do him all the good he could, and bad him wait a while and then repair again to him for satisfaction in it, and so time passed on, and there was nothing done. There were some at Court that wished well to Master Preston, Sed lapsuro assisteret formidant, were loth to undertake a drooping cause; only there was one Doctor Young, an honest Scotchman, that was Dean of Winchester, and he told Master Preston plainly, that Bishop Andrews was his greatest adversary, and though he gave him good words, yet assured the King, that if Master Preston were not for this expelled the University, Lord Bishops would not long continue; But because Master Preston was accounted, and not without cause, a learned man, he was not willing to appear against him; but desired the punishment might be inflicted, where the fact was done, and that was in the University.

Master Preston saw now that the Bishop was a Courtier, and could give words, where deeds were not intended, and therefore goes again unto the Bishop, and tells him plainly that he or none must put a period to his attendance; and that either he would speak unto the King in his behalf, or tell him plainly that he would not; that he might know whence all this trouble flowed. The Bishop paused a while on this bold carriage, and at the last bad him come to him such a time again, and he would deal with the King in his behalf.

His courage.

So he goes unto the King, and tells him that however Master Preston was very dangerous, and it would be a very great security if he were handsomely expelled, yet he doubted it would not hear well, if it should be done for this offence; for he would be absolved in the opinions and minds of men, and be owned and applauded as their Martyr, and might perhaps recover, and live to be revenged; and therefore thought it would be better, for to enjoyn him to declare his judgement about Formes of Prayer; for that would be accounted a recantation, and however would weaken his reputation with the Puritans, which would be enough: for if they could divide him from his Party, they should not fear him; For he said, his carriage argued confidence in some assistance, which when they had removed, they should be strong enough at single hand. All that the Bishop spake, was as if extripode; an order presently was drawn, and sent to the Vice-Chancellor, that Master Preston should in Buttolphs Church declare his judgement, concerning Formes of Prayer, on such a Sunday, or else they should immediately proceed against him, according to their first instructions.

Master Preston was glad there was a way out, but sensible of the hard hand, that had been carried towards him; but now there was no remedy, and it was vain to strive against the stream. But before he could come home, the news was all about the Town, that Master Preston was to preach a Recantation Sermon at Buttolphs Church on such a day. This was good sport to the brave blades, who now came crowding as fast as any, for to hear, and it was no sin now for any body to be from Prayers; and indeed there was a very great Assembly, though he did all he could to have concealed it. So he went on upon his former text, and preached a very profitable Sermon, concerning growing in grace, and directed Prayer, as a special meanes to make men grow in grace. Now that (he said) was of two sorts, either that which was iudain, extemporary, and conceived; or set, enjoined, and prescribed before, not only for the sense and scope, but also words and phrases. And whereas some thought this was to stint the spirit, he said, there was a liberty to use conceived Prayer at other times, wherein the spirit might expatiate, and enlarge it self; and also the intention of the mind, though not in extension and variety of language. The Blades that came to laugh, had no great cause to do it, for this passage was at the very close; and the Sermon all along before, was sharp and searching; both sides were silent and went home, not without some prints of good upon their spirits: Optimus Orator censendus, non qui meruit auditorum iudicium, sed qui abstulit. He makes the best speech that binds his Hearers, rather to think what was said, then who said it. The goodfellows were nothing so merry at the end, as at beginning of the Sermon. Indifferent Hearers praised all, and were confirmed in a good opinion of the Preacher. Good men were glad he came so well off, and was at liberty to preach again, where they might hear him: himself was troubled, lest any thing he said, should be mistaken or mis-interpreted, as he was apt to be.

But there were many eyes upon this action, and all men waited to see the issue. The Courtiers did not like it, that after all these tossings to and fro, he should thus light upon his feet, yet would not meddle for the present, but wait occasions. Those that were well-affected, were glad he was engaged against the Court and Bishops, and did presage he might be instrumental to their downfall, and every body laboured to ingage him more and more against them. The Spanish match was then the common talk, and great unwillingness appeared in the people generally; and Doctor Willet had presumed to offer Arguments unto the King against matching with Idolaters. The King was greatly vext at this adventure, and took great paines to perswade the Doctor, that a Papist was not an Idolater: Sed non persuadebat etiamsi persuaserat. The people were unsatisfied, and there being then a Parliament, a very Honourable and able Member of the House of Lords prevailed with Master Preston to write some Arguments against it. And though there were severe Edicts and Proclamations against scandalous Papers, and intermedling with Mysteries of State, yet he promised, it should be scattered and divulged unto fit persons, and none should know from whence, or from whom it came; accordingly when it was finished and written fair, one gave it to a Porter, whom he met in Holborne, and bad him leave it, according to the direction. The next day a great Lord comes unto him that had perswaded Master Preston unto the service, and tells him, that he had met with such a piece against the Spanish match, as he never saw, and protested he was convinced, that he must speak against it in the House, what ever came of it. The other asked him who made it, and where he had it: He assured him, he knew not, but it was left at his lodging, by he knew not whom. The Lord desired he might see it, and it was copied out, and spread among those of the Parliament they thought fit, but the Authour of it never known.

King James had something allways against his Writings and Speeches against the Puritans, which was ill taken, for that it was apparent, those meant thereby, were godly, conscientious persons. The House of Commons was the only mote in King James his Eye, the Remora, (as he conceived) unto his absolute Dominion, for he knew not how for to engage them, as he did the Lawyers and Divines; but if he stopped one mouth with preferment this Parliament, there would be others open the next against him. There were some now that adventured to apologize for Puritans, and to say in Parliament, that honest men were wounded under that name; and to purpose, that godly Ministers might not be silenced, and thrown out of their free holds for trifles and Ceremonies. But King James would none of that stuff, breaks up the Parliament, and sets out Proclamations: sed quid prodest iurius regionis silentium, si affectus fremant. People love not to be enforced unto Duty: Homines duci volunt non cogi.

The Chaplains that attended monethly at the Court, were not ambitious of Preaching over-often, and so a Combination was agreed on for Preachers before the King, when ever he should lie within twelve miles of Cambridge: The King did not despaire of making Schollars his, and therefore used all endeavours to oblige them, especially Cambridge men, where a seed of Puritans had been a long time, and though the Plains about Royston and New-Market afforded better Winter-Game than elsewhere; yet Schollars he conceived might be caught sometimes, as well as Hares, and so was willing they should Preach before him. Young men he knew would Preach themselves: Omnis oratio docet, aut rem, aut animum dicentis. He should learn either things, or persons.

By this means it came to Master Prestons turn to Preach before the King at Royston; He was so muffled at Court in Doctor Newcombs business that he knew not what to do, could not decline it altogether, for that would have exposed him unto too much observation; and yet he greatly feared what might befall him in the doing of it: Therefore he changed his course with one that was to Preach a little after, and did it very privately, that if his Enemies should have designs, they might be disappointed, and so it was not much known.

When he was to Preach, it fell out that his course came upon a Tuesday, when the King did lie at Finching-Brook; The Court was very thin, and the Prince and Duke of Buckingham were both abroad, and the King himself was for an hunting match that day, and gave order that the Sermon should begin at eight of the clock. Master Preston had some at the Court that were solicitous as well as he, and they told him it would give very great content, if he would take some occasion in the Sermon, to shew his judgment, as he had done before about Set-Formes. Doctor Young Deane of Winchester, (of whom we spake before) did then attend, and when the King came in, and sat down in the chair, he told him who it was that Preached, and said, he hoped he would give content; I pray God he do, said the King. The Sermon is in print, upon John 1. 16. which he so clearly opened and applied, that the King sat all the while as quiet as could be, and never stirred nor spake to any body, but by his looks discovered he was pleased; when all was done, he came unto him as the manner was to kisse his hand; and the King asked him of what Preston he was descended, he answered of that in Lancashire; Then said the King, you have many of your name and kindred very eminent; and Preston the Priest, although a Papist, is a very learned man.

Great haste was made to bring in dinner; and the King was very pleasant all the time, had his eye continually upon Master Preston, and spake of divers passages in the Sermon with much content, especially that of the Amirians putting God into the same extremitie, that Darius was put in, Dan. 6. when he would have saved Daniel; but could not: But as soon as ever he was retired, the Marquesse Hamilton kneeled down, and besought him, that he might commend the Preacher to him for his Chaplain, protesting he did not so much as know him; but that he was moved by the weight and strength of that he had delivered; told him, he spoke no pen and ink-horn language, but as one that comprehended, what he said, and that he could not but have substance and matter in him. The King acknowledged all, but said it was too early, remembered New-market businesse, and was reserved.

Sir Ralph Freeman, one of the Masters of Requests, had married a Kinswoman of the Duke of Buckingham, and was a Kinsman unto Master Preston; he makes Relation of the businesse unto the Duke, and told him, if now he would appear in favour of his Cousin Preston, he might oblige the Puritans, and lay a ground-work for his own security, if tempests should arise; assured him that Master Preston was ingenuous, and might be made, that the King and all the Court were taken with the Sermon, and did approve it. The Duke of Buckingham was a wise man, and apprehensive of what Sir Ralph suggested seasonably, saw those they called Puritans were growing, and in the Parliament were thought considerable, knew that the Kings affections might cool, and he might need friends, and took Sir Ralphs discourse into his most serious thoughts. An honest man, one Master Packer, was then his Secretary, and he set on what Sir Ralph Freeman had suggested, and so it came unto a resolution, that Master Preston should be owned; and the Duke commanded Sir Ralph Freeman, to go to Master Preston from him, and acquaint him with his good opinion of him, and desire to see him; and indeed there was such a Concurrence, and Concentring of opinions and desires among the Courtiers, that it was assured Master Preston, he might be Chaplain unto whom he would, and that was now the deliberation, which of these offers he should accept, and whom he would acknowledge his Patron and Protector for the time to come.

There was not so few Clergy men at Court at any time, and so no kind of opposition; yet the King himself hung back, and would do nothing hastily; he was not reconcileable unto the Puritans, and so desired not in that respect for to ingage him; but he desired to deprive them of Master Preston, and to divide him from them, and would do any thing that might drive that on; and considering how many he had won, that Master Preston was a young man and might be drawn on, he would not hinder nor oppose; so it was the joynt opinion of all his friends, that the best preferment was to be the Princes Chaplain, who then was grown and had an household. This therefore was represented unto Sir Ralph Freeman, and his opinion required, who quickly yielded and proposed it unto the Duke: both Prince and Duke had been abroad, and neither of them heard the Sermon; when therefore Master Preston was brought unto the Duke, he very seriously received him, and told him it was the Prince his unhappinesse and his, to be absent when he did preach, and therefore desired him that he would vouchsafe a Copy of his Sermon to him, and believe that he would be ready, to the best and utmost of his power to serve him.

There were many other Courtiers that desired Copies of the Sermon, and the Court not staying there, Master Preston came home to furnish Copies. He never penned Sermon word for word but wrote what came into his mind, and as it came, and that in no good hand; and so it was a businesse to provide these Copies, which yet he seriously attended till they were written fair, and then to Court he goes, where the Duke presents him to the Prince, and so he was made and admitted Chaplain to the Prince in Ordinary; for as then the Prince had not compleated the number he intended, which was six, who were accordingly to wait two moneths by the year, and preach unto the household upon the Lords daies, and perform such duties as were required of them.

But God was making other work for Master Preston; For Doctor Tolson, Bishop of Salisbury dies, and leaves a Wife and many Children unprovided for; for he had been Bishop but a little while. This Wife of his was Doctor ctor Davenant's Sister; in pity therefore and commiseration of her case, it was proposed to the King by those that were his Friends, that Doctor Davenant, a single man, and well-deserving, might succeed his Brother in the Bishoprick, and so make some provision for his Children. The King thought very well of Doctor Davenant, not only for his singular abilities and labours in the University, but for his pains also, and service in the Synod of Dort against Arminius, and it was looked on as a deed of charity, and so believed he would carry it, and be the man.

But this Created Master Preston's cares, Doctor Davenant had been his constant and faithfull Friend, and given countenance upon all occasions to him and all his Pupils. But now who should succeed? and where should Master Preston find another shelter? The Fellows for the most part were not his Friends, envied his numbers, and great relations, and there was no man like so to befriend him. Besides, the Margaret's Professors place would be void also by this remove, and many able stirring Bachelors in Divinity, proposed unto him that place, and assured him the Election would be easily carried for him.

The truth is, he had no great hope to do any great good in the Election of the Master of the Colledge, and one Doctor Mansel being named, a very moderate good-natured man, he let that care fall, and was more anxious about the Professors place; for though sound doctrine in the University was of much use, yet English preaching was like to work more, and win more souls to God.

He alwaies highly valued, and frequently consulted with Master Dod, and he perswaded English preaching, as that wherein God was more immediately served, and said, there were others that might supply the University in the Professors place, that either could not, or would not labour mens Conversion. And indeed the Master of Sidney-Colledge Doctor Ward, a vast Scholar, was then in view and Nomination for the Professors place; yet Mr. Preston was so solicited by honest men, that he knew not what to do: Two things he thought he wanted to enable him. The one was a Latine tongue, the other a Latine stile; in both which, by reason of desuetude, he was unready. For his stile therefore, he resolves upon an exact and Logical Analysis of all the Epistles, which would Aquate and exercise his stile, and acquaint him with the Scripture-phrase and language; and if he were called to be Professor, might serve for Lectures in the Schooles; which work he immediately applied himself unto, and very happily compleated; a work of great pains unto him, and in it self of great worth; but being Latine, and written only with his own ill hand, was not thought popular enough to come abroad, but lieth in the dark.

For the exercising of his Latine tongue, he resolves a journey into the Neiberlands, where he should have much occasion of speaking Latine, and see those Colledges and Universities; but there was no travelling beyond Sea, without a License under the hands of Privy-Counsellors; this he procures among his Friends with all the secrecy that could be, and a great while before he meant to use it, that he might conceale it from the Colledge and University; but this his secrecy begat suspicion that there was some plot. Velle putant quodcumque potest: It is not safe for men to have abilities. It was resented so much the more, because no Clergy man was made acquainted with it, and the opinion was, that something was brewing against Episcopacy. This they were sure of, that Amsterdam was in the Neiberlands, and ever had been fatal to the Hierarchy. The Lord Keeper then was Bishop William, he sees this plague afar off; Prov. 25. 3. and provides a Messenger to go along unknown to Master Preston, that should observe and give intelligence weekly of all that passed: Integer vultu scelerisque purus, non eget Faculis nec arcu. A breast-plate of righteousness is a better guard than a shirt or coat of of male. It was David's uprightness that did preserve him, Psal. 25. 21. so was it Master Preston's; for he knew nothing of this attendance, till after his return, but gave out in the Colledge, and among his Pupils, that he would go the next Vacation into Kent, to visit Sir Richard Sande, and drink if he saw cause, the Tenbridge waters, concludes to take one of his Pupils with him, a Torkshire Gentleman, Sir Henry Slingsbys Sonne and Heir; and did accordingly acquaint his Father and make Provision for it long before.

His travel in the Low-
Countries.

The time came, and he goes into Kent, and is received in the passage boat for Rotterdam, in the garb and notion of a Gentleman, with his skarlet cloak and gold hatband, and all things answerable, and so goes over all the Provinces, both Protestant and Papish, where there was any thing observable, and encounters frequently with divers Priests and Jesuites, professing himself a Protestant Gentleman, that was willing to find out the Truth, and try all Tenents, and accordingly was courted by them very much, and solicited to be a Papist; and they gave him very many papish Books, and so he came back into Kent, and to the Colledge at the time appointed, unknown to any in the Colledge, but only one of his Pupils, from whom he seldom concealed any thing. He was no sooner settled in the Colledge, but a rumour flies abroad, that Master Preston had been beyond the Seas; He shewed them that it was incredible, and wonders at their silliness, that they would beleieve so unlikely a relation; The matter was not great; now all was past, and so it rested doubtfull and undetermined.

He had a long time been successfull in the way of Pupils, but Doctor Davenants leaving of the Colledge troubled him. A great Tutor, hath much occasion to use the Masters influence, for accommodation and advancement of his Pupils, which now he saw he could not promise unto himself; and it fell out much about this time, that Doctor Dunn, Preacher at Lincolns-Inne died, and some in that society proposed that Master Preston might be tried whether he were willing to accept that place for Tearm time: He was himself, neither careless, nor cracking of his good name: Fame nec incuriosus, nec venditor. But it was much grown by reason of his success in the conficts and encounters he had at Court. It was some refreshing unto honest men, that Master Preston, so resolute, and constant in the waies of God, was yet the Prince his Chaplain, and helped forward the desire of these men; It futed with him, to have an opportunity to exercise his Ministry in a considerable and intelligent Congregation, where he was assured, many Parliament men, and others of his best acquaintance would be his hearers; and where in Tearm time, he should be well accommodated, so he consented and undertook the Place; The Chappel then was very little, and at the first, the numbers that attended on his Ministry, besides their own society, were few, but when the Chappel was newbuilt, as now it is, the numbers were exceeding great, that were his constant hearers, and foundations laid, that will not easily be ruined.

He is cho-
coln-Inns.

This was some ease unto his grieved mind, for Doctor Davenants leaving of the Colledge and University; but filled not his great capacity and large desire of doing good; The Colledge he gave over in his thoughts, but not the University, where his Preaching was much resented, and made great impressions; and though at Lincolns-Inne he had Gown-men to be his Hearers, yet they were not like to propagate and spread it. A preacher in the University, doth generare patres, beget begetters, and transmit unto posterity, what God is pleased to reveal to him; In a word, doth what the Apostle doth enjoyn, 2 Tim. 2. 2. and he of all men, thirsted after opportunities of doing service, and might well say with the Sponse, that he was sick of love, Cant. 2. 5.

Some of the Fellows of Emanuel Colledge were very eminent for parts and learning, yet clouded and obscured, (as they thought) by an opinion that that lay upon the Colledge, that they were Puritans, that is, not only Godly and Religious, (for so they were, and were content to be esteemed) but non-conformists, and averse to Government, for which cause there had been lately some alteration made, both in their Chappel, and manner of their diet; they thought therefore, if they could prevail with Doctor Chaderton their present Master, to resign, who was establish'd in it by the Founder, and named in the Statute, but was grown very old, and had out-lived many of those great relations, which he had before, they might perhaps procure that Master Preston might succeed him, and bring the Colledge into reputation, being a good man, and yet a Courtier, the Prince his Chaplain, and very gracious with the Duke of Buckingham. But this was sooner said than done, the old Doctor was exceeding wary and jealous not only of his own disparagement, but especially of the good and welfare of that brave foundation that had grown and flourished under his Government so long; for if it were but known that he were out, there were divers lay in wait to get a Mandate, and come in against their minds; a fresh example whereof they had lately seen in their next neighbours, Christ's Colledge, where after Master Pemberton was chosen, Doctor Carew Dean of Exeter, was forced out of them, and did all he could to mould a new, and alter the constitution and genius of the Colledge. But the Fellows answered, that this might be better hindered and prevented whilst he was alive, than at his death; for his resignation might be carried privately, but his death could not, and if all the Fellows were content, the Election might be past before the resignation were discovered; and so they promised to sound and try the judgment of the other Fellows, and then repair again unto him.

There were two things in the Colledge that (in their Opinions) greatly pinched them. The one was the Statute for attendance and continuance whilst they were Fellows, so that they had not opportunity to live in Noble mens Houses, or take Lectures to exercise their Ministry, and make themselves known unto such as had it in their power to prefer them. Another was the Statute of departing at such a standing, whether they were provided or not provided; and there was then a fresh example in Doctor Traverse a man of great worth, yet forced to sojourn as a Fellow-Commoner in Christ's Colledge untill he could be better accommodated; The Fellows therefore were easily induced to affect this change; for they thought Master Preston might be an instrument, by reason of his great acquaintance, either to get some mitigation of the Statute, or procure more livings to be annexed to the Colledge for their preferment.

So they returned to the old man, and told him that the Fellows were all agreed, and ready to do what he should prescribe, and it rested now in him to prevent the danger that did threaten, not only them in their particular concerns, but the growing good and welfare also of the Colledge. The poor man wist not what to do; to out-live the Mastership he thought was to out-live himself, and to go into his grave alive; yet he honoured and loved Master Preston very much, and could not answer that dilemma of the Colledge safety; therefore he told them he would not be wanting to the Colledge good, but it concerned them as well as himself, to provide they were not cheated, and another forced on them, whether they would or not; and therefore desired that Master Preston might be requested to deal with his Friends at Court, and procure some promise that there should be no Mandate granted, in case his resignation should be known; He told them likewise how unprovided he was for maintenance, when that was gone, and how unseemly it would be for him now in his Old age for to want, and therefore desired he might be taken in this particular into consideration. But Master Preston quickly eased the old man of all these fears, by procuring a Letter from the Duke of Buckingham in these words. Sir

of Buckingham's Letter.

Sir,
I Have moved his Majesty, concerning Master Preston's succeeding of you, in the Mastership of Emanuel Colledge, who is not only willing, but is also graciously pleased to recommend him to the place in especial manner before any other; so that in making this way for him, you shall do a very acceptable thing to his Majesty, as also to the Prince his Master, of which I am likewise to give you notice, and to put you out of all doubt, that another may be thrust upon you; you shall not need to fear any thing, in regard that from his Majesty there will be no hinderance to his succession; and for that point of supply of Maintenance, I shall (as I promised) take care for to procure it, when fit occasion shall be offered; so taking kindly what you have done, I rest

Theobalds Sept. 20.

Your very loving Friend,
G. Buckingham.

He is chosen Master
of Emanuel.

When the Doctor had received and read this Letter, he was in all things satisfied, as to the Court, but they all knew that Doctor Traverse lay in wait for this Preferment; for being outed by the Statute at Emanuel Colledge, he sojourned at Christs Colledge as Fellow-Commoner, and presumed either by his Friends at Court, to get a Mandate, or be chosen in the Colledge by a Party of the Fellows, whom he thought his own; therefore great care was taken to keep all secret, and though the Statute do ordain a vacancy of seven days, and notice by a Schedule passed upon the Chappel-Door, yet such was the concurrent uniform agreement of all the Fellows, that it was not discovered to any of the Schollars untill the day of Election; and because there is a Sacrament to be immediately before it, they were constrained to lock up all the Gates that none might come in or goe out till it was past; and then two of the Fellows were dispatcht to Queens Colledge, to acquaint Master Preston with what they had done, and to desire that at two of the Clock he would repair unto the Colledge to be admitted, and undertake the charge.

It was strange news at Queens, and all the Colledge were much affected with it, wondering extreemly that such a great transaction should be carried with so much secrecy, and that amongst Master Prestons twelve Disciples (as they called them) there should be never a Judas but all concentre in it; but there was order given presently, that all the Schollars should be ready against two of the Clock that day, to attend Master Preston and the Fellows to Emanuel Colledge, in Habits suitable unto their several quallities, which was done accordingly; and a very goodly Company attended him from Queens unto Emanuel, where they were cheerfully received and entertained according to the Custome, with a generous and costly Banquet, and then returned unto Queens again; but left Master Preston, the prop and glory of it, at Emanuel.

In the Plantation of Emanuel Colledge at the first, the godly Founder, took great care to store his Colledge with godly and able Fellows from all the other Colledges, and some were after added that were eminent; but now a Master is bestowed, God in mercy hath enabled that good society to pay their Debts, by sending not only Members; but also Heads into very many of the other Colledges, so as they may now well say, Que regio in terris nostri non plena laboris.

Sir Walter Mildmay their Noble and Religious Founder, was wont to say unto his Friends, that he had set an Acorn, that might perhaps in time become an Oak; blessed be God, our eyes have seen it, not only grown and flourishing, but fruitful, seasonable Showers, a great promotion unto a new Plantation, and earnest Prayers unto God, a special means to bring these down, down, of which I think no Colledge ever had more, which in these last years have returned a glorious Harvest, to God be Praise.

The Life of Doctor Preston.

This News ran swiftly all the Kingdom over, and was received as men were affected. Good men were glad that honest men were not abhorred, as they had been at the Court, and presaged much of that enlargment and deliverance, which we have lived to see; the Courtiers made full account that he was theirs, and would mount up from one step to another, until he were a Prelate, especially the Duke of Buckingham, who from this time seemed sincerely to affect him, Multum suis ad amorem, dedisse beneficium, thought he had given earnest and could not be defrauded of the purchase. The Earl of Pembroke, and the Countesse of Bedford had a great interest in him, and he in them; and all men looked on him as upon a rising man, and respected him accordingly. As for Lincoln-Inne, they made account they had a special influence into this honour, as having first expressed their good Opinion of him; and there was an honest godly old man, one of the Benchers, Master Ayres, that upon hearing of the News, would needs be young again, and make an Anagram upon his Name, though he was uncertain how he wrote it in Latine, for he had seen it written divers wayes. Being therefore resolute, and loath to miss it, he resolves to write it both ways, as he that used to say his Prayers in Latine and English, that both might not fail, and so first he wrote it, Johannes Prestonius with this Anagram, En flas pius in honore: And this Distitch:

Doctrina, ingenium, virtus tua, pramia poscunt;

En dedis Emanuel, flas in honore pius.

But lest this should be mistaken, he writes it Johannes Prestonus: with this Anagram, Se nosse, non turpia: And this Distitch:

Turpia non novisse, bonum; se nosse, beatum:

Ipsa doces alios, sed prius ipsa facis.

The rest of that Society rejoiced, that their Lecturer was Master of Emanuel, and took occasion to express it according to their several dispositions and relations, when he came to them in the Tearn, which shortly followed. There was one thing in the Colledge-Statutes that greatly troubled him; and that was that the Masters absence from the Colledge was confined to a moneth in every quarter, and he saw not how he could attend at Court, and Preach at Lincoln-Inne in Tearn time, but he should transgresse; but the Fellows soon consented to an interpretation, that absolved him from the rigid sense, there being in the Statute a double liberty; first that in case of violent detention it should not hold; they resolved that not only a natural, but also a moral violence was to be understood. The other was, that in case of Colledge-Business he should not be esteemed absent. Now the Colledge was at that time in suit for a Living in the West, of good value, with one Master Ewins, a Gentleman in the Parish, who had bred up a younger Son to be a Schollar, in relation to that Living, and therefore contended for it, as it had been his own inheritance; and when he was worsted at Common-Law, prefers a Bill in Chancery, and thought by Money to carry it against the Colledge-Right. Bishop Williams the Lord-keeper then, was his great Friend, and when after many delays it came at last to hearing, would not allow the Counsel for the Colledge to speak; Master Preston being present, craved leave to speak in the cause himself, but was not only silenced, but severely reprehended for it. It was Trinity-Tearn, and the Plague was very hot in London, so that Michaelmas-Tearn was wholly adjourned, and the next Tearn was proclaimed at Reading, and the Records removed thither; but before that, the Lord-keeper was removed from his Throne, and Sir Thomas Coventry, one of the Colledge-Council that were not permitted before to speak, succeeded him; by whose integrity and justice, the Colledge was restored to their right, which which ever since they have enjoyed, and so his following the Colledge business excused his absence all his time.

Being therefore now established, and greatly minding the good thereof, he observed that the Scholars kept Acts but seldom, and accordingly when they came unto it, performed it but meanly; he therefore advised with the Fellows in it, and after many consultations, it was resolved that the number of Acts should be in a manner doubled, of those under Masters of Art, which was a great advancement to learning of all sorts in the Colledge.

About this time Sir Arthur Chichester, afterward an Irish Baron, was chosen to go Embassadour into Germany, about the Palatinate affairs, and Master Preston was by the Duke of Buckingham and other Friends, designed to go along with him; He did not greatly fancy the employment, but would not contradict; only it was considered, that though he was the Prince his Chaplain, and Master of a Colledge, yet he was not Doctor, which they thought might sound ill abroad, and reflect upon his Master, and there was not time to go unto it, in the ordinary way of Acts and Exercises, therefore a Mandate was addressed to the Vice-Chancellour and Heads, that forasmuch as Master Preston was to wait upon my Lord Ambassadour, and could not in so short a time perform his Acts, he should be forthwith admitted Doctor in Divinity, that he might be ready to attend the service, which was done accordingly with all alacrity.

Being therefore thus engaged, and not knowing what might befall him in the voyage, he resolved to settle his temporal estate before he went. He was not willing to be accounted rich; would often say, Manifestus thesaurus cito expenditur. And therefore though he had great Incomes from his Pupils, and was not Prodigal, yet he was not Master of his money; for he had been advised to adventure in the East-India Company, then newly set up, and because estates there were invisible, he was the willing, but by that means wanted money; for there was paying for many years, but no returns; yet there was hope it might at last come in, and so it did without diminution of the principal, but not in his life-time. Therefore he thought it needful to make a legall disposition of his estate by Will, and so he did, and named a very Honourable person his Executor, who lived to enjoy that money as well as other by virtue of it. But the voyage came to nothing; for Sir Arthur did not go as he intended, yet this was his last Will, and according to it all was enjoyed, though he made additions by way of request or direction, which were accordingly performed.

It was ever his ambition not to be mercenary in his Ministry, but at liberty to preach where he might do most good, without relation or respect unto the wages; and he considered that the Master of Emanuel could have no Living that had cure of souls annexed, and therefore was willing to give ear unto the solicitations of the Townsmen, who greatly prest him to be their Lecturer at Trinity-Church; for they had applied themselves to Doctor Andrews Bishop of Ely, and propounded to him Master Jeffries, one of the Fellows of Pembroke-Hall; and he had given way, and Master Jeffries did preach at Trinity some years, but was desirous of a more settled condition, and had desired Doctor Preston to procure him to be Chaplain unto some Noble-man, that was like to help him to a Living, which was a very easie thing for him to do, having so much interest in many great ones; so he pitched upon Marquesse Hamilton, who presently admitted Master Jeffries, Chaplain to him, and shewed him much respect, as well for Doctor Prestons sake, as for his own, and long it was not before a Living fell, namely the Rectory of Dun-mow in Essex, which the Marquesse procured and bestowed upon his Chaplain Master Jeffries; for he had not then commenced Doctor, and by that means the Lecture at Trinity was shortly to be void.

The Townsmen made account that now they had what they desired, namely ly an opportunity to settle Doctor Preston in the Lecture at Trinity; and great care was taken to increase the stipend from forty or fifty pounds per annum unto fourscore, that the Doctor might have twenty pounds a quarter paid him; for they thought the former inconsiderable, not knowing what principles the Doctor lived by; and when they had effected that, they employed some of the chief to propose the matter to the Doctor very solemnly; who was easily perswaded to accept their offer, without relation to the stipend; but there was one of the Fellows of Sidney-Colledge, Master Middlethwite that put in for it, and though few or none of the Contributors or Townsmen sided with him, yet he procured Letters from the Bishop of Ely, and engaged all his friends, both in the Court and University, that it came unto a very great contest. Doctor Preston who was offered any Bishoprick he would resolve on, and told at Roxton by the Duke of Backingham, that the Bishoprick of Glocester was then void, contends with Master Middlethwite, to be Lecturer at Trinity-Church, for a stipend of fourscore pounds per annum, as the upshot of all his hopes, and fruit of all his great achievements at the Court; and the contention was so great on all sides, that it could not be concluded by any mediation, but was referred to an hearing at Roxton before King James, who was really against the Doctors preaching in the University, the consequence whereof he well saw, and was informed fully of. I confesse I often wondered why Master Middlethwite, an eminent Scholar, and like enough to get preferment, as afterwards it's known he did, should stickle for so small an opportunity to preach, against the inclination and disposition of the Townsmen; until I understood that he was fet on by the Prelatical Heads, who told him that it was a service acceptable to the King, and he should be rewarded for it. At the time appointed it came unto an hearing, and an Argument was urged against the Doctor, namely; that it was a Lecture maintained by six-pences, a thing unseemly for a Master of a Colledge and the Prince his Chaplain; but the Duke had taken care that nothing should be ordered and concluded against the Doctors mind; for the Duke resolved not to lose him; so the meeting was dissolved and nothing done; but that night, Sir Edward Conway, then Secretary, invited Doctor Preston to supper, and after supper told him, that the King had ordered him to tell him, that if he would give over his pursuance of that Lecture, and let the Heads dispose of it, he should make his choice of any other preferment, that was more honourable and profitable for him; but the Doctors end was to do good, not to get good; The King, to make him uselesse, and divide him from the Puritans. The Duke was more indifferent, who laboured in him to win and gratifie the Puritans, whose Power in Parliament was now grown very formidable; therefore when nothing else would content him, he was confirmed Lecturer at Trinity-Church, the last preferment he ever had, where he preached after all his time, and did much good.

The Duke had now obliged Doctor Preston in the judgment and opinion of all the honest Party, and much displeased the Prelatical; and he saw apparently that King James approved not his siding with him, yet he was more expresse than ever in his affections to him, and freeness with him. He had indeed a very happy and rare composure of sweetness and solidity, would play and dally with the King, as if he were a woman, and yet enquire, and apprehend, and argue counsels and debates of State, as if a Burleigh, or a Walsingham: saw clearly the affections of the King were fading, which the Puritans (though never so much his Friends,) could not repair, and therefore eyed and adored the rising Sun, who now was grown and fit for marriage, but no Preparatives to find a Consort for him. He knew the Spanish match was but a colour, and a Treaty dandled between Bristol and King James, to fool the Prince off, and shut his eares against the French proposals. This he discovers to the Prince, tels him, Kings did not love an Heir apparent, how near soever; that the daughter of Spain was designed to a Monastery, and kept for a reserve unto the house of Austria; that in France there was a Lady much before her; that if he pleased, he would wait upon him into Spain in a disguise, and take the French Court in their way, and see that Lady, and so discover Bristols, and his fathers juggling; the Prince resents and hugs this overture. They tell King James, the Earl of Bristol and the Spanish Ministers abused him; that it was time to bring that Treaty to some Conclusion, desire they might go into Spain, and play the game out.

The King saw who had ploughed with his Heifer, feared, (as he was apt to do) a check-mate; yet for the present urgeth only his affections to them both, and asketh them how he should subsist so long, without their companies? But they persisting, he signes a Warrant with his own hand for Jack Smith, and Tom Smith, with each of them a servant and their horses to go beyond-Sea.

The Duke even now was not unmindfull of Doctor Preston, but leaves order with the Dutchesse and Countesse of Denbigh, to be carefull for him; and Sir Ralph Freeman having a child to baptize, Doctor Preston is intreated for to preach, and the Dutchesse and Countesse were both Gossips, who shewed to the Doctor very great respect, and gave him hopes of doing good; and some he did, for he procured by their means, Master Hildershams liberty, and restitution to his place at Ashby de la Zouch, and gave great hopes unto good Ministers of fairer times than had been formerly; only he would relate with much regret, that he often found Doctor Laud, then Bishop of Saint Davids with them, and therefore doubted of the issue and event.

The Doctor saw by the debates about the Lecture, that he had enemies as well as friends at Court; that the Duke was mutable, as well as morall; knew that the King abhorred that journey into Spain, and would remember it, if able: Dulcis inexperto, cultura potentis amici expertus metuit. And therefore though now he were settled and assured in the University, yet would not leave his Lecture at Lincolns-Inne; but being still in London in the Term-time, about the Colledge-businesse, continued Preacher at Lincolns-Inne, and thought it might be a good reserve, in case the naughty Heads or Factions in the Court should fall upon him; and it was well he did, for the Prince and Duke returned the next October, highly offended with the Spanish gravity, and both they and all their train did nothing but tell stories of the Spanish baseness; so a Parliament was called, and the Duke cryed up by all the godly Party in the Kingdome. The Spanish Agent at the Court had order from his Master out of Spain, for to defie him and protest against him at the Counsel-Table, but seriously he could not have done him a greater courtesie, for the people universally did hate the Spaniard, and now the Duke became the peoples Martyr. I have seen Verses made in his defence and commendation; And Agents was presently dispatched into France, to treat of that Match. King James liked not this stuff, but the Prince was able now to go alone, and especially when he had the Duke for one of his Supporters; all things are fairly carried for Religion, and the Duke of Buckingham, the Princes and peoples Favourite. The people seemed now to have the better, and the Court-affairs for to decline and droop. Doctor Preston like another Mordecai was very great, the Prince his Master, and the Courtiers eyes upon him, because they saw he came not thither for preferment, as all men else did. Pisoni in imperium adoprato nihil in vultu mutatum, quasi magis imperare posset, quam veller. His honours altered nothing in him, but gave encouragement to all the godly Party, and his Sermons at Lincolns-Inne much wrought upon the Parliament, so that a bold Petition was contrived ved and presented to the King at Whitchall, from both Houses of Parliament, April 23. 1624. against the spreading and increase of Papery, and the Indulgence given unto Priests and Jesuites. King James was in the evening of his glory; his Party in the Court under a cloud; another Sun almost in view, and the moon or day-star already risen, and accordingly he answered warily to their Petition, bewails his want of information, as the reall ground of this their trouble, which otherwise he had prevented; acknowledged that whilest the Treaties lasted with Spain and Austria, he was obliged to comply; but now both being broken off, he would be rigid and severe against the Priests and Jesuites; bids them find out a way for to restrain the growth of Papery, and he would second them; but resolves to pay the Duke of Buckingham for all this, and gives order to the Earl of Bristol to prepare an information for that end; but the Match with France, and other intervenient accidents obstruct it, for the present.

The Duke having told tales out of School, and broken off the Match with Spain, was much obliged to further and promote the French, which he did seriously excuse to Doctor Preston, upon this ground, that there was not any Protestant for to be had: and for to marry with a subject had alwaies been unlucky and fatal to the Kings of England; that the French would not be ridged in Religious observations, but the Doctor constantly opposed; only acknowledged this difference, that Spanish Popery was an absolute ingredient to their intended Western Monarchy, but French was not so, and so this was lesse evil.

But the French found out this obligation, and were untractable, unlesse the Duke would aid the King of France against the Rochellers: This was a hard Chapter for one so much obliged unto the Puritans and Doctor Preston, and he therefore declined all he could, but nothing else would serve, and he knew King James lay ready to take advantages; so in Conclusion, eight Ships were granted to oppose the Rochel-fleet, and many colours sought to cloude it, and hide it from the world, but from that time Doctor Preston doubted of the Saint-ship of the Duke of Buckingham; whom otherwise he honoured and loved very much.

But it was high time for the Duke to look about him; King James was not to Learn now how for to play his Game, he was an old, but not a Foolish King, Eccl. 4. 13. And therefore failed not to make Provision, and lay rods in pisse, that he might use upon occasion. Kings use for to account an ague in the Spring their Physick, yet Physick till March be past is not good, but this ague antedates the moneths, and comes in February. The King was then at Theobalds, and the Ague was made but small account of. He feared death, but was the most impatient and disordered of any living; what Rules soever the Physicians gave, he would observe none; which intemperance might very well occasion the growing, strength, and vigour of the disease, which howsoever more and more increased, and at last began to be considerable; Then he began to take advice and to submit to Rules, but now it was too late; for March 27. 1625. on the Lords day in the morning, about ten of the Clock at Theobalds the King dies. Doctor Preston then attended in his moneth, and was sometimes hastened to the Prince to comfort him, and sometimes to the Duke; and indeed it was a very mournfull morning. Death is a serious thing, and knocks alike at Palaces as at the meanest Cottage. King James was very much beloved of all his servants; some of the Huntsmen could not be gotten from him; the Prince and Duke were both of them retired and wept exceedingly. But Sir Edward Convey and some of the Lords drew up a Writing, and proclaimed Charles Steward King, with all his Titles; and hast was made to pack away to London. The Prince and Duke, and Doctor Preston in Coaches hast down, hasten to White-hall, and there he is proclaimed again with more formalities, malities, and the Lord Mayor and the City sent to, where it was done with much solemnity, and great Rejoycing of the people; for the Prince had that exceeding happinesse to come upon the stage unprejudiced. For he had never interposed nor acted, but in the Spanish businesse, and that succeeded to his great advantage; so that if he list he might have been as popular as ever any were.

This fall, occasions many Alterations in the Court; The Bishops generally, and Doctor Prestons enemies, and all that had contended with the Duke were Crest-fallen. King James was like enough to have out-lived the Duke of Buckingham, who had been very sick since his return from Spain, but all is altered, and the Duke does all.

But he had many things to do; The affronts received in Madrid; and at the Counsell-table by the Agent, were to be sent back by a puissant and mighty Navy, and Provisions made accordingly. King James to be interr'd; a Parliament to be summoned; the French Lady to be sent for, and brought into England, which the Duke especially intended, and spake to all the Gallants of his Retinue to attend him, and to many other of the Gentry and Nobility throughout the Kingdome. But he found it hard thus in the Morning of the Kings affairs to be abroad, there being then a Parliament, and the sicknesse much encreasing in the City, so he was constrained to employ the Earl of Holland, and attend himself at home. All were not gratified in this great revolution and Mutation of affairs, and the discontented Party murmured, and let flie at the Duke, and the sicknesse much encreasing, began to make a mutiny, and it was much desired that the Parliament might be prorogued till some other more healthfull and lesse dangerous time. But the Navy against the Spaniards, and the pressing wants of all sort that depended on the Court would not permit; so it was only adjourned to Oxford; yet there the sicknesse was as soon as they, and some of their Members smarted for it, but hast was made to gratifie the new King, and the Provisions for the Navy went forward, many men engaged, and the King resolved to attend that businesse, as admitting no delay.

There was one thing that invited Doctor Preston to a journey that year, and that was a strong suspition that the plague was in the town, in which case there is a liberty to dissolve the Colledge, without any detriment unto the Officers and Members of it. He was not willing to omit the Opportunity, because he had many invitations into the West. The Bishop of Salisbury he desired to Consult withall, about a Book of Master Montaignes, that was commended to him by the Duke of Buckingham to peruse and give his sence upon it. Master Sheruil, the Recorder of Salisbury, was a Bencher of Lincolns-Inne, and a very good friend of his; He had divers Friends at Dorchester, and was desirous to be sea-sick, and was still enticed forward, and at last resolved to wait upon the King and Duke, at Plimmouth, whether they were gone to see the Navy set sail. Whilest he was there, the Rachel-fleet was broken by those ships the King lent, and Monsieur Sabeeza came into Falmouth with the remainder, and thence to Plimmouth, with most lamentable out-cries against the Duke, who seemed to be very much affected with it, and made mighty Promises of wonderfull repairs, but Doctor Preston failed not to set that businesse home, he did believe the Duke was over-ruled to lend them, and sorry when he saw the sad effects.

But whilest the Duke was thus detained in the West, the Earl of Bristol and the Lord Keeper Williams, combined against him, and drew in many to their Party, among others the Earl of Pembroke, and divers great ones in the House of Commons, and was so encouraged and heartned in it, that the Earl of Bristol, May 1. 1626. presented in the House of Lords twelve Articles against the Duke of Buckingham, tending to prove, That the Duke had promised unto the Pope and Ministers of Spain, to make the King a Papist; and and over-ruled him, against the judgment of the Earl of Bristol, to write unto the Pope with the title of Sanctissime Pater; That his carriage in the matters of Religion was so offensive, that he durst not to kneel before the Host as often as he met it; That he was so licentious and unchaste in his Behaviour, that the Spanish Ministers resolved not to have any thing to do with him; That when he could not bring about the Match to his own particular Advantage, he used means to obstruct it and break it off; That he had informed King James of all these things, who promised to bear him, and leave the offender unto Justice, and that not many daies before his sickness.

The Duke had now reason to look about him, and was very able to do, and first he labours to divide the Party by drawing off the Earl of Pembroke, by promising his Daughter to the Earl of Montgomeries Son, which afterward he did accomplish; Then he endeavoured to oblige the Puritans, by gratifying Doctor Preston all the ways he could, and particularly in the business of the Colledge-suit, by depriving Bishop Williams of the Seal, and giving it to Sir Thomas Coventry, who was one of the Colledge-Counsel; yea he went so far as to nominate the Doctor to the King to be Lord-Keeper, and the King was so firm to him, that the Earl of Bristol could do no good, and so withdrew his Articles.

Doctor Prestons Friends were Newters all this while, and looked on, neither engaged for him, nor against him, which was sadly represented to the Duke by the Bishops and that Party, who wondered he should dote upon a man that either could not or would not own him in his need, bad him consider whether Puritans were like to be his Friends, whose waies were two cels different, and told him plainly he could not have them both. If he adhered to those that sought their Ruine, they must adhere to such as would support them: so that the Duke was in a great strait and knew not what to do.

Doctor Preston also was importuned to put it to an issue, and if he would not leave the rotten and corrupted Clergy, then to leave him, and because there had been Informations against that Book of Master Montaignes, they propounded it might come to a Debate, and not remain as now it did, unsettled. The Doctor and the Duke were both of them unwilling to an open Breach, loved for to temporise and wait upon events. But Doctor Prestons Friends would not be satisfied, but urged a Conference, whereunto they were encouraged by some Orthodox and very learned Bishops, and at last it was concluded by two Religious Noble-Men, that a Conference there should be, the Bishop of Rochester and Doctor White then Dean of Carlile, on the one side, and the Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, and Doctor Preston on the other. A Day was set, a Saturday in Hilary-Term, at four of the Clock in the afternoon, the place was York-House, and Doctor Preston sent to in the morning for to attend it. The Noble-Men came unto the Bishops Lodgings, about two of the Clock, and sent for Doctor Preston to them, who gave many Reasons why he could not go, but they were resolute, and taking the Bishop with them went without him, but the Doctor considering, and fearing his absence might betray the cause, and give encouragement unto the other side, went afterward himself unto the place, and sate by as an hearer silent until all was done, but talking afterwards occasionally of falling from Grace, the Bishop shewed that a godly man might go far and yet return, by the Instance of the Prodigal, Luk. 15. but Doctor White exclaimed against any that should think the Prodigal in acts of Drunkenness and Whoredome not to be fallen from Grace, and urged that of the Apostle, Rom. 1. 32. That those that do such things are worthy of Death, that is, said he, in a state of everlasting Death, and therefore fallen from Grace; so 1 Cor. 6. 9, 10. shall not inherit the Kingdom of God; that is, are not Sons, for if Sons then Heirs, Rom. 8. 17.

But Doctor Preston answered, that these sins made indeed a forfeiture of all their interest into the hands of God, and he might make the seizure if he pleased, but did not unto those which were his Children, and in Covenant with him; as two Tennants, by not paying of their Rent, or keeping Covenants forfeited their Leases, yet the Lord might seize the one, and not the other, as he pleased. But the Bishop and the Dean both cried out, this was the way to all licentiousness and looseness. To which the Doctor answered, That the Seed of God, as the Apostle calls it, 1 John 3. 9. remaining in the sinning Saint, or Son, and would repair him; as in water, there remains a Principle of cold, even when it boyleth over, that will undoubtedly reduce it, when the heat and fire is removed, as in Peter, David, Sampson, and others, was apparent; so that they could not run out into all licentiousness; For the Spirit lusteth against the Flesh, that they cannot do the things they would, Gal. 5. 17. and though he did not disinherit them, and blot their Names out of the Book of Life, Phil. 4. 3. yet he might, and would withdraw his Favour, imbitter all their Comforts, Mat. 26. 75. raise trouble to them from their dearest Interests, 2 Sam. 12. 11. fill them with Anguish, Psal. 38. 3, 4. which in Reason will keep them from running out, seeing the evil is commensurable unto that good of pleasure or profit their sin afforded; and if need be, he can add unto it eternal Apprehensions, and make them feel the fierceness of his Anger, Psal. 88. 6, 7. without any hope of being eased; and after this can restrain and withhold them, as he did Abimelech, Gen. 20. 6. For if one cease to be a Son, because he commits a Sin that doth deserve eternal Death, then every Sin a Child of God commits, rends his Relation or Son-ship off; for every Sin deserves Eternal Death, Rom. 6. 23. and because in many things we offend all, 1 Jam. 3. 2. we should be alwaies out of Son-ship, and have neither certainty nor comfort in our Estate, unless he could give some Ground out of Scripture, to assure what sins put us out, and what did not.

The Duke had sent to Doctor Preston to decline this clashing conference, and assured him he was as much his Friend as ever, and would have stopt it if he could, but the Bishops had over-ruled it, which the Doctor at the first believed, and so was backward. But when he saw the confidence of Doctor White and his Companion, he doubted the sincerity of that assurance, and was afterward informed, that there had been a meeting at the Countesse of Denbies, and the Duke had promised to leave him; This gave him resolution and encouragement against the second Conference, which was managed in a manner by him alone, against Master Mountague and Doctor White. For when the Doctor saw the Duke begun to double with him, he was less fearful to offend him, though the Duke still carried it, with all the fairness that he could, and appeared not in Person.

When the time came for the second Conference, the Doctor readily appeared, and the first thing he charged Master Mountague withal, was about his Doctrine of Traditions, which he affirmed he had delivered as grossly and erroneously as any Papist, Gag. pag. 38, 39, 40. For he justified that place in Basil, where he saies, The Doctrine retained in the Church, was delivered, partly by written Instructions, partly by unwritten Traditions, having both alike force unto Piety; which was so unlike to Basil, and the Opinions of those times, that it was generally believed to be put in by the Papists of later times. Master Mountague confessed, it was suspected by some of the preciser cut; but Doctor Preston told him, Bishop Bilson was none of them, yet he did judge it suppositious; and it must be so, or Basil acknowledged to be erroneous. For he instanceth in Praying towards the East, and use of Chrisme or Oyl in Baptisme; both which being Rejected by the Church of England, argues they held that place of Basil not Canonical.

Master Mountague answered, that Doctrina there used by Saint Basil, might signifie a thing that seemed so, and so the sense might be, that some things that seemed true, of less esteem and consequence, might be delivered by Tradition, as long as matters more substantial were taken from the Scriptures. But Doctor Preston shewed that Doctrina signified oftentimes Doctrine, and was used here by Basil for those Heads of Doctrine that were more Principal, and less exposed, comparing them unto those places in the Temple, whereunto the People had not access.

Master Mountague answered farther, that his Assertion was Hypothetical, that if a Doctrine came from the same Author, it was no great matter, whether it were by writing or word of mouth, for either had the same Authority. But Doctor Preston told him, Basil was positive, and spake directly, and him he justified, and therefore could not be Hypothetical, as he pretended.

It is a great step unto Victory for to divide. Paul sets the Pharisees against the Saducees, Act. 23. 6, 7, 8. that he might save himself. The Jesuites are so good at it, that though they have but one to be their Adversary, they will endeavour to divide him from himself, by moving Passion, or Compassion, or some Affection of his own against him. Doctor White had openly in the Commencement-House, maintained that Election is not ex praevisis operibus, and therefore Doctor Preston resolved to pinch Master Mountague in that particular, that he might bereave him of his animating Champion Doctor White.

There were four several Places that Doctor Preston had observed to make good this Charge, the first which he produced, was Gag. pag. 179. Some Protestants hold, that Peter was saved, because God would have it so, without respect unto his Faith and Obedience; and Judas Damned, because God would have it so, without respect unto his sin. And added, this is not the Doctrine of the Protestants, this is not the Doctrine of the Church, the Church of England hath not Taught it, doth not believe it, hath opposed it.

Now Doctor White was very fierce and eager to Engage, told him it was no Doctrine of the Church of England, but a private Fancy of some, that Judas was condemned, without respect unto his sin; For the Wages of Sin is Death, Rom. 6. 23. The Soul that sinneth shall Die, Ezek. 18. 4. But Doctor Preston answered, he did not charge that upon Master Mountague, but the former part of the Assertion, that Peter was not saved, without respect unto his Believing and Obedience; and so Election should not be Absolute, but grounded upon Faith and Works foreseen. Then said Dr. White, I have nothing against that, but leave Master Mountague to Answer for himself.

Doctor Preston was glad that he was eased of Doctor White, and yet resolved to make advantage of it, and therefore told Dr. White, if he thought Election was not ex fine Prævisis, he desired to know whether Saving Grace were an effect, and fruit of Election, or no? Doctor White acknowledged readily it was; then said Doctor Preston, Whosoever hath saving Grace is Elect. Now you know that an Elect Person, can never finally miscarry, or fall away; therefore whoever hath true Grace, can never fall away. The old man saw the Snare, and would have avoided it, by denying the Consequence. But the Doctor urged, that wheresoever the Effect is, there must be the Cause, but Saving Grace is an Effect of Election. This Doctor White would have denied, but the Hearers murmured that the Effect could not be without the Cause, as the Day is not without the presence of the Sun. Then Doctor White answered, that Saving Grace was an effect indeed, but a common Effect. But Doctor Preston urged, that it was not more common than Election; for all the Elect had Saving Grace, and none but they; and therefore they could never fall away. But this (said he) is by the way, I will now apply my self to Master Mountague.

But when Master Mountague perceived that his Great Goliath Doctor White, forsook him, he was greatly troubled, and cavilled at the words a while, but the book, adjudging it for Doctor Preston, he said, The Church of England had not declared any thing against it. Doctor Preston alledged the seventeenth Article, but told Master Mountague, that he affirmed the Church of England did oppose it, and he desired to know where?

But after one of the Lords had whispered with Master Mountague, he confessed; that for Arminius, he had never read him, and that he had written some things negligently in that book, which he never thought should thus be scanned among friends, and therefore promised to write another book in Butter and Honey, and therein more exactly for to acquit himself.

Some of the good Lords proposed, that in stead of this Book which Mr. Mountague had promised to write, the Synod of Dort might be received and established as the doctrine of the Church of England, seeing there was nothing there determined, but what our Delegates approved. But Doctor White opposed this mainly; for (said he) the Church of England in her Catechism teacheth to believe in God the Son, who redeemed me and all mankind, which that Synod did deny.

Doctor Preston answered, That by Redemption there, was only meant the freeing of mankind from that inevitable ruine, the sin of Adam had involved them in, and making of them savable upon conditions of another Covenant, Joh. 3. 16, 17. so as now salvation was not impossible, as it was before the Death of Christ, but might be offered unto any man, according to the tenor of that Commission, Mark 16. 15, 16. Which could not be unto the Devils, for they were left in that forelorn condition, whereinto their sin and disobedience put them, Heb. 2. 16. 2 Pet. 2. 4. that the Jaylor was a boisterous bloody fellow, Act. 16. 24, 27. yet Paul makes no doubt for to tell him, vers. 31. That if he believed on the Lord Jesus, he should be saved with his house.

But Doctor White in no sort received this, but affirmed earnestly, that Christ died for all alike in Gods intention and Decree, for Cain as well as Abel, for Saul as much as David, for Judas as much as Peter, for the reprobate and damned in hell, as well as for the Elect and Saints in heaven.

But Dr. Preston answered, That there was a speciall Salvation afforded to Believers, 1 Tim. 4. 10. That Christ was indeed a rancome for all, 1 Tim. 2. 6. but the Saviour only of his body, Eph. 5. 23. That he redeemed all, but called, justified and glorified whom he knew before, and had predestinated to be conformed to the Image of his Son, Rom. 8. 29, 30. that to whom in this sense Christ was given, to them were given also all things appertaining unto life and godlinesse, 2 Pet. 1. 3. as saith, 2 Pet. 1. 1. Phil. 1. 29. Eph. 2. 8. Repentance, Act. 11. 18; 2 Tim. 2. 25. A new heart, Ezek. 36. 26. His Spirit, Gal. 4. 5, 6. So that nothing can be charged on them, but Jesus Christ hath undertaken, and is engaged to discharge them, Rom. 8. 31, 32, 33, 34. So that they can never perish, nor be taken out of Christs hand, Joh. 10. 28, 29, 30. but as they are begotten again unto a lively hope, 1 Pet. 1. 3. so they are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, Ver. 5. whereas Judas was lost, Joh. 17. 12. and is gone to his own place, Act. 1. 25, and there are many nations and people of the world, that have no outward offer made unto them in the Gospel, Psal. 147. 19, 20. Act. 16. 6, 7. and those that have it, have not hearts given them to understand it and believe it, Deut. 29. 2, 3, 4. Esa. 6. 9, 10. Mat. 13. 13, 14, 15. and therefore they are lost, 2 Cor. 4. 3, 4. and are damned, 2 Thes. 10, 11, 12. For he shewed that in Adam all men were lost, Rom. 5. 12. and none recovered but but by Christ; therefore such as had not Christ's intercession, could not recover; but Christ prayed not for some; Joh. 17. 9. and therefore such could not be saved, Heb. 7. 25.

Dr. White, acknowledged there was a difference; for though all had so much as by good improvement might serve their turn, yet the Elect had more, for God abounded towards them, Eph. 1. 8, 9. Rom. 5. 15, 17, 20. As all the Troop have horses, but the Officers have better. Both Travelers have staves to leap over the ditch, but the one a better and stronger than the other. The worst had grace enough to keep corruption, and the renitency of their natures down; but the Elect, such as would do it easily; for Christ had tasted death for every man, Heb. 2. 9. and died for those which yet might perish, 1 Cor. 8. 11. and bought those, that yet brought upon themselves swift damnation, 2 Pet. 2. 1. because they did not husband and improve the favour offered to them.

Dr. Preston answered, That Christ was in himself sufficient to save all, and might be said to be provided for that end and use, as a medicine is to cure infected persons, though it cure none actually, but those that drink it, as Prosper. Habet in se quod omnibus prodest, sed si non bibitur non medetur. As 1 Joh. 5. 11, 12. but many did not thus apply Christ, because they had him not so offered and exhibited as others had Mat. 11. 21. Luk. 10. 13. for God gave some faith and repentance as we have shewed; as the Serpent that Moses was commanded for to make, was in it self sufficient to cure those that were bitten, Numb. 21. 8, 9. yet cured none, but only those that looked on it. So as Moses lift up the Serpent in the wilderness, So shall the Son of man be lift up, that whosoever believeth in him should not Perish, but have life everlasting, Joh. 3. 14, 15.

But Doctor White urged that place Esa. 5. 4. that God had done all he could, but they neglected and rejected the counsel of God against themselves, Luk. 7. 30.

Doctor Preston answered, That God had done all that they could challenge of him, for he had given them in Adam Power, Ecl. 7. 29. and proposed another way of mercy in a Mediatour, and therefore he appeals to any one that was indifferent, Esa. 5. 3. but this was unto Israel, he deals not so with other nations, Psal. 149. 20. Beside; he had done what he could, without reverting and rescinding his Decree, Joh. 12. 38, 39, 40 for otherwise he could have given them the same spirit of faith, 2 Cor. 4. 13. the like gift that he did unto others who believed on the Lord Jesus, Act. 11. 17. could have wrought in them both to will and to do according to his good pleasure, Phil. 2. 13. could have healed them as he promised, Esa. 57. 18. and as he did persecuting Saul, 1 Tim. 1. 6. but God had other ends, Rom. 9. 17. and Attributes, Rom. 9. 22. which he was willing to discover, Prov. 16. 4.

But Doctor White asked how then he could require faith and repentance Mark. 1. 15. Act. 17. 30. which was all one, as if he should require one to give his judgment and opinion of a colour, that had his eyes shut, and then shut his eyes as fast as he could.

Doctor Preston answered; That he might do it to shew and discover our impotency, as we bid our little children rise, that by their own fault fell, that we may let them know their inability, and be the more beholding unto us to help them up, as Mark. 9. 23, 24. and because the call and command of Christ is the Vehiculum and Conduic-pipe of strength and power, Act. 14. 10. Joh. 5. 8, 9. as Lazarus, Joh. 11. 43, 44. Thus God by bidding and commanding men to take grace, doth thereby fit them and enable them to do it, as that Cripple, Act. 3. 6, 7, 8. was by the command enabled; so Saul, Act. 22. 13. being commanded to receive his sight, was enabled the same moment to look upon him; and so vers. 16. being commanded to wash away his sins, had the blood of Christ provided ready for to do it. So these commands are not like those the Apostle speaks of, Jam. 2. 16. for here is something given; when God bids, he doth not, Verba dare, sed rem.

But it was further urged by the Doctor, that God had no pleasure in the death of wicked men, Ezek. 33. 11. but that he would rather they should repent and leave their sins, Ezek. 18. 23. and vers. 32. if therefore God were not ready to the utmost of his power to give them grace, he could not be excused from dissembling and double-dealing.

But Doctor Preston answered, That superiours may command unable persons for many reasons, but cannot be said for to dissemble, unless they refuse to give, when the required condition is performed. As if I bid one come unto me, and I will give him six-pence, if I refuse when he is come, I did dissemble; but if he comes not, he cannot charge me; for their not coming may be for want of will, Joh. 5. 40. as well as for want of power, Joh. 6. 44. Now if I know a Creeple will not come, though he could, I may punish him for it. It's true, God delights in nothing but himself, his joy and comfort, is terminated only in himself, not in the creature, but as some way served and represented by it; for God made all things for himself, Prov. 16. 4. yea for his Pleasure, Rev. 4. 11. That is, the exercise and illustration of some one of his attributes; as his power. Exod. 9. 16. Rom. 9. 17. his wrath, Rom. 9. 22. Never did strong man glory of his strength, more then God doth of his Sovereignty and Omnipotency, Joh. 40. 9, 10, 11, 12, 13. Now, if it fall out, that in the illustration and exercise of these his glorious attributes and excellencies, some creatures smart, yet he delights not in their smart and sufferings, but in the demonstration of his own Omnipotency. Ahashuerus makes a Feast to all the States and Orders of his Kingdome, to shew the riches of his glorious Kingdome, and the Honour of his excellent Majesty: Esth. 1. 3, 4. This was not done without the smart and suffering of many of the creatures, yet he delights not in their sufferings, but in his own magnificence and bounty. When Christ was at the Feast, Joh. 2. 1, 2. he doth not condole the death of all those innocents that went to make it up; Qui fruitur pana, ferus est: but rejoyced in the good cheer, and good will of the Friend that bade him.

There were few present of Doctor Prestons Friends, and accordingly this conference was represented and reported with all the disadvantage that could be to him; insomuch that many Parliament men that were his Friends, were much offended at it; which occasioned him as soon as he came to Cambridge, to write the several passages, and send them to those friends that were unsatisfied. But it was an evidence that the Duke and Doctor Preston were not so great, but that he sticked to the Prelates, and would in the issue leave Doctor Preston and the Puritans, which much abated good mens affections to the Duke; and it was believed that he had no such footing in the Kings affections, as he did pretend unto: Postea Maccenas speciem potius, quam vim tenuit in amicitia Principis. They thought his greatnesse began to languish; and it was believed in the University, that there was another favourite in being, though yet obscure: for the Earl of Suffolke much about this time died, who had been a long time Chancellor of the University of Cambridge, and great meanes was used to set the Duke up for to succeed him; but good men were fallen off, because of his deserting Doctor Preston, and others did believe his glory was departed; and so the Earl of Berkshire, the former Chancellors second Son, was set up against the Duke, and many visited for him that loved greatnesse, and were servants good enough unto the times; and it's believed, it had been carried for him against the Duke, if the wisdom of Doctor Goffing, then Vice-Chancellor, and some others in the scrutiny had not prevented it; but it was was pronounced for the Duke; and great care was taken for the investing of him in a very solemn manner. A representative of the University is designed to attend him at York-house in their habits, and a sumptuous Feast provided for their entertainment. The Duke sat in the midst of the Table among the Doctors, where, by some body, there was an health begun unto the King. When it came to Doctor Preston for to pledge it, he was uncovered and bowed as others had done, but drank but very little, and so delivered it unto the next; but one of the Doctors took notice that he drank not all, and told him, he had seen him drink as great a Glass of Wine, and did believe he could have drunk this if he would, but that he loved to be singular. The Doctor acknowledged he was not skillfull in the Laws of drinking healths, and therefore if he had offended, he desired it might be imputed to his ignorance; but he thought the end was to shew respect unto the persons named, which was done best by the Ceremonies that preceded, as being bare, standing up, and such like; wherein (he said) he had not willingly offended; but if it were an Engine to Court-intemperance, and to engage men unto greater quantities than themselves liked, it fell short of that modesty and freedom of the Heathens, Eph. 1. 8. and was a sin in all, but in men of their degree and rank an abominable wickednesse.

The Duke disliked this incivility; and frowned on the Doctor that occasioned it; but it was believed it could not have been done, without assurance that the Dukes affections were Ebbing towards Doctor Preston. And no wonder; for his end being to make impressions of good upon the Court, he could not but see, if they did not succeed, they would recoil. If you manure and sow your land, if the seeds subdues it not, and conquers it, it is enabled to bring forth the stronger weeds, Heb. 6. 7, 8. If your Peasles be cast before swine, they will also turn again and rend you, Mat. 7. 6. The Duke had now seen the worth and way of Doctor Preston; he had found that he could not winne him, and make him his, he could not therefore in the way of policy, but labour and resolve to wrack and sink him. When Herod was converted by prevailing conquering Augustus, for his great assistance of Mark Anthony his adversary, and knew it would be in Augustus power to take his head off, he settled his affairs, but gave peremptory order that his beloved Mariamne should be put to death; for this only reason, because another should not enjoy so great a beauty. So the Duke would not another should enjoy the great abilities of Doctor Preston, but was resolved to break him if he could; yet in a Civil Court way.

But the Doctor was too knowing, not to see this afar off, Prov. 22. 3. Qua alii levia faciunt, diu patiundo; ea sapiens, diu cogitando; and had accordingly provided a succession of reserves, wherein to hide himself. The first and surest was his conscience, 2 Cor. 1. 12. This is our rejoicing, the testimony of our Conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world. If a man be welcome into his conscience, he need not fear the stormes and blusters that he meets abroad. In te recedas, cum cogeris in turbas esse. When a man is forced to be where he would not, as Peter was foretold he should be, Joh. 21. 18. yet he may in despite of them retire into himself. Paul made it his businesse to have his Conscience alwaies up of offence, Act. 24. 16. and so did Doctor Preston; for though his actions, being many of them above the common size, were not alwaies understood, and very often mis-interpreted, yet he was innocent and upright alwaies in them. An undeniable argument whereof was, that he never sued for the least preferment, as we have said, but studied, and often consulted, how without breaking, he might avoid them.

And though he lived like himself, and gave relief to others, yet it was never of his own; as very many yet alive can witness. And indeed he was a man of very much Communion and sweet Society with God; prayed much in private, and by himself, besides as Tutor with his Pupils, and after, as Master in his Family. Whatever weakness he was in, or business did occur, kept many private daies of Fasting by himself, especially before the Sacraments and Sabbath-daies; and accordingly enjoyed a constant clearnesse and assurance of his Justification, and interest in the blood of Christ; even then, when frailties and infirmities did most of all afflict and wound him. He never (that I know) was troubled or perplexed about Adoption, though very often about the imperfection of his Graces, and the unconstancy of Sanctification; so as he studied most exactly that Treatise of the Saints Infirmities, and there is nothing in all his Works that may more properly be called his.

His next retreat was to Lincolns-Inn; for now he said, the Duke was Chancellor, and would endeavour to ingratiate himself, and be a Benefactor; and had brought Erpenius Manuscripts, and did verily intend to found a Library; and so it would be easie, and in his power, to out him, of the Colledge and University. For there was a resolution in some of the Fellows, to petition the Duke without him, and to annul the Statute of continuance or Commorator in the Colledge; yet he conceived the Lawyers would pretend a kind of freedom and exemption. For he saw, when that holy blessed Doctor Sibbs was outed, both of Fellowship and Lecture in the University, yet by the goodnesse and prudence of Sir Henry Yelverton, that constant Patron unto godly Ministers, (a vertue yet running in the veins of his posterity) he was received and retained at Graves-Inne, unto his death; therefore he would in no sort leave his title unto, and interest in Lincolns-Inne, but reserved it in his power unto his dying day.

But he knew Kings had long hands, and that the Dukes were nothing shorter; and that Lincolns-Inne, though a great deal stronger and better built then Graves-Inne, yet would not hold out long, in case the Duke should seriously beleagure it; therefore he pondered of removing farther off if need were. And having weighed all retreats, resolved upon Basil in the Switzers Countrey, as a place which the longest handed Kings had seldome touched, even when it was a receptacle of their greatest enemies; and therefore he resolved, in case he could not be free in England, to settle there, and spend the residue of his surviving dayes, in writing what he was not suffered to preach, or had not published according to his mind.

He was naturally very affable and courteous unto strangers of any Countrey, and by conversing much with them, endeavoured to preserve his knowledge in the French and Italian languages. But after he had thus resolved upon Basil, he was very friendly to all the Germans, that were dispersed from several Universities, especially from the Palatinate; for whom he procured several sorts of entertainments, both in the Countrey abroad, and in the University; for which, as he had very many Gratulatory Epistles from particular persons, so one of note from the King of Bohemia, under his Hand and Seal.

But he knew that these were but the Foxes earths, that might successively be taken and possessed. He therefore also thought upon that unum magnum of the Cat, or rather of the Holy Ghost, Prov. 18. 10. the Name of the Lord, that is, the goodnesse, mercy, power, of the mighty God; where he was well assured, he should for ever be free enough from Kings and Dukes. Yet these did no way retard his industry in using means. Obstructions quickned industrious and active minds, but damp and Clog the dull. There is a Statesman of no mean esteem, that writes professedly against the use of Cittadels and Forts, because it makes the Souldier lesse resolved in engagements. And the Spartans were forbidden to wall their City, because it would encourage Cowardise. But it did not take off Doctor Preston from his duty. For finding that his standing at Court was undermined, he resolved upon Buttresses to underprop him in the Countrey. There

There was in the Countrey of Northampton, a Gentleman of very able parts, and clear affections to the publick good, no stranger to the Court in former times, nor to the Duke of Buckingham, with whom the Doctor used to communicate affairs, and who was then a Parliament man of much esteem; to him, the Doctor in a Letter discovers all, shews him the hopelesse posture of the Duke, how much they both were disappointed in him; layes some directions what to do, and urgeth activeness. This Letter by a sad misfortune was let fall, by him that was intrusted to convey it, about Temple-Bar, and handed from one to one, until it came to Sir Henry Spillers; who having viewed and pondered the contents, concluded it was a purchase that would ingratiate him unto the Duke, and so immediately presents it to him.

The Duke was troubled to read his Faults and Face so shrewdly intimated and presaged. His temper was exceeding good, and he could manage his affections many times, with much serenity and moderation; but now he was quite off, and could not think of any thing but a revenge. I have not known any thing so trouble and afflict the Doctor as this did, that the Duke should have his hand against him, and that he had involved so good a man to whom he wrote. But it pleased God to cut the Duke out other work; for the cry of Rochel, and the protestants of France, was so exceeding great, and so much resented by the Parliament, that the Duke resolves to vindicate his honour by relieving them. And whilst he was busie to set that Fleet out, and furnish Forces for surprising the Isle of Rhees, he could not undertake that work of Revenge intended against Doctor Preston. But the Doctor thought not that he had done enough, unless he proclaimed in the Pulpit what he had often tould the Duke in private; according to that Command of Christ, Mat. 6. 27. What I tell you in darkness, that speak you in light; and what you hear in the ear, that preach on the house-tops. As Chrysostome to his people; Cum verum singuli audire non vultis, publice audietis. When the French Match was concluded, he preached that Sermon of the Pillar and ground of Truth, against the mingling of Religions, and mixing Truth with Falshood; and shewed how imposible it was to mingle Truth with Errour, or make up one Religion of theirs and ours. For, should they leave out any Tenet of their Church, it would follow, that the Church, in that, before had erred; and so that Pillar would be overthrown, on which have hanged so many necessary Points of Papery. Neither could we part with any one Truth; for Religion is of a brittle Nature; break it you may, bend it you cannot. It cannot be accommodated to respects of policy and interets of States and Kingdomes; but as Elements, when mingled in a compound body, do loose their proper Formes. So Religions, when made ingredients, and compounding parts of any other, do lose their Formes, and cease to be Religions in Gods account, 2 Kings 17. 33, 34. Pillar and ground, pag. 16.

And when the Rochellers were in distresse, and laid their ruine and disasters at our door; fathered their Losses and Calamities on us; he preached that Sermon of the new Life, where Page 48. we have these words: We cannot stand alone; what measure we mete to others in their Distress, men shall measure the same to us in our Necessity, Luk. 6. 38. And how soon the Fire may take here also, we know not. And pag. 52. If any be an impediment, nay, if any do not do their best, I pronounce this, in the Name of the most true God, that shall make it good sooner or later, that they and their Houses shall Perish, Esth. 4. 14. The Court was hood-wink't in all these Comminations; for by Church, they understood the Prelates and their Party, and the King thought if he adhered to them, and did their work, he was absolved. But those that read the Commentaries that have been written since in red Letters, will have occasion to believe the contrary.

And when the Duke was in the Isle of Rhees, in which Voyage he had engaged many of his very good Friends, and much of the Nobility and Gentry of the Kingdom, the Doctor preached that Sermon, called the Demonstration of the Deity, where page 81. ye have these words: It is certain, that evil is intended against us, and will come upon us, except something be done for to prevent it; for there is a Covenant between God and us, and breach of Covenant causeth a Quarrel; Now the Quarrel of God shall not go unrevengeed, Lev. 26. 25. I will send a Sword upon you, which shall avenge the quarrel of my Covenant. Gods quarrels are not rash and passionate as mens are; and therefore he will not lay them aside without some true and real Satisfaction. If we will not believe his Word, yet will we not believe his Actions? Are not our Allies wasted? Are not many branches of the Church cut off already, and more in hazard? In a word, have not our enterprizes been blasted, and withered under our hands for the most part? Have not things been long going down the Hill, and are even now hastning to a Period? This Sermon was preached to the King at Whitchall, on the Lords day, and on the Wednesday following, the news came of the total routing of our Army in the Isle of Rhees, which was such a ratification of his Prediction, but the Sabbath day before, as made many to believe he was a Prophet, and they called him Micaiah, because he seldom Prophecied good unto them. And Doctor Neal, then Bishop of Winchester, said, That he talked like one that was familiar with God Almighty. And they were the more affected with it, because the Doctor had another course to preach before his moneth was out, (for every Chaplain was to preach twice, once upon the Lords Day and also upon the Tuesday;) but the Doctor was desirous to exchange his course upon the Tuesday, for a Sabbath-Day. So Doctor Potter preached on the Tuesday, and Doctor Preston was to preach upon the Lords-Day following, and was resolved to proceed on the same Text, but to handle a point relating to the third Verse. For having shewed in this Sermon that things were not done by chance but by God, he now resolved for to shew, that God did things that men do not look for. Which being known among the Bishops, and they affrighted with that disaster at the Isle of Rhees, they interceded with the Clerke of the Closter, that seeing Doctor Prestons turn was past already, and this was Doctor Potters) another might be put up, and he deferred till another time, which was consented and yielded to: and so upon the Fryday before, a Messenger was sent unto the Doctor, to tell him, that another was provided to preach for Doctor Potter, and he might spare his pains. The Doctor wondered at the Providence; for he was resolved fully to have said that in that Sermon, if he had been suffered, that would in reason have deserved Micaiahs entertainment, 1 Kings 22. 27. But God was mercifull unto him, and used his enemies as instruments to save him from the danger. It would have damped some men to be thus refused. He might have said with him, Mat. 22. 4. Behold, I have prepared my Dinner, my Oxen and my Fatlings are killed, and all things are ready. But he considered what he had preached before, That a Sparrow fell not to the ground without Gods will. That his Will and Resolution for to sacrifice his all, was now accepted as Abrahams was; that his Sermon, whilest an Embryo, and only in intention, had an efficacious operation upon the Auditory. For as they had shewed and discovered their fears, so good men did their joys; and the Sermon was more talked of at Court and in the City, than any Sermon that ever he had preached before. For all men enquired what the Sermon was, that Doctor Preston was not suffered to preach; and many wise men were perswaded, that it did more good, then it would have done, in case it had been preached. So that in stead of being damped and dejected at the affront, he was enlivened and encouraged: Repulsus generoso excitat iram, languida iustitiam. I never knew him come home from the Court more satisfied, then then he, did this one, nor more encouraged in his Ministry at Cambridge; for he was then upon those Sermons of the Attributes, that since are printed, and God was greatly with him in them.

Those Fellows at Emanuel, that had been active in making of him Master there, were much dissatisfied, because the Doctor never would consent to the annulling of that Statute, De mora sociorum in Collegio. For he was convinced, that the Founder had added it upon very weighty grounds; and he saw it was a meanes to make the Fellows Preach, and look abroad, and lesse intend the actings of the Master; that young Scholars were heartned in their studies, with hopes that there would be preferments ready for them. And it was ordinary among the Scholars, to observe how long some Fellows were to stay. Therefore observing these affronts at Court, they Petitioned the King, that, that Statute might be abrogated. The Duke was glad of this occasion to be revenged upon his old Friend Doctor Preston, and did embrace it with all alacrity. Commissions were dispatched for to hear and consider their Allegations, and many meetings and debates were had about it; in which it was acknowledged, it was a Statute of equal power and validity with the rest, though added three years after; and upon that, one of the Fellows that had Petitioned fell off. The Doctor used all his Friends, for to support and keep in power and effect this Statute, and found very many very forward to assist him in it; but above all, a very Noble Grand-child of the Founders yet living, did much encourage and enable the defence: for though a Courtier, and much obliged, yet adventured, and waved all his interests, rather than he would behold his Grandfathers pious and prudent care so overthrown. So a temper was at last agreed on, that it should be suspended from effects in Law, untill six livings of an hundred pounds per annum, should be annexed to the Colledge.

The soul is the undoubted Sovereign of the body, and hath therein Despoticum imperium, an absolute and uncontroled Jurisdiction; and in case of injury or over-burdening, there is no action lies. But souls should consider, soft and fare goes far: Qui vult regnare diu, languida regnat manu. It was Hobson that told the Scholars they would come time enough to London, if they did not ride too fast. It was incurable in this good man to over-ride himself; for the body is pars compositi, when it is tired, we cannot take a new one at the next stage, as we do Horses. But he thought all was one, some lived as much in seven years, as others did in seventy. Non diu vixit, sed diu fuit was his opinion of many men, that our life is like to iron that will consume with rust, as much as employment: Vita sicut ferrum, exerceas, vel perit. These were his principles, and his actings were according; the most unmercifull unto his flesh of any living. And it's true, that not time, but actions should be the Met-wand of all mens lives. Non annos meos sed victorias numero: Not how long I have lived, but how? yet God doth usually allow his dearest servants time to do their work in. Moses 120 years of age, Deut. 34. 7. David an old man before he dies, 1 Chron. 29. 28. Paul aged, Phil. 9. notwithstanding all his labours and activity; but the Doctor had a shorter period put unto his daies: all mens is set, Job. 7. 1. his was short. It was no disparagement to good Josiah to die about the Doctors age, 2 Chron. 34. 1. Our glorious King Edward, that scarce out-lived his minority, out-stripped notwithstanding all his longest living Predecessors in doing good: God that had set his time, hastned his service, and so he did the Doctors. His preaching and studying labours were exceeding great; but that which spent and wore him, was his care and troubles for the Churches safety and prosperity; Often he would inculcate that, 2 Cor. 11. 28. That which cometh upon me daily, the care of all the Churches.

When his body therefore began to be sick and languish, he was content a little to abate and take off, and thought a Countrey house in some good sickness air might help; as formerly it had done; and accordingly took one at Linton, near the hills about six miles off, which he furnished and purposed to be in all the week, and come on Saturdays to preach upon the Lords dayes; and had this course been taken time enough, much might have been. But now he feared, sollicitude would but be changed into solitude, the air of suitable converse, he doubted, would be wanting there; and being alone, he saw, would too much gratifie his melancholy. The Spring therefore approaching, he was willing to consult with some Physicians; and London being far off, he sent to Bury for Doctor Despotine. His present malady was want of rest, which now Tobacco would not help him to, as formerly it had done; and therefore he proposed letting blood. The Doctor plainly told him, that might perhaps allay his heats, and purchase sleep; but if he were within the verge of a Consumption, it would be fatal to him. He was inticed notwithstanding with the deceitfull hopes of present ease, and so was let blood, but never lived to repair that losse. For sinking more and more, he went to London, and took advice of those that were best acquainted with his state of health, by their advice he retired a little unto Newington, unto a loving Friend of his that lived there, and then to Heyford-shire unto a thinner and more penetrating air. The malady they all agreed was in his lungs, which were not Ulcerated neither, but obstructed and oppressed with stiff and clammy matter, that he could not void, and perspiration was that he wanted, and they supposed a penetrating air might do the cure; but that was found too searching and corrosive for the other parts, which were pervious enough and penetrable. He therefore thought upon Northampton-shire, his native Countrey, which would in reason be most propitious unto him. However he would leave his breath where first he found it, and thankfully return what had been serviceable now a long time to him. He had at Preston four miles from Heyford, a very dear and bosome Friend, that was ambitious of entertaining good men; old Master Dod was but a mile off, and being seriously invited thither, he pitcht upon it, where he enjoyed with great contentment, what air, converse of friends, and loving entertainment could afford, and at the first was much refreshed by it; but nature being spent, and no foundation being left to work upon, all his refreshing quickly flagged. He had before made use of Doctor Ashworth, and he was one of much experience, and knew his body well; therefore he thinks of riding over unto Oxford to him, which he did, and there continued about twelve daies, and consulted with such as were there of any note. Men die and perish when their time is come, as well errore medici, as vi morbi. Doctor Ashworth was perswaded that the Scorbute was his disease, and that the London-Doctors had all mistook their mark, and therefore pitcheth upon applications suitable: A great error for so experienced and grave a Doctor. Desire of restitution into a state of health, made shift to flatter him into belief it was so. The old man upon this perswasion, comes over unto Preston with him, steeps and strains Scurvy-grass, and gives him Drenches able to have weakned a stronger man than he was now; and having stayed and tampered with him about three weeks, and finding nothing answer his expectation, he takes his last leave of him, giving such order and direction as he thought good, and so leaves him, and returns to Oxford, July 9. 1628.

When this dream and fancy of the Scorbute failed, and Doctor Ashworth was gone, he resigned up himself to God alone, and let all care of Physick and the Doctors go. He had a Servant who had been laborious with him, and whom he often used as a Friend, he would say, Servi sunt humiles amici, which was very true of him. To him he therefore now unbosomed himself, not only touching the vanity and emptinesse of all things here below, but his own belief and expectation of a suddain change; not of my company (said he,) for I shall still converse with God and Saints, but of my my place, and way of doing it. His Will was made (as we have said) some years before, but he was doubtfull, if it came to proving, it might be baffled and affronted, and therefore purposed to wave it, and make a Deed of Gift to him that was in that Will his Executor, with such restrictions and limitations as he thought good, all which he set down with his own hand; wherein he carefully provided for his Mother during life, and both his Brothers. His Books, and all the furniture and goods belonging to, and in his lodgings at Emanuel-Colledge, he gave one of his Pupils that was Fellow there, whom he alwaies greatly favoured. Some exhibitions he gave Scholars there to be disposed of from time to time, by him that was Executor. And as he truly valued, so he liberally rewarded his Servants faithfulness, who liveth yet in very good condition and reputation; of whom is verified what is said, Prov. 27. 18. Who so keepeth the fig-tree, shall eat the fruit thereof; so he that waiteth on his Master, shall surely come to honour. And having thus discombred himself of worldly cares, he took care for the places he now possessed, prayed for the Colledge, that it might continue a flourishing Nursery of Religion and Learning, told those about him, as David before his death, 1 Chron. 29. 2, 3; &c. what he had done towards that goodly building since erected, and what care he had taken to get those Rectories in the Kings Letter mentioned, whereof we spake before; prayed God to furnish Lincolns-Inne from time to time with able preaching Ministers, and so the Lecture at Cambridge, that had cost so much trouble in the procuring. Then for his Sermons, that they might not come into the world like Vagabonds; but seeing the Father lived not, to see them sated and provided for, those would be carefull whom then he named, and is long since intimated upon occasion. In all which great things God hath so answered him, as I think no man was since Elisha, 2 King. 2. 9, 10.

The night before he died, being Saturday, he went to bed, and lay about three hours desirous to sleep, but slept not; then said, My dissolution is at hand, let me go to my home, & to Jesus Christ who hath bought me with his precious blood. And so lay still as in a slumber, till about two of the clock in the morning; then drinking and resting on his servants armes, he fell into a cold and clammy sweat, which he told them was the Messenger of death; and so continued for about two hours very silent. About four of the clock, he said, I feel death coming to my heart, my pain shall now be quickly turned into joy. And so his Friends were called that were present in the house, who spake unto him, but had no answer from him as they were used to have. They kneeled all down, and a Reverend Divine there present prayed. When Prayer was ended, he looked on them, and turning away his head, gave up the ghost. It was about five a clock on the Lords-day, but to him an everlasting Sabbath. He never (by his good will) rested that day, since God was truly known unto him untill now; God gave him therefore now an everlasting Rest. No man deserved better Funeral solemnities. But Master Dod was much against it; and his Friends at Cambridge, who did highly honour him, and desired nothing more, than to have waited on his dust unto its long home, were now obliged to attend the Election of another Master, that they durst not so much as make it known, or do any thing, from which it might be gathered. So he was buried decently, but without state, in Fawsley Church in the County of Northampton. Old Master Dod, the Minister of that place preached, and a world of godly people came together, July 20. 1628. being within a little of one and forty years of age.

Doctor Preston just before his death, asked what day it was, and being answered, that it was Sabbath day; A fit day (said he) to be sacrificed on; I have accompanied Saints on earth, and now I shall accompany Angels in Heaven. Also, Mrs. Chaderton telling him of his preaching so profoundly on Gods Attributes, he answered; If it shall please God to prolong my life, I will make all so plain, that every one shall be able to understand it.

M<sup>r</sup>. ARTHVR HILDERSAM

The Life of Master Arthur Hildersam, who dyed Anno Christi 1631.

His Paren-
tage.

Arthur Hildersam was born at Stetchworth, near New-Market in Cambridge-shire, Octob. 6. 1563. He was Son of Thomas Hildersam of the said Town (a Gentleman of an antient Family) and Anne Poole, his second Wife, daughter to Sir Jeffery Poole, fourth Son to Sir Richard Poole, (who was Cousen Germane to King Henry the seventh) and Margaret Countesse of Salisbury, that was Daughter to George Duke of Clarence, (the second Brother to King Edward the fourth) and Isabel the eldest daughter and Co-heir of Richard the great Earl of Warwick, and Salisbury. Thus much for his Birth.

His Educa-
tion.

For his Education; In his childhood, he was brought up in the Popish manner, taught to say his Prayers in Latine; both his Parents and their Kindred, especially his Mother, being zealous Papists. When he was to be sent abroad to School, his Fathers aim was only to send him to a good School, where many many Gentlemens Sons were taught, but God so ordered it, (by his good providence) that his Father unawares, placed him at Saffron Walden School in Essex, with one Master Disborough, a godly man, and a Religious House-stant, who taking great affection to him for his wit and disposition, was very careful of him, and taught him not only that humane learning that was fitting for his years, but the grounds of the Protestant Religion. This his School-master, was the first blessed Instrument that God was pleased to make use of, to work in him a liking and relish of the Reformed Religion. He continued with him, till he was fit for the University, which was not long. For when he was but about thirteen years of age, he was placed by his Father (the good hand of God still over-ruling him) with a very godly and Religious Tutor in Christs Colledge in Cambridge, where he continued till after he was Master of Arts, where he gained much love and esteem for his Piety, Learning, Ingenuity, affability and harmlesse inoffensive witty Converse.

When he had continued in Cambridge some two years, or thereabouts, his Father sent him up to London, intending to send him to Rome, (being confident he should neither want respect, encouragement, nor preferment, for his great Uncles [Cardinal Poole] sake, Brother to his Mothers Father) but he refusing to go, his Father kept him long at London, taking him from one Papish Ordinary to another, hoping that such company, would at length have prevailed with him, to have gone according his desire. But he continuing firm in his resolution, not to go to Rome, his Father resolved to cast him off; which soon after he did. Thus he, whom God had appointed to suffer much for him, began to bear the yoke in his youth, and in his tender years, became a Confessor in forsaking Father, Friends, all present maintenance, and probable hopes of great future preferment for Christs sake.

Being in this dejected and forlorn condition, God that comforteth those that are cast down, comforted him by meeting with Master John Ireton (then Fellow of Christs Colledge, after Rector of Kegwarth in Leicestershire, a man famous for Piety and Learning) in London, who at their meeting, said unto him; Arthur, why art thou so long from thy Book, and losest so much time? Alas Sir, said he, I shall go no more to Cambridge; and thereupon told him his condition, and the occasion of it. Be not discouraged, (saith Master Ireton) thou hast a Noble Kinsman, whom I will acquaint with thy case: and I doubt not but he will provide for thee. Accordingly Master Ireton soon after went to the Right Honourable Henry Earl of Huntingdon, Lord President of the North (whose Mother and Master Hildersams Mother, were Brothers Children) and representeth to him the sad condition of his poor Kinsman: The Noble Earl gladly embraced this opportunity of doing good; and sent for him, encouraged him, promised him maintenance, and gave order to Master Ireton to send him back to Cambridge, and to place him with a good Tutor. For (said he) I suppose his Father did place him with a Papist. But when Master Ireton assured him the contrary, he gave order he should go to his former Tutor, of whose love to him, and care of him, Master Hildersam was wont often to speak.

When Master Hildersam was Master of Arts, he was soon after to Common-place, [a Colledge exercise in Divinity, not different from a Sermon, but in length] he being loth to adventure upon that Exercise, intreated one of the Fellows (his special Friend) to supply his place the first time; but he, out of love, refused to gratifie him in that, and wished him to remember one Master Sidney Zouch, Master of Arts of that Colledge, who getting one to supply his place the first time, and hearing afterwards some of his own year perform that Exercise so well, that he deserved of doing the like; could never after, be perswaded either to Commonplace; or preach, though he were a very able Schollar. The first time he was to Common-place, he was much afraid; but observing that there sate a very godly man (his Friend) on the other side of the Chappel, he thought, that, that man Prayed for him, which much encouraged him.

He was of so good repute for his Piety and Learning, that by the major part of the Fellows he was chosen Fellow of that Colledge; But Doctor Barwell (the Master) making use of his negative voice, stopped him; and the matter came to the Visitors, two of which viz. Doctor Perne, and Doctor Goad, favouring his Competitor, Master Willet, (who was afterwards Doctor Willet) made him Fellow. Not long after, he was chosen Divine of Trinity-hall in the said University; where he continued till Septemb. the 14, 1587. at which time, by the foresaid Right Honourable Earle, he was called to be, and placed Preacher at Ashby de la zowce in Leicester shire. The impropriate Tithes of the same Parish being settled upon him for his life by the said Earl, and continued to him by the favour of the two succeeding Earls, George, and Henry, untill his death. He hath given publique notice to the world, of his duty and thankfulnesse to that noble Houle, in his Dedictory Epistle to his Lectures on Joh. 4.

January 5. 1590. He married Mistresse Anne Barfoot (Daughter to Master Barfoot of Lamborn-hall in Essex, who was a very loving and carefull Wife of him, and the like Mother of his Children,) she survived him about eight years. He was silenced in June 1590. and restored again in January, 1591. He was instituted and inducted into the Vicaridge of Ashby, Octob. 4. 1593.

He preached at the Assises at Leicester in the time of a great dearth,
July 20. 1596. a godly, learned, zealous, plain, and powerfull Sermon, upon those words, 1 King. 18. 17, 18. And it came to passe when Ahab saw Elijah, that Ahab said unto him, Art thou he that troublest Israel? And he answered, I have not troubled Israel, but thou and thy fathers house, in that ye have forsaken the Commandements of the Lord, and thou hast followed, Baalim. In the handling of which Text he so offended Judge Anderson, that he manifested his anger and displeasure, both by his countenance and gesture, arising to go away; But Master Hildersam speaking some words unto him with ministerial authority, he stayed till the Sermon was done. After Sermon, the Judge would have had the Grand-Jury to have indited him; but in those daies, it would have been hard to have found a Grand-Jury in Leicester-shire, that would have done that. Some further and greater danger Master Hildersam was in, by reason of that Judges displeasure for that Sermon; but God in mercy prevented it.

In the year 1598. there was an attachment sent out of the High-Commission for his apprehension. In the beginning of King James his reign, when many petitioned for Reformation, (which Petitions were very modest and moderate, subscribed by above seven hundred and fifty godly able Preachers, in but twenty five Counties; which Petition was directed to the Parliament, and other Petitions to his Majesty and the Lords of the Council, and to the Bishops:) he with some few others of his Brethren, were chosen, and chiefly intrusted to mannage that important businesse, to profecute the Petitions, to sollicite the cause; and if required, to dispute it. And whereas there were some appointed to deal (for those that desired Reformation,) in the Conference at Hampton-Court, he, with Master Stephen Egerton of London, and Master Edward Fleetwood of Lanca-shire, delivered to them some ten demands and requests, made by thirty Reverend Ministers: in the name of themselves and many others, which they intreated them to sollicite his Majesty for, in the behalf of the Church.

He was deprived and silenced by William Chaderton, then Bishop of Lincolne,

Lincolne, April 24. 1605. for refusall of subscription, and conformity; yet after some time, by the connivance and favour of William Overton, then Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, he preached sometimes in that Diocesse, specially at those two famous Exercises at Burton upon Trent in Staffordshire, and Repton in Derbyshire, which were the meanes of great good to the souls of many both Ministers and private Christians in the parts adjacent. He was the main upholder of these two Exercises for many years.

The success
of his Ministry.

In January 1608. by the favour of William Barlow, then Bishop of Lincolne, he was allowed to preach again at Ashby aforesaid, where he began his Lectures on John 4. 10. January 31. and continued that Lecture weekly on Tuesday, till Novemb. 12. 1611. These Lectures being one hundred and eight, he published in his lifetime, 1628. having them all written by himself, before he preached them; which course he took when he began those Lectures, and continued it to his dying day, blaming himself much, that he began it no sooner, and by that neglect, both himself and others were deprived (in a great part) of the benefit of his former labours.

He is restored to Ashby.

His Lectures on
John 4.

Novemb. 1611. he was silenced by Richard Neales meanes, then Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, who complaining to the King of him, the King commanded the Arch-Bishop, to write to the Bishop of Lincolne, to send for Master Hildersam, and to silence him, which was accordingly presently done. The occasion of Bishop Neales complaint to King James was this: One Edward Wightman, a damnable Heretick (afterward burnt at Lichfield for Blasphemy and Heresie,) dwelling in Burton upon Trent aforesaid, and coming sometimes to the Exercise there, the Bishop and his Friends gave out, that Wightman learned his Opinions (at least that of the souls sleeping) of the Puritans, and at the foresaid Exercises, and of Master Hildersam by name. Bishop Neal informing King James of this, the King commanded him, (when he went into the Countrey) to send for Master Hildersam, and to hear what he could answer Wightman in this matter. The Bishop accordingly sent for Master Hildersam, but would not hear his defence till Wightman came. Wightman being called to his second publique hearing, Novemb. 26. 1611. (in the hearing of more than five hundred people) charged the Bishop with sundry wrongs he had done him, naming this for one; That he had given it out, that he had learned his Opinions from Master Hildersam: whereas I professe (said he) he never taught, nor confirmed me in any of them; but was of all men ever most opposite unto me in them, and caused mine own Friends to reject me for them. Master Hildersam had long before in a private conference, in the presence of Master Aberly, the Minister of Burton, (who had intreated him to take some pains to reclaim Wightman;) shewed him that his Opinion of the souls sleeping, was directly repugnant to the holy Scriptures, and an Heresie long since condemned in the Church. The places of Scripture he urged against him, were these, Luk. 16. 22, 23, & 23. 43. Phil. 1. 23. Soon after, he received a Letter from Wightman, March 10. 1608. and perceiving by that, and the report of others, that he grew more and more obstinate in his errors, and laboured to draw others unto it, Master Hildersam took occasion in the next Exercise held at Burton, viz. upon March 15. 1608. publickly and at large to confute his error; The Text that fell out that day to be handled, Leading him directly unto it, viz. Heb. 9. 27. Above a moneth after the said exercise, viz. April 21. 1609. Wightman sent him another Letter, wherein he revileth him for the said speech, at the said Exercise, and took upon him, after his manner to answer it. Yet after this, viz. November 27. 1611. before the Bishop, he impudently avouched to Master Hildersams face, that at the conference forenamed, he should say, That the whole drift of the Scripture indeed, did make for the Opinion of the souls sleeping, but that the Church had otherwise judged of the matter. Master

Hildersam

Hilderſam did protest, that he never spake or thought so; and offered by Oath, or any other means that should be required to avow, that he ever held this his Opinion, to be directly contrary to the Scriptures, and a most detestable Heretic: Master Aberly also, who was present at the conference, was ready to depose that Master Hilderſam spake no such thing at that time; but the direct contrary. So that not only the rest that were there, were fully satisfied; but the Bishop himself also openly professed, that he was assuredly perswaded, that Wightman had greatly wronged him in this that he had said of him. Thus was Master Hilderſams innocency cleared in a publique audience, during the time of Wightmans trial at Lichfield; yet he remained under the Censure of silencing, which was procured to be inflicted on him upon this occasion; and the two forenamed Exercises were put down. Concerning which, all the chief Gentlemen of worth in those parts, certified unto the Arch-Bishop Bancroft a little before his death, that the profit which that Country (which above most other places of the Land besides, was known to stand in great need of such means of instruction) received by them was exceeding great.

He is cited into the High-Commission
Court.

Silenced.

Master Hilderſam continued silenced a long time, yet could not live peaceably from men, though he lived quietly with men. For December 8. 1612. Letters missive were sent out of the High-Commission Court, requiring his appearance there; accordingly he appeared. April. 22. 1613. at which time he was judicially admonished and enjoined, that (saving the Catechizing of his own Family only) he should not at any time hereafter Preach, Catechize, or use any part of the office, or function of a Minister, either publicly or privately, untill he should be lawfully restored and released of his said suspension.

His sick-
ness.

In the Spring, 1614. he fell into a violent Feaver, which held him long, the malignancy of which, struck up into the Roof of his mouth, and the gristle of his nose, which endangered him much; but by the blessing of God, upon the care and skill of Physicians and Chyrurgeons, he was recovered.

His second summons
into the High-Commission
Court.
His imprisonment.

In Easter-term 1615. by Letters missive he appeared in the High Commission Court again, which committed him to the Fleet, (for refusal of the Oath ex Officio.) where he continued a Prisoner divers weeks; at length he was removed by Habeas Corpus unto the Kings Bench, where he continued a great while. In both places, he endured imprisonment three moneths. Then he was delivered out of prison, upon bond, to appear the first Court day, Term. Mich. 1615. but by dangerous sickness (whereof affidavit was made in Court,) he was hindered from appearing at that time.

September 4, 5, 6. 1616. The Commissioners, Doctor Lamb, Master Owen, Master Middleton, and others, sate at Ashby, to examine witnesses to prove the Articles exhibited against Master Hilderſam, and his neighbours, Master Dighton and Master Holt, where the deponents were, many of them, professed adversaries, especially Master Hacket, (then Vicar of Ashby) who was the principal accuser and informer of the Court against them; and so his testimony ought not in Law to have been received against them. It might well have been discerned by the disposition of many of the deponents, what little credit was to be given to them; and that Master Hilderſam might have had the most odious and Capital Crimes deposed against him by such Witnesses, who did not only in matter of Fact affirm upon Oath, that which all the Parish knew to be notoriously false; but did also take upon them to know and deliver upon their Oath, the Reason and Ground of his pretended Practice, which (they having ever been, as all the Neighbours knew, meer strangers to him) was impossible for them to do it.

He is falsly accused.

Hilder-

Hilderſam hearing of the heavy ſentence againſt Maſter Digby, and Maſter Holt, November 21. 1616. (viz to return back to priſon, there to remain till they conformed themſelves; they were alſo fined a thouſand pounds a peice, pronounced excommunicate, and ordered to be ſo publickly denounced, and enjoyned to make their ſubmiſſions, in conceptis verbis, in three ſeveral places; & laſtly, they were condemned in expences & coſts of the ſuit) concealed himſelf, and did not appear at the day of his calling and cenſuring, but did eight daies before ſend a Copy of his answer to the ſeveral points that were depoſed againſt him, to his Advocate, Doctor Huſſey, to be ſhewed to the Court; Which Answer, in the judgement of rational, honeſt, indifferent men, was full and ſatisfactory.

To inſtance but in the proof of one Article, and his Answer thereunto: One George Reding depoſed, That upon Palm-ſunday was two years, he was one of thoſe that came up to the Communion-Table in Aſhby Church in ſeveral companies, and (though Maſter Hacket had before given warning, that he would admit none that would not receive it kneeling) reſuſed ſo to receive it, but would have received it ſtanding; and when he could not have it ſo, yet ſtood ſtill among them that kneeled, till the Communion was done. To which depoſition Maſter Hilderſams answer was, That it is Notoriously known to all the Inhabitants at Aſhby, that I was at that time ſick in my bed, and for many weeks before, and after, utterly unable to ſtir out of my Chamber; neither did I ever at any other time preſent my ſelf in that manner to the Communion-Table, neither doth Maſter Hacket, or any other deponent charge me with any ſuch matter. And this fellow that hath deviſed this againſt me, whereof there was no colour at all of truth) would in all likelihood have ſworn any thing that might have done me hurt, if he had been required to do it. Notwithſtanding this his answer to that, and his answer to all the reſt, delivered as aforeſaid to his Advocate, the Court proceeded to Cenſure him, November 28. 1616. whereby he was pronounced a man refractory and diſobedient to the Orders, Rites, and Ceremonies of the Church of England. And becauſe he yet reſuſed to ſubmit himſelf, and to joyne in the adminiſtration of publique Prayer, and divine Service and Sacraments, as they are here lawfully adminiſtered; therefore he was by the Court pronounced a Schiſmaticall perſon, and a Schiſmatick, and thought well worthy of ſevere puniſhment. And in reſpect that he was the prime Ring-leader of all the Schiſmatical perſons in that Countrey, both of the Clergy and Laity, he was firſt fined two thouſand pounds to his Majeſties uſe, pronounced excommunicate, and ordered to be ſo publickly denounced; as alſo was ordered to be attached and committed to priſon, and ſo to be brought before the Commiſſioners, to be degraded from his Miniſtry; and was further ordered, to make his publique ſubmiſſion conceptis verbis, (as ſhall be preſcribed him by this Court;) and laſtly, he was condemned in charges.

When he heard of this terribly cruel ſentence, it was his wiſdom now to conceal himſelf, which accordingly he did for a long time in the City; and God ſo hid him under the ſhadow of his Wings, that his adverſaries could not meet with him.

During this time of his keeping cloſe, one Maſter John Harth, one of the Elders of the English Congregation, at Leiden in Holland, came with Letters of Credence from the Congregation, making offer to him of the Paſtors place, then Vacant; which he reſolved to have accepted of, had not his Wives unwillingneſſe to go over the Seas, retained him here. The aforeſaid fine of two thouſand pounds was eſtreated without abatement into the Exchequer, March 12. 1616. whence ſeveral Proceſſes were iſſued to the Sheriffs of Leiceſterſhire, to enquire of his eſtate; but they, by ſeveral returns, answered, They could find none. At length, the ſaid fine was begged, and granted by his Majeſty, King James, under the Great Seal, to Maſter Williams, Page to the (then) Marqueste of Buckingham; whereupon Master Hildersam compounded both with him, (giving him a great summe of money,) and with the Registers also of the High-Commission Court, for their part of the fine, and obtained a discharge from them both. I suppose it will be hard to find that any man was before, or scarce hath been since in that Court, so deeply fined, and heavily censured, meerly for his judgment and conscience; having done nothing either factiously, or contemptuously against that Government, and those orders of the Church, that were then established. He was indeed alwaies from his first entering into the Ministry, a resolved and conscientious Non-conformist, as appeareth by the foregoing story, and so continued to his dying day, witnesse that clause in his last Will: I do hereby declare and protest, that I do continue and end my daies, in the very same Faith and Judgment, touching all points of Religion, as I have ever been known to hold and profess, and which I have, both by my Doctrine and Practice, and by my sufferings also, given testimony unto. He was a great admirer, follower, and Friend of Master Thomas Cartwright (famous for Religion and learning) who left his papers to Master John Dod and him, to peruse and publish what they thought fit.

Though he himself was a constant Non-Conformist, yet such was his ingenuity and Christian Charity, that he respected, esteemed, and was very familiar with those he knew to be Religious and learned, though of a nother judgment. He did alwaies oppose the separation of the Brownists, and the semi-separation of Master Jacob, with whom, as also with some Ring-leaders of the former sort, he had divers Conferences and Disputes. He is called by Doctor Willet (his Contemporary, and sometimes Competitor) The Hammer of Schismatics, whom they commonly call Brownists; as you have it in J. C. his Epistle to the Reader, before the forenamed Lectures, on John 4. That is, Master John Cottons of New-England, (his dear and familiar Friend,) who there expresses his high Opinion of the Author, those Lectures, and his Treatise of the Doctrine of the Lords Supper, printed 1608. annexed to a little Treatise of the like Argument, set forth by a godly learned Man (his intimate Friend) Master William Bradshaw, of which Treatise of Master Hildersams, Master Cotton gives this Testimony: That it hath been of singular good use to many poor Souls for their preparation to that Ordinance. And in very deed (saith he) those questions and answers do more fully furnish a Christian to that whole spiritual Duty, than any other, in any Language (that I know) in so small a compass. Master Cotton also mentioneth in the foresaid Epistle, a Letter of Master Hildersams, to a Gentlewoman, against separation, which, without his consent, a Separatist (Master Francis Johnson) printed and refuted; Which (saith Mr. Cotton) hath so strongly and clearly convinced the iniquity of that way, that I could not but acknowledge in it, both the Wisdome of God, and the weakness of the Separatist; His wisdom, in bringing to light such a beam of the light of his Truth, by the hand of an Adversary, against the Authors mind; and the weakness of the other, to advance the hand of his Adversary, to give himself and his Cause such a deadly Wound in open view, as neither himself nor all his Associates can be able to heal. His judgment and Testimony of the Author, and his Lectures on John 4. you may read in that Epistle. In a private Letter of his from Boston, February 3. 1629. to him; he mentioneth a Letter he received from a Dutch Minister in London, (one Timotheus Van Ul-cren) who telleth him, he had sent sundry of the Books on John 4. to Ministers beyond the Seas, who do read them with such great satisfaction, that the said Dutch Minister did, in the name of many others, intreat Mr. Cotton, to beseech Mr. Hildersam to put forth his Sermon on Psal. 51. and other his lucubrations. And accordingly Master Cotton in that Letter writeth thus; Since the Sermons already on part of the Psalm, do arise to a just and full Volume, be intreated to hearken to the deſires of ſo many at home and abroad, and give them leave to be doing good, whileſt the reſt are preparing. You have cauſe to love the Lord your God with all your might; and therefore, ſince thoſe Sermons might be ſhewing your love to God in working his work, before their fellows, do not hold back any part of their Service to the Church, for the preſent time. This his Requeſt he Renewed, in another Letter, of July 23. 1629.

Having mentioned the Teſtimony and judgment of the Reverend Maſter Cotton, concerning Maſter Hilderſam and his labours, whom in his Reply to Maſter Roger Williams answer of his Letter, p. 117. he ſtileth him A man of a thouſand; I ſhall inſert another Teſtimony of a man deſervedly Famous in the Church, Doctor Preſton, then Fellow of Queens Colledge in Cambridge, concerning the forementioned Lectures on John 4. He having long deſired, at length obtained of Maſter Hilderſam the Copy of them, which he kept a long time, and peruſed, and being deſired to deliver his Opinion of them, in his Letter to the Author, November 28. 1615. ſpeaketh thus.

I will ſay to you faithfully and ingeniouſly what I think, without adding a word more than mine own heart is perſwaded of. Firſt in general, for putting them to the Preſſe, I do not only think that they are worthy of it, but ſo far as any intreaty of mine might prevail, I ſhould preſs you to it, as depriving Gods Church of a very great Benefit, if you ſhould reſuſe. In particular, beſides the profitableneſs of the matter, theſe two things I obſerve in the Reading of it: Firſt, throughout the whole carriage, there appeareth a continued ſtrength (that I may ſo call it) without any failing or deficiency, without any inequality, unevenneſs of Deformity of ſome parts with the reſt. Secondly, it is preſs and ſuccinct (though large) the things choiſe and pertinent, and thoroughly depending each on other. In brief, ſo it is, there is nothing that need be added, and nihil quod amputem. So that when I went about to take out ſome things for mine own uſe briefly, I could not almoſt tell what to leave out. To ſay all in a Word, Sir, I do think it is ſuch as will answer to your Name, and ſuch as men would look for from you. There are very few Writings, but wherein we commonly ſee ſome failings in theſe two particulars, which I mentioned. Beſides, the method I much like, as very judicious, which hath not ruled you, but you it, in a ſeaſonable changing it, as your matter lieth, ſo caſting the frame of it, that it extorteth not more than is neceſſary from you, nor cutteth off any thing that you would deliver: which one precise, uniform Method ſtrictly kept, often doth. I hope it will be a good help to Miniſters when they read it, and bring the method of Doctrine and Uſes into more credit. Theſe are Doctor Preſtons own words in his Letter. Unto this ample and laudable teſtimony given, by theſe two Worthies, this may be added, that his moſt grave and authoritative manner of preaching, did give an edge and excellency unto his Miniſtry.

Though Maſter Hilderſam, in the judgment of theſe eminent Divines at home and abroad, and moſt others that knew him, were a man of ſuch worth and ability, and whoſe labours were ſo uſeful in the Church; yet was he for a long time, by the then prevailing power in the Church, caſt aſide like a broken veſſel.

After his cenſure in the High-Commiſſion Court, he lived privately a long time, ſometimes in the City, ſometimes in the Countrey.

He was alwaies, whether ſilent or having a liberty to preach, a conſtant ſtudent. When he was in the Countrey, and had conveniency of place and weather, he uſed to walk alone every morning near an hour, to meditate. In the morning he read conſtantly a Chapter, whence he gathered ſome obſervations, and wrote them in a Book, with the reference to ſome common-place in the margent, which he referred to his Common-place Book by numbers. The like he did out of many Books that he read; in others which he read, he referred the most observable things in them to his Common-place Book, by the pages in them. As he was much in secret Prayer, so was he fervent therein; yea frequent in holy ejaculations audibly expressed, as was observed by some godly Friends, whose occasions brought them often near to the place where he studied.

His care to profit by the Word.

He was alwaies a diligent frequenter of the publique Assemblies, whether he were in the City or Countrey; He used often even in his old age to write Sermons in the Church. He so highly prized the Ministry of the Word, that he would often say, He never heard any godly Minister Preach, though but of weak Parts, but he got some Benefit by him.

He sojourned in many Families, and alwaies by his godly and amiable carriage, got love and esteem of all in the house.

In all places where he did reside, or whither he came occasionally, he was alwaies helpfull in Family-Prayers, in expounding the Scriptures read, and in the repetition of the Sermons preached in the Publique Congregation; being also willing by private conference to instruct the ignorant, to satisfie the doubtfull, to settle the wavering, to comfort the dejected, and to encourage all sorts in the exercises of Religion.

His sickness

He was much in the house of Mistresse Katherine Redich of New-hall in Derbyshire, (widdow to Alexander Redich of Redich in Lancashire Esquire, his bosome Friend) his antient acquaintance, and constant dear Friend to his death, who survived him not above eight daies; the grief for his death hastening (as it was supposed) her end. In her house at Hamstead near London, August 21. 1624, he fell sick of a violent Feaver, which put him into such danger, that the Physicians doubted of his Recovery; He over-hearing some intimation of it, when he thought none were in the room, the Curtains being drawn about his bed, he was over-heard by one in the room, to speak audibly those words of Psal. 118. 17. I shall not die, but live, and declare the works of the Lord. At that time there was as little hope of his preaching, as of his recovery. But God, in great mercy, soon after restored him both to health and liberty. The next year, viz. June 20. 1625. he was licensed by Doctor Ridley, then Vicar-general to the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, to preach in the Diocesse of London, Lincoln, and Coventry, and Lichfield, under the Seal of that office. By vertue of which License he began to preach, August 3. 1625. in Ashby Church aforesaid, those eight Sermons on Psal. 35. 13. concerning, Fasting, Prayer, and Humiliation for sinne, which were published since his death, viz. 1632. according to his own Copy left under his hand, by his Son Master Samuel Hilderlam.

His Lectures on Psal. 51.

September 28. 1625. he began his one hundred and fifty two Lectures on Psal. 51. published in the like nature, 1635.

He is again silenced

After the last forementioned licensing, he was silenced again, March 25. 1630. by notice given him from the Court at Leicester of the Kings instructions, for every Lecturer to read service in Surplice and Hood, and he began to preach again, Aug. 2. 1631. and so continued till December 27. 1631. which was the last Sermon that he preached.

His last sickness.

Soon after he fell sick, of his last sickness, and discerning it to increase, he sent for his forenamed Sonne dwelling at West-Felton in Shropshire, forty nine miles from Ashby; He with his Wife came to him withall convenient speed, January 13. and stayed with him till his death.

Their company and attendance at that time (as alwaies formerly,) was very contenting and comfortable. And of his Daughter-in-law (who was by himself propounded as a meet Wife for his dearest Son, and in whom he ever took much delight) he was heard, with affection to ingeminate these words, Never man had a kinder Daughter-in-law. His

His disease (though not discerned to be so at the first) proved the Scorbute, the which being a dull and melancholick distemper, indisposed him to speak much; yet, as he shewed wonderfull patience through his whole sickness, so he used many holy and heavenly expressions to those that attended him, or came to visit him, who (he being so much beloved and honoured in the Countrey) were not a few.

He suggested unto some dear Friends, his fears that Wolves would ere long come in amongst them, and thereupon earnestly exhorted them to continue stedfast in the Truth, which they had received. And occasion being given to mention those words, 1 Tim. 3. 5. How shall he take care of the Church of God? Looking to his Son, he said, Oh Son, Son, that care of the Flock, is the main thing.

The most godly people in those parts, his constant Hearers (who had been either Converted to Christ, or edified and confirmed in Grace by his Ministry) being very sensible of the great loss, which not themselves only, but the whole Church of God also would sustain by his Death, (that they might not seem negligent in the use of any means within their reach, to prolong his Life and their own comfort) did resolve amongst themselves to set apart a Day, that they might solemnly in publique seek the Lord by Fasting and Prayer in his behalf, wherein they had the hearty help of Master Simcon Ashe, both in the morning and afternoon by Sermons, and Supplications, who did more owe himself unto Master Hildersam, than to any other man, having been first placed in the University, under the Tuition of Famous Master Thomas Hooker, Fellow of Emanuel Colledge, and afterwards directed and encouraged in his Ministry, by his great Care and Love.

March 4. being the Lords Day, he grew very Weak, and was prayed for in the Congregation in Asbby Church, both at the morning and evening Exercise. His Son Prayed with him divers times that Day, and whilst he was praying the last time, he departed, and slept in the Lord, between nine and ten of the Clock that Night, viz. March 4. 1631. Thus he who had diligently heretofore, kept the Holy Rest of the Sabbath, did in the Close of the Sabbath, Rest from his Labours, and having glorified God often, both in publique and private, on that day before, was at last on that day received into Glory. Master Herring (his dear and familiar Friend) being then at Coven-try, was sent for the next Day, and came and Preached the Lecture in Asbby Church on Tuesday, March 6. in the morning, (Master Hildersam having taken Order in his Will, that there should be no Funeral-Sermon at his Burial;) and then spake like himself, Holily, Discreetly, Learnedly, and Affectionately. Concerning the losse, that, that Congregation, the Countrey, and whole Church had sustained by the death of him that was lately Dead. In the afternoon of that day, his Body was born by Neighbour-Ministers to the Grave, accompanied by a great Multitude, both of Ministers and others, who expressed much Sorrow and Lamentation.

His Death.

His Burial.

He lived in Asbby aforesaid for the most part (yet being often forced to remove his dwelling) of forty three years, and six moneths, with great success in his Ministry, love and reverence of all sorts. He was very Charitable to the Poor himself, and in exciting of his Auditors to contribute towards their Relief. In few Country-Congregations in England the Collections for the Poor were so large, as they were at the Quarter-days at his Lectures.

His charity.

The losse of poor Asbby by his Death, was exceeding great; for he was the Peace-maker amongst Neighbours, and the Patron of the Poor; wickedness was checked, and Godliness cherished by his great Care and Wisdom. He was a Friend to every one in a good Cause, and it was his unwearied Delight to be Christianly serviceable in any kind.

He lived to a great Age, (considering that his paines in Preaching did ordinarily weaken him so much) sixty eight Years and five Moneths; yet this happiness God vouchsafed to him, which was more than ordinary, that he out-lived not his Parts, but as his Graces increased towards his end, so his Abilities of Invention, Judgment, Memory, Elocution decayed not in his age. He left a precious memory behind him; had Letters of Commendation written in the hearts of many, of which some live here, some in Glory. His Books will pfove more durable Monuments of his Name, than that his Sonne Erected for him in Abby Church.

And yet his Name, with the lively Picture of his Person, lives in his worthy Son, Master Sammuel Hildersam, whose Learning Cambridge knew, while he was Fellow of Emanuel Colledge; and whose present Ministerial Labours, and Pious Conversation at West-Felton in Shropshire, do perpetuate the Honour of his Reverend Father, whose very Memory he doth much Reverence, and whose Rich Vertues, both personal and Ministerial, he doth happily imitate. And his good help from his Fathers Papers, and other ways, hath most conduced to the drawing up of this faithful Relation, that God may be Glorified, and many Souls may be edified by this Famous Example, thus presented unto publick view.

D<sup>r</sup>. TAYLOR

*The Life of Doctor Thomas Taylor, sometimes Pastor of Aldermanbury London, who dyed
Anno Christi 1632.*

Thomas Taylor was born at Richmond in Torkshire, of His Father worthy and godly Parents, His Father was Recorder of that Town, and a very Gaius or Onesiphorus to the silenced Ministers of England, and to the exiled Ministers of Scotland. He brought up divers Sons into the Ministry. This Son of his (as the other) was of a Child trained up in the holy Scriptures, which are able to make wise to salvation. Afterward, as age came on, he was well grounded in other Learning, and was sent to Cambridge, where he became Fellow of Christs Colledge, as one that should do the Lord Christ abundance of good service. He was there most painfull and unwea-riable in the study of Tongues, Arts, Sciences, all sorts of Exercises about them; and especially for Divinity, which was his Profession. One while he was Hebrew Reader to the Colledge. Being soon ripe, he entred into the Ministry at the age of one and twenty years.

In Queen Elizabeths time, he was called to preach at Pauls Crosse, and preached the Sermon in King James his time.

His painful-
ness in the Ministry.

In the course and work of his Ministry, he spent thirty five years, with all diligence and painfulness, even to the very end, when by right he might have spared himself; living in all sincerity and godly pureness, with entire love of souls, with all watchfulness, with meekness, wonderfully quickened with zeal. He was an utter enemy of Papery, Arminianisme, Antinomianisme, and other sects which crept up in those times, as appeareth partly by his writings. Amidst all his pithy Discourses, he was also an excellent and nimble Orator; and wound up his matter with a good farewell, even when at times it was but ordinary. And from this course he would scarce suffer himself to be withdrawn at any time, to refresh his spirits by a little freedom. Yea, sometimes when he was drawn forth into the Countrey for recreation, by the solicitation of Gods people, he escaped not without his usuall burden: Or, he spent his Vacant time in preparing Books for the Presse, which were both many and very usefull, and will be to posterity; who have cause to bless God, who giveth gifts to men, and publique mindes, that they may profit farre and near, both hearers and strangers, all debtors to him. And men of understanding observed a great Seal put to his Ministry, in several places whereto he was called: Some converted, others confirmed, others comforted in the way of God: And in these times of division wherein many Professors have turned into by-waies, those that were his constant Hearers, continue in that way stedfast, and unshaken in faith and love, which is in Christ Jesus. Yea at Redding there was a Generation of young Preachers, who under his Ministry grew up in Knowledge and Holiness, and some eminency of gifts, profiting by him and his pains there; and some professe it at this day: Perhaps also in the great City of London, and at Cantbridge.

The success
of his Ministry.

His piety
in private.

Neither was he altogether for the publick, but pious in private; and not only in the course of his Family, but in keeping Fasts among the godly of the place, which in those daies was something a dangerous exercise. And, to make them solid Professors indeed, he put them upon a weekly way of handling Catechetick points of Divinity; that is, every week to conferre of one of the heads of Religion, according to the Catechisme subjoynd to Master Dods Treatise on the Commandments, still proving the Doctrines by Testimonies of Scripture. For other personall qualifications, he was a man full of love, alms-deeds, and mercifull consideration of the needy, though not with a Trumpet. And he was a man blest of God with all the blessings of wisdom, Prov. 3. 16. Length of daies, Riches and Honour. He had every where both godly and great Friends, and is likely still to have, among those that shall converse in his worthy works.

His sickness

His prudence therein.

In that his holy and blessed course, he drew on toward his end. It was his Charmetrical year of 56. Having over-laboured himself with preaching in the City, he betook himself to his Countrey house at Isleworth, to be a little refreshed. But having inflamed and corrupted his blood by preaching, he soon fell into his mortall disease, a Plurisie; for curing whereof, though no meanes were wanting, yet the desired effect (through the Counsel of God) followed not. In the beginning of his sickness he set his house in order most holily, and as became so worthy a Father; and then bade farewell to all, as one throughly prepared for his departure; full of Faith and Patience, and joy in the Holy Ghost; a great help in that acute disease: Carefull of the well-fare of the Church at home, then in danger to be corrupted; grieved for the evils he knew in some mens dealings: Rejoycing greatly (in the midst of the apprehension of death) for the happy proceedings of the heroick King of Sweden, then Victorious in Bavaria. And once when he was told, he must a little help himself by cheerfulness, he fell into a most contentfull discourse, of those Noble Deliverances and Victories, and more would have spoken, if weakness had permitted. But especially his joy in God

God, and in the Conquest of Christ, Oh (said he) we serve a good Lord, who covers all imperfections, and gives great Wages for little work, and in mercy he hath provided for me some of the greatest. With other Holy Speeches, full of faith and joy, which his infirmity would not suffer him to utter perfectly. In which manner he languished by degrees; and at last on the Lords day, being the usual day of his principal Labours, he was dismissed of all, and went to keep a perpetual Sabbath in Heaven; where now he Resteth from his Labours, and his Works follow him, even a full Reward in endless Glory, Which Eye hath not seen, nor Ear heard, neither can enter into the Heart of Man to conceive, what things those are which God hath prepared for them that love him.

His Death.

The Life of Master Hugh Clark, who dyed
Anno Christi 1634.

Hugh Clark was born at Burton upon Trent, in the County of Stafford, August 15. 1563. of honest Parents, who were very carefull of his education, both in Religion and Learning, and when he was fitted for the University, they sent him to Cambridge, where he was admitted into Felus Colledge under the tuition of Master Dupont, (afterwards Doctor Dupont, and Master of that Colledge) in that place he followed his study very hard, and his Proficiency was very exemplary; But after two years and an half, the Air not well agreeing with his constitution, he removed to Oxford, and continued there till he was Master of Arts. He was a good Logician, and a very acute Disputant. The first place that he was called to exercise his Ministry in, was about Oundle in Northampton-shire, where he met with a people, that for the generality of them, were very ignorant and ungodly, and much addicted to the Prophanation of the Lords day, by Whitsun-ales, Morris-dancing, &c. which finnes Master Clark in his Ministry much set himself against, endeavouring from Gods Word to convince them of the evil, and denouncing Gods judgments in case of their obstinate perseverance in such provoking courses; but they, having been alwaies trained up in such practices, and having their hearts hardened against Admonition, still persevered in their former courses; and that the rather, because they were opposed by the Word of God therein, but the judgment of God found them out for this their wickednesse. For shortly after, on a Lords day, the Leader of the Dance, being a lusty young man, in the midst of their prophane pastimes suddainly fell down and died. Yet these obdurate persons (though a little affected for the present) soon shook off their fears, and returned to their vomit again.

Gods judgments on Sabbath-breakers.

Master Clark the Sabbath following, took occasion from this sad dispensation of God, to shew them the greatnesse of their finnes, and how highly God used used to be displeased with those which took liberty to prophane his holy day, withall quoting, Ier. 17. 27. If thou wilt not hearken unto me to hallow the Sabbath-day, &c. Then will I kindle a fire in the gates thereof, and it shall devour the Pallaces of Jerusalem, and it shall not be quenched; opening, urging, and pressing it home upon their consciences: yet still they kicked against these warnings, and the evening following, returned to their sports again. Amongst these there was a Smith that was a chief Ring-leader; But it pleased God the very next day, that two Husbandmen coming to his Shop to sharpen their plough-shares, a spark from the red-hot iron as he beat it on the anvil, flew into the thatch, which both the Smith and his neighbours saw, and stood gazing upon it, and might at first with one of their fingers have pulled it down, the thatch being low, but God took away their power of moving towards it, so that they saw it at first burn like a candle, then like a torch, and presently the whole shop was on a fire, and the men running out, both Shop, House, and all the Smiths goods were consumed in the fire, and yet a Neighbours House that stood very near it escaped.

This second remarkable judgment was again by Master Clark pressed upon their consciences, yet nothing would prevail, but as if they had made a Covenant with death, and were at an agreement with hell, they still persisted in their ungodly practises, and God who threatens to walk contrary to them that walk contrary to him, pursued them with one judgment after another; and amongst others, this was very remarkable: That upon the Sabbath day, which they had highly prophaned, by drinking, dancing, &c. in the night, when they were retired to their several homes, there was heard a great noise, and rattling of chains up and down the town, which was accompanied with such a smell and stink of fire and brimstone, that many of their guilty consciences suggested unto them, that the devil was come to fetch them away quick to hell. This so terrified and wrought upon them, that they began to give better heed to the Ministry of Gods Word; and to break off their prophane courses for the greatest part, so that there was an eminent reformation wrought amongst them; at least sixteen of those poor souls being effectually wrought upon and brought home to Christ; and some others that relapsed to their former waies, God pursued them with his judgments till he had brought them to beggary.

During Master Clarks abode in this place, he had experience of Gods gracious protecting him from the rage of some desperately wicked men, and amongst others, this is very remarkable: Master Clark, having on a day pressed Gods judgments against some sins, that he saw some of the people much addicted to, there came the next morning a lusty young man [a serving man] to enquire for him, as desirous to speak with him. Master Clark being made acquainted with it, sent for him up into his chamber, and knowing his vitious life, took occasion sharply to reprove him, and to tell him of the danger that he was in by reason of the same, in case he persevered in his lewd courses. This round and faithfull dealing, through Gods mercy, wrought so effectually upon him, that falling upon his knees, he intreated him to forgive him: Master Clark answered, that he should beg pardon at the hands of God, against whom he had sinned, for he knew not for his own part, wherein he had offended him; yea, said the other, I have not only offended God by sinning thus and thus against him, but you also; for I came hither with a full resolution to stab you with this dagger here at my back, but God hath so over-awed my spirit, that I have not had Power to move an Hand, to accomplish such a VVickedness; and this Resolution of mine, proceeded from the Sermon which you preached yesterday, which so terrified my conscience, that my whole body fell into such a trembling, that I was not able to sit, whereupon I rose up, and set my back to a Pillar to stay me, yet neither would that prevail to stay my trembling, &c. But now if you please to forgive me, I shall, by Gods grace, never entertain any such desperatt thoughts again. Master Clark freely forgave him, and after some wholesome and seasonable admonitions, dismissed him.

About this time, the schism and errors of the Brownists began to spread in Northampton-shire, and Master Clark had many bickerings and disputations with some of the chief of them, whom he mightily confuted, and through Gods grace, reclaimed some of them.

Anno 1590. He was sent for by Roger Wigstone, Esquire, who lived at Woolstone in the County of Warwick, by whom he was chosen to succeed Master Lord, an able and eminent Divine in the pastoral charge in that place, and having preached sometimes amongst them, he was freely chosen by the People also. Then having his presentation from Master Wigstone (who was a Gentleman of eminent Piety in those daies, and a great friend to godly Ministers.) He went to Doctor Overton, Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry for his institution; But the Bishop having designed the living for one of his Chaplains, he endeavoured to perswade Master Clark to desert his title to it, promising that he would remember him when some other preferment should fall. Master Clark considering his fair and direct call to the place, and therefore hoping that God had a work for him to do there, he absolutely refused to gratifie the Bishop in his request, telling him, that he could not with a good conscience do it, and therefore importuned him for his institution. Then did the Bishop set his acutest Chaplains upon him, to examine and dispute with him, hoping thereby to get some ground of exception against him; but when that prevailed not, he framed other excuses to defer the instituting of him, one while alledging that his Register was not with him, and then that he had so many daies allowed by the Law to make enquiry after him. And hereby he made Master Clark to ride three or four journeys without attaining his desire, and this the Bishop did, that the Living might fall into the Lapse. Master Clark perceiving his drift, told him, that if he refused any longer to grant him institution, he would bring his Quare impedit against him, which occasioned the Bishop at last to grant it him; but withall, he sent at several times, sometimes an Apparitor, sometimes one of his Chaplains, and other subtrill persons to attend his Prayers and Sermons, to see if they could catch any advantage against him, and upon trivial occasions cited him oft to his Court, and thereby much molested him. At last the Bishop himself being at Coventry upon a Sabbath day, he, with some of his Servants came in the morning to Woolstone, being but four miles off, and coming into the Church, he set him down in a seat just before Master Clark, none else of the Congregation knowing him. Master Clark seeing the Bishop, abated nothing of his zeal and fervency in preaching and applying of the Word; inso-much as the Bishop being much nettled by the Sermon, shifted and shuffled up and down, as if he had sate upon thornes, an honest man by, observing it, fetched him a Cushion, first to sit on, and then another to lean on; but yet the Bishop seemed very restless.

His remove to Woolstone

He is opposed by the Bishop.

His Courage.

The Sermon and Prayer being ended, the Bishop said openly, This is an hot fellow indeed, but I will coole him. Master Clark hearing it, replied; My Lord, if I have not faithfully delivered the truth of God, I beseech you declare what I have said amisse, that I may make my defence here before my people. The Bishop answered as before, You are an hot fellow indeed, but I will coole you; and so departed. Master Clark replying, It's good to be zealous in the work of the Lord.

After this the Bishop picked a quarrel against him, and suspended him from preaching; whereupon Master Clark used to expound the Word; then did the Bishop suspend him from expounding; whereupon he catechized with exposition and application; then was he suspended from catechizing also. Whereupon at the usuall times, in the Church, he caused an honest man, that was his neighbour, to read a Chapter, and at the end of every verfe, to ask him the meaning of it, and what instructions, and uſes might be gathered out of it. This ſo angered the Biſhop, that he proceeded to Excommunicate him. Whereupon Maſter Clark repaired to Doctor Whitgiſt Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and from him procured his Abſolution; and as he returned homewards, about Dunſtable he met Biſhop Overton going towards London, to whom he ſhewed his Abſolution, and ſo went on in his Miniſtry as before. This ſo irritated the Biſhop, that he ſtill ſuborned ſome to watch him in all his publike Prayers and Sermons; about which time the perſecution growing hot againſt the Non-conformiſts, Maſter Clark in his Prayer, requested of God to forgive the Queen her ſins, though in modeſt expreſſions. This the Biſhop being informed of, and ſuppoſing that he had now gotten that advantage, which he had long waited for, he charged Mr. Clark with treaſon, and cauſed him to be committed to the common Jayle in Warwick, where he lay (bail being refuſed) till the Aſſiſes, and then the Biſhop cauſed him to be arraigned at the Bar, and had ſo exaſperated the Judge againſt him, that he would have had the Jury to find the Bill. But it pleaſed God to ſtir up the heart of a Noble Gentleman, a Juſtice upon the Bench, from that good report which he had heard of Maſter Clark, to ſtand up, and publiquely to tell the Judge, that before Maſter Clark ſhould have any wrong, he would kneel before the Queen for him. This ſo prevailed with the Jury, that he was acquitted.

Upon his releaſe, Maſter Clark repaired again to Arch-biſhop Whitgiſt, complaining to him of all this wrong which he had received from the Biſhop; The Arch-biſhop (very worthily) ſent for the Biſhop, and upon a fair and equal hearing of the buſineſſe betwixt them, he enjoyed the Biſhop to go down, and in Maſter Clarks Church, upon a Sabbath day, before the Congregation, to acknowledge the wrong which he had done him, which the Biſhop accordingly did perform, and ever after upon all occaſions was Maſter Clarks great Friend ſo long as he lived.

Not long after, the Devill ſtirred up new adverſaries againſt him in his own Pariſh, his Miniſtry being very quick, powerfull and ſearching, ſo that ſome wicked perſons that found themſelves to be gaulled by it, railed upon him, threatening to kill him; ſo that Maſter Clark, being a ſtrong luſty man, for a time walked not abroad without his Rapier in his hand, for his own defence. At laſt, one of theſe wicked men, whole conſcience the Miniſtry had gaulled, vowed his Death; and as Maſter Clark was coming from Coventry, he way-layed him in a Wood. Maſter Clark in the evening came alone homewards, with nothing but a wand in his hand; whereupon this man roſe up to him, and falling into diſcourſe with him, Maſter Clark took the opportunity to reprove him for his diſordered life, and ſo laid open Gods judgments due to him for the ſame, that he fell into a great trembling, confeſſed his intention to have killed him, and begged pardon. Yet ſtill he perſiſted in his wicked waies, and Gods judgments found him out at laſt; for though he had a very good Living, yet he fell into miſery and want, and died in Warwick Jayle for debt.

Maſter Clark had in his Pariſh a Chappel of Eaſe, which had two townſhips belonging to it, one of them two miles from the Pariſh Church, the Chappel it ſelf near two miles from it, and the profits of both (the tythes being impropriated) ſcarce amounting to a competent maintenance for one man. Maſter Clark was fain to ſupply them both himſelf. And indeed God had extraordinarily fitted him for it, having given him a very ſtrong, able, and healthfull body, so that for the greatest part of his life there, which was about forty four years; he read four times a day in winter and summer between the two Churches, read the Word, and preached four times a day, administered the Sacraments, and performed all other Ministerial duties in them both. He preached upon several Texts in each of the Churches, so that divers godly persons, old and young, went betwixt the two Churches, hearing several Sermons to their great profit and comfort. Besides this, every Holy-day he supplied both the Churches, sometimes preached, but constantly expounded in each of them, and for the most part twice a day also; and God so blessed his labours, that he begat many Sons and Daughters unto God.

The success
of his Ministry.

He was very carefull in the Education of his children, first to train them up in the knowledge and fear of God; for which end he would take all opportunities to whet the Word of God upon them, when he lay down, and when he rose up, and as he walked by the way, &c. and God so blest his labours, that he lived to see, to his great comfort, the work of grace wrought in the hearts of all his seven children. And next to this, his care was to train up his children in Learning, and to honest callings, often saying, that if he could leave them no other portion, yet he would give them that education; that they should be able to get their own livings, in any part of the world, where God should cast their lot.

His care in the Education of his Children.

Towards the latter-end of his life, came forth the Book for Recreations on the Sabbath-day, and some young persons in the Town where he lived, being encouraged thereby, and by a Pepish Land-Lord which they had, would needs have a Whirion-Ale, and Morris-Dance, an heathenish sport, long before, through Gods goodnesse, banished out of that town. Master Clark laboured by his Ministry, to bear down the first rising of this motion; but these persons were so backed and encouraged by some that set them on, that they would needs prosecute their design, notwithstanding all the warnings given them by their faithfull Pastor. But God that hath said, He that despiseth you, despiseth me, &c. made their sin quickly to find them out in a terrible judgment that suddenly ensued; for in that very Barn, standing near a Smiths Shop, where their Revels were most kept, there was a violent fire kindled, which notwithstanding all help, quickly burnt it down, and in a strange manner flying against the wind, it went from house, to house, burning down all the houses of the chief of those which had an hand in these prophane sports.

Gods judgements on Sabbath-
breakers.

Master Clark was a man (like Apollon) mighty in the Scriptures, and so studied in the Body of Divinity, that upon short warning, he could preach very pertinently and profitably. He had an excellent pair of lungs, and was exceeding powerfull in his Ministry, striking shame and terror into the hearts of the wicked, to whom he was a Banerger, and yet withall, he was a Barnabas to humbled, broken, bleeding souls.

His Birth

His power-
of preaching

His old age was accompanied with a Lingring and painfull disease, which yet he bore with great patience, and as he came nearer to Heaven, so his next motion thitherward was more quick and lively. Many godly persons came to visit him in his disease, and none of them went away without some spiritual, and comfortable instructions from him. At last, having long Glorified God on earth, and finished his work, he went to receive his Wages, quietly resigning up his spirit unto God, November 6. 1634. having lived seventy one years, two moneths, and Nineteen dayes, and having been Pastor of Woolston forty four years.

MR. JOHN CARTER.

*The Life and death of Master John Carter, who dyed.
Anno Christi 1634.*

His Birth.

After John Carter was born at Wickham in Kent, near Canterbury, about the year of our Lord, 1554. He was descended but of mean Parents, yet were they Religious, and of good Report, who not being able to maintain him at the University, wholly upon their own charge; there was one Master Rose, a rich man in Canterbury, who taking notice of his Piety in those his tender years, of his ingenuity, studiousness, and proficiency in all School-Learning, even beyond the pitch of a Grammar-Scholar; and finding him hopefull, and likely to prove a precious instrument in the Church of Christ, he took him into his care, sent him to Cambridge, and contributed such sums of money to him from time to time as were needfull. He was admitted into Clare Hall, and was Pupil to Doctor Bing, a famous Cervilian, and Master of that House.

His Education.

He goes to Cambridge.

His Proficiency.

His Industry.

Presently after his first admission into that House, he was taken notice of as one of singular Learning, and ripeness for his years. Amongst the rest that were of his year he had a Theam given him to make upon this Subject, Frugalitas virtutum maxima: and when the young Students brought in their Theams, the Lecturer took, and read them, and when he came to Carters Theam he stood, and paused a while, and at last, said before them all: Here is is the best Theam that ever I read; and gave him some money for his encouragement, and highly commended his Industry; and always after cast a favourable eye upon him, and sought opportunities to do him good.

When Master Carter had taken his degrees of Bachelor, and Master of Arts, his Tutor, Doctor Bing (one of his singular love to him for his Piety and Learning) gave him a Chamber in his own Lodgings, where he continued a year, or two, which conduced much to the compleating of him for the work of the Ministry; and all the while that he continued a Gremial in the lap, and bosom of his Mother, the University, he held constant Meetings with divers of his famous Contemporaries, and that every week, as with Doctor Chaderton, Doctor Andrews (afterwards Bishop of Ely) Master Colverwell, Master Kewstubs, and divers others, whom God raised up and fitted to send forth into his Harvest, to gather his Corn, then ripe for the Sickle, into his Barn. At their meetings they had constant Exercises; first, they began with prayer, and then applied themselves to the Study of the Scriptures; one was for the Original Languages; anothers task was for the Grammatical Interpretation; anothers for the Logical Analysis; anothers for the true sense, and meaning of the Text; another gathered the Doctrines, and thus they carried on their several imployments, till at last they went out, like Apollos, Eloquent men, and mighty in the Scriptures: and the Lord was with them; so that they brought in a very great Harvest into Gods Barn.

Gods providence.

Notes.

Master Carter would not run before he was sent, though he was so excellently qualified for the work; he durst not venture upon the exercise of the holy work of the Ministry, till he had, not only an inward, but an outward call also, viz. an Affignation, approbation, and solemn adimission by the laying on of the hands of the Presbytery. When he was ordained, the Bishop (who in those days was Primus Presbyter, or Praefes) seeking to oppose him, asked him this Question, Have you read the Bible through? Yes (said he) I have read the Old Testament twice through in the Hebrew, and the New Testament often through in the Greek; and if you please to examine me in any particular place, I shall endeavour to give you an account of it. Nay (said the Bishop) if it be so, I shall need to say no more to you; only some words of Commendation and encouragement he gave him, and so with other assistants, he Ordained him.

His Ordination.

Anno Christi, 1583. the Vicaridge of Bramford in Suffolke, near Ipswich, fell void, and Master Rose of Canterbury, before mentioned, procured the Presentation thereof, for Master Carter, of the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury, in whose Gift it was. The Salary at first was only twenty Marks per annum, but afterwards the Church raised it to twenty pound per annum, and that was the most that ever he had there, yet he accepted of it, and being settled in it, he set himself to do the work of Christ faithfully with all his might, as a workman that needed not to be ashamed.

He fixes at Bramford.

Every Lords day he preached twice very powerfully, and Chatechised the younger sort. He also preached a Lecture every Thursday, to which multitudes from Ipswich, and other adjacent places, did resort: And God gave such success to his Ministry, that by his labours many sons and daughters were from time to time begotten unto God. Many precious Christians that remain unto this day, acknowledge that their Conversion was by Master Carters Ministry.

His great Pains.

His Success.

Before his Sermons he made but a short Prayer, and that always in the same words: After Sermon he used to be large, and full, and expressed himself with great variety of phrases, and with much fervency, and always he concluded with the Lords Prayer.

His Prayers.

He was very diligent in visiting the sick, especially the poorer sort, and he never went to the house of any poor creature, but he left a Purse-Alms, as well

His Charity.

well

well as a Spiritual-Alms of good, and heavenly advice, and prayer. No poor body ever came to his door that went away empty; his wife also looking to that as carefully as himself.

Every Saturday throughout the whole year he gave the Milk of his Cows to the poor of the Town; and indeed he gave more to the Poor every year, then the Revenue of his slender Vicaridge came to in the whole: yet God so blessed him, that whilst he was in Bramford, he quickly paid Master Rose of Canterbury all the money that he had disbursed toward his Education in the University; and before he left Bramford he purchased about twenty pound per annum; Gods blessing only makes rich.

His children He had but two sons, and he brought them both up in Learning, and maintained them in the University in good fashion.

He was sound, and Orthodox in his judgement: An able, and Resolute Champion against all manner of *Poper*y and Arminianism; as also against Anabaptism, and Brownism, which did then begin to peep up, and infest the Church, to tear and rent the seamless Coat of Christ.

His zeal. He was always a Non-conformist, one of the good old Puritans of England. He never swallowed any of the Ceremonies against his Conscience: So that he was often troubled by the Bishops, but God raised him up friends that always brought him off, and maintained his Liberty. He was prudent, and of a peaceable spirit, and never Censured any that could, and did conform, if he judged them consciencious, and saw any thing of God in them.

His non-conformity. At his first coming to Bramford, he saw of the travel of his soul. He had a plentiful harvest, many souls being daily added to the Church, by his powerful Ministry, and holy life. But after he had abode many years amongst them, the people began to be glutted with heavenly Manna, and loathed it, so that there grew a great decay in their first love: and about the year 1615. or something before, there arose up a generation of malignant spirits, who were haters of a plain, powerful, and seatching Ministry, and of the life and power of Godliness: These were the Gentry, and chief of the Parish. These rose up against Master Carter, pressed him to Conformity, complained of him to the Bishop, and threatned that they would either bring him to conformity or eject him.

His enemies At this very juncture of time, through Gods gracious Providence, the Rectory of little Belfed fell to be void. A very small Village, some three miles from Ipswich, and a solitary place; the means indeed was better than Bramford, yet short of a competency, and of the deserts of so eminent a Pillar in the Church of Christ: it being but about fifty pound, and at the most not worth above sixty pound per annum.

Gods providence. The Patron (Master Bloss) became a Suitor to Master Carter to accept of it; which he refused again, and again, being resolved rather to endure persecution at Bramford, to grapple with all difficulties, and to die there, rather than to remove. But Gods providence over-ruled him. At Bramford he saw that he must be outed, and Master Bloss would take no denial: yea, and he found favour in the Eyes of the Bishop; so that he was instituted without subscription, or submitting to the Ceremonies: and then at last, God (as it were) taking him by the hand, and pulling him whether he would or no, he removed from Bramford, after he had done faithful Service in the work of the Ministry for about thirty four years in that place, and was settled at Belfed Parsonage, where he continued eighteen years before God caused him to rest from his Labors: and in all that time he discharged his holy Function just as he had done in Bramford in his younger years; though his Congregation here was but small: yet it pleased God that many Fish came within the compass of his Net from Ipswich, and other neighbouring Towns, where they were destitute of faithful Shepherds, so that his later Crop in Gods Harvest-field, was very considerable.

His remove to Belfed.

Little Belsted was a Tusculanum to him, where in his old age he had much Secret and sweet communion with God in the house, and, as an Isaac, with him in the Fields, which was a beginning of that glorious Communion which he now enjoyes with God in the mountaines of Spices. He being dead, yet speaks; and his works praise him in the Gates. For from the Press we have his Learned, and pithy Commentary on the Sermon of Christ in the Mount: and two short, but substantial, solid, and profitable Catechisms: one, Milk for children: the other, Winter Evenings Communication.

His Communion with God.

His Works.

His pains in the study of the Revelations were indefatigable. He wrote much in a little Room; but these Labours of his yet never saw the light. Many Ministers that privately did converse with him, lighted their candles at his.

For his carriage and deportment in his Family, it was sober, Grave, and very Religious. He there offered up the Morning and Evening Sacrifice of Prayer, and praise continually: so that his House was a little Church. Thrice a day he had the Scriptures read, and after that the Psalm, or Chapter, were ended, he used to ask all his children and servants what they remembered, and whatsoever Sentences they Rehearsed, he would speak something out of them that might tend to their edification. For his own, and his Wives habit, it was very plain, and homely, of the old Fashion, yet very cleanly and decent; insomuch, that all that came to his house would say, they had seen Adam and Eve, or some of the old Patriarchs.

His Family Duties.

His Humility.

In all his house also, there was nothing but honest plainness. He was such an one as Jacob, a plain, sincere, I had almost said a perfect man; I am sure a true Nathanael, in whom was no guile.

He never used any Plate in his House, but Vessels of Wood and Earth; Pewter, and Brass were the highest Mettals for his Utenfils. All the time of his house-keeping he used constantly at his Table a little wooden Salt, which with age was grown to be of a dusky black, which was much taken notice of by all Comers.

He never made Feasts, yet always had wholesome, full, and liberal Diet in his house, and all fared alike: He, and his wife, did never think that his children, and servants, and poor folk did eat enough.

His hospitality.

The righteous man (saith Solomon) is mercifull to his Beast: So he was carefull even for the brut Creatures, that they should be fed to the full. All his cattel were like to the first Kine that Pharaoh saw feeding in the Meddow, they were fat-fleshed, and well favoured; insomuch, as some godly people used to say merrily: If they would be a Cow, or a Horse, or a Hog, or a Dog; they would choose Master Carter for their Master.

He had a sharp wit, and was sweet, milde, affable, and pleasant in his conversation; yet were there nor any of his most facetious passages, that did not favour of holiness. His Communication and discourse was always heavenly, and his eyes were frequently lifted up towards heaven: He did not eat, or drink without praising God with his mouth, and eyes. His whole Conversation was in Heaven.

His conversation.

His secret Duties.

Besides his Family Duties, and Prayers, he prayed constantly in his Closet at his first going to his study, and before he came forth to Dinner and Supper: He prayed very loud; and mostly very long: for the extension of his voice he had a double reason; one, that by his earnest speech he might quicken, and raise up his own heart, and devotion: the other, that he might give a good example for secret prayer to his children, and servants; and he never closed any Prayer, without adding the Lords Prayer; and his ground for that practise was this; He judged his own best Prayers imperfect, and that of Christ most perfect and comprehensive of all our necessities.

His Prayers.

That you may be the better satisfied concerning his sense, and judgement in this matter, take this transcript out of his Printed Commentary upon Mat.

Of the Lords Prayer.

Matt. 6. 9. Where after he hath set forth the excellency, and perfection of Christs Prayer, he addeth, "Christ now directs us to the right performance of the Duty of Prayer. After this manner pray ye: Or, as Saint Luke sets it down, When you pray, say. Not binding us strictly to use these words always, and none other, but to use the matter, manner, and like affections: "But as for them who cannot so well enlarge their suits in other words, "or for those also who can, and do it, and yet remain still unsatisfied, as not "having done it sufficiently (and who can do it sufficiently?) the Lord Christ "hath left this most excellent help to use the very words of this Divine Prayer, as the most worthy servants of God have ever used to do: And learn "we here by the way, that an absolute necessity lyeth upon us (which ought "to be our greatest glory and comfort) to pray in these words, or in this "manner. For it is the undispensible Commandment of our Lord Christ: After this manner pray.

His skill in comforting afflicted
Consciences

He had a special dexterity in comforting afflicted Consciences; resolving doubts, and answering questions; when some came to him (not long before he changed this earthly for an heavenly Mansion) and told him of the rigour of the Prelates, how it grew higher every day, how they persecuted conscientious Ministers, and Christians: Of their Innovations, and of the Book for Liberty of Sports on the Sabbath-days, tending to the fearfull profanation thereof: He used these expressions: I have had a longing desire to see, or hear of the fall of Antichrist: But I check my self, I shall go to Heaven, and there news of it will come thick, thick, thick.

A Prediction.

When others came to him, and pressed him with importunity to tell them his Judgement concerning the future state of the Church, saying to him, that he had travelled much in the study of the Revelations, and they were perswaded that God had revealed something more than ordinary to him. What do you think (said they) shall we have Popery once again, or no? He answered, You shall not need to fear fire, and faggot any more: but such dreadfull divisions will be amongst Gods people and Professors, as will equalize the greatest persecutions.

His Prayers
successfull.

A man meeting him near his house, called to him, saying, Oh Master Carter! What shall I do? My wife is entring into her Travel, and I think she will die with very fear: Master Carter answered, Make haste, run to your wife, and tell her, that I am going to my Closet as fast as I can to pray for her; therefore bid her not faint, but to be of good courage and comfort. The man accordingly ran to his wife, and told her what had passed between Master Carter, and him. Presently her fears vanished, God gave her strength, and she was delivered immediately, and safely: and strait after, her Husband went to Master Carter (even before he came out of his Closet) and told him what God had done for him.

His gracious
speeches.

Another time, a poor man met him by the way, and cryed to him piteously, saying, Master Carter! What shall become of me? I work hard, and fare hard, and yet I cannot thrive, I continue bare, and know not how in the world to live. He answered him: Yet still you want one thing, and I will tell you what you shall do, Work hard, and Fare hard, and Pray hard, and I will warrant you shall thrive.

There dwelled in that Parish a Tanner, that was a very godly man, and one that had much familiar society with Master Carter. This man as he was very busie in Tawing of a Hide with all his might, not so much as turning his head aside any way: Master Carter coming by accidentally, came softly behinde him, and merrily gave him a little clap on the back: the man started, and looking behinde him suddenly, blushed, and said, Sir, I am ashamed that you should find me thus: To whom Master Carter replied, Let Christ when he comes finde me so doing: What (said the man) doing thus? Yes (said Master Carter to him) faithfully performing the Duties of my Calling.

Being

Being at Dinner at Ipswich at one of the Magistrates Houses, divers other Ministers being at the Table also: One amongst the rest (who was old enough, and had learned enough to have taught him more humility) was very full of talk, bragged much of his parts, and skill, &c. and made a Challenge, saying, Here are many Learned men; if any of you will propound any question in Divinity, or Philosophy, I will dispute with him, resolve his doubt, and satisfie him fully. All at the Table (excepte himself) were silent for a while: then said Master Carter, (when he saw that none else would speak) to him, calling him by his name: I will go no further than my Trencher to puzzle you: Here is a Sole: Now tell me the reason why this Fish that hath lived always in the salt water, should come out fresh? To this, this forward Gentleman could say nothing, and so was laughed at, and shamed out of his vanity.

His acuteness.

At another time a certain man came to him, and made his moan, saying, I have lost the greatest Friend that I had in the world: I had (in a manner) all my livelyhood from him: To whom Master Carter answered: When the Fountain is dried up in one place, God will open it in another.

To one of his Sons he said, Son John, God hath always brought water for me out of the hard flinty rock. Those covetous hard hearted men, who have been enemies to my person and Ministry, have many times come in, and given me countenance and maintenance.

His eldest Son, whom he had bred up to the Ministry, and who proved a blessed Instrument in the Church of Christ, being dead, Master Carter took care of his eldest Son, sent him to Cambridge, and walking with him towards the Stable, took his last leave of him, in these words in Latine; Cave, mi fili, fastidium, ignaviam, Antichristum. My Son, beware of Pride, Sloth, and Antichrist.

His usual saying was, a Traveller must have a Swines belly, an Asses back, and a Merchants purse: Meaning that he must be content with any fare, bear all injuries, and provide for vast expences. We are Pilgrims and Travellers here; and we must prepare for wants, wrongs, and spoiling of our goods.

It might well be said of him, Semper erat ubi non erat: His heart was where his head was, and now his soul is, to wit, in Heaven.

His whole life was nothing else but a Communion day. Old Jacob seemed to live in him: and sure the Spirit of God breathed as much in him, in his words, and writings (holiness dropped from his Pen in every ordinary Letter that he wrote) in his actions; and Soliloquies, as in any mans in these latter times. He was always instilling precious precepts, exhortations, instructions, or consolations into those with whom he had occasion to converse.

His fruitfulness.

A godly woman told his Son, that she had been servant to a Religious Gentleman, to whose house Master Carter did often resort; and that she was won to Christ at first, by hearing the Heavenly speeches, and sweet principles that dropped from him as she was warming his Bed, and as she waited upon him in his Chamber.

He was always most just, and exact in his dealings. He put a Clause in his Will, for the faithfull and carefull payement of his Debts: yet when his Son John, and his Daughter Eunice, whom he made his Executors, enquired what his Debts were, he could finde nothing that he owed, excepte to the Smith for shoeing of an Horse or two.

His Justice.

His Son, when he came to look over his Library, found two or three Books (not one of them worth a Groat) upon which he had written, This Book was borrowed of such an one: Let it be restored: or if the owner cannot be found, allow something to the poor for it, and that liberally.

Once, being in a journey many miles from home, in changing a piece of Gold at a Shop, he took an half Crown piece instead of a shilling, neither he nor the Shop-keeper knowing it: but as soon as he came home, he found the mistake; whereupon he could not rest satisfied, but the next day took a long journey back again on purpose to that Town, to carry back the half Crown again.

He was of a sweet, mild, and gentle nature, and of a gracious spirit. A loving, and faithfull Husband to his wife, and a tender, and indulgent Father to his children; and if he failed in any thing, it was in his carriage to his Servants; for truly he carried not himself to them as a Master to his servants, but as a familiar Friend to his Friends. He would make them to sit down with him at his Table, and would drink to them at his meals.

He, and his Wife were married together almost threescore years, and in all that time there was never heard any distastefull word to pass betwixt them. Neither indeed could it be otherwise: For he lived, and walked with her as a man of knowledge: he was to her a Prudent, Faithfull, and tender guide; and she was humble, and meek, revered, and highly esteemed him. Every word he spake was an Oracle to her, and her will ever closed with his Judgement.

His Age. He lived to the age of fourscore: When his youngest Son John was born, who was the youngest of nine, he called him the Son of his Age, and yet he lived to see him forty years old before he died himself, being forty years old when he was born.

His Fastings. He was much, and frequent in secret Fastings, and when he kept such a day, he told none of his house of it, save his wife only, and she would not eat any thing that day on which he fasted, but oft-times she was with him in his retiring chamber to joyn with him in prayer; yet could it not be concealed from the rest of the Family, because at night he supped not, but only had a Toste, and a draught of ordinary Beer to sustain nature.

On the Sabbath Days, he never had any Rooste-meat at Dinner, because he would have none thereby kept from the Publick Ordinances; the Pot was hung on with a Piece of Beef, and a pudding in it, and that was their constant Lords-Days Dinner, for well nigh sixty years together.

His retirements. His Church at Belsted stood in a very solitary place, whereof he always kept a key, and would often resort thither all alone. A Gentleman once espying him as he went towards the Church on a private day, hid himself, till Master Carter was past, and gone into the Church, and then he came close up to the Church wall, desiring to peep in at some window to see what he did, and to listen if he said any thing; and this Gentleman afterwards told his Son John, that he first prayed, then read a Chapter, and after that prayed largely, and very heavenly, as if he had been in his Family, or in the publick Congregation.

His vigour. He vigorously held on the constant course of his Ministry to the last. It may be said of him, as of Caleb and Joshua; he was as fit for service in Gods Harvest-field at fourscore, as he was at forty.

Indeed some abatement of bodily strength there was, as old Age did steal upon him. After his afternoon Sermon on the Sabbath days he would be something faint, and commonly when he came home he would call for some comfortable draught, and when he had lifted up his eyes to heaven, and taken it, he would say to them about him, These are Crutches to shore up a ruinous house: but in his Intellectuals, and spiritual strength there was no decay.

Old Master Benton of Wramplingham in Norfolk, a holy man of God, being upon occasion in Suffolk in those parts, could not but give a visit to his old friend, Master Carter of Belsted; and being with him, he heard him discourse with such holy gravity, and a mixture of all kinde of Learning, solidity, and wit, that he stood amazed at it, and said, Master Carter I see you you are like unto the Palm and Cedar Tree, you bring forth more fruit in your Age. I thank you (said Master Carter) you tell me what I should be.

And now the time of his departure was at hand: Some fortnight, or three weeks before his Translation, there appeared some decays in his body, and memory, which now began to fail him. He would sometimes (but rarely) call to go to Sea, and to his better Countrey. Yet he sat up from morning till night, and commonly walked up and down the Room, and never failed to perform Prayer, and other Family exercises, so that none could discern any considerable defect either in his spiritual, or natural strength: Only in this, that when he had done, he would presently call to begin again, and say to his daughter Eunice, who was now the stay of his house, and the staff of his old age (God having taken away his dear wife about two years before) Daughter, shall we not go to prayer? and when she answered him, Sir you have been at Prayer already, and you are weary, he would reply, I fear we have not done what we should do.

It was one of his constant and ordinary Petitions in every Prayer, that God would vouchsafe him a mercifull, and easie passage out of this life, and the Lord did most graciously answer him therein.

February the 21. Anno Christi, 1634. being the day before the Sabbath, in the evening he called very earnestly for Paper, Ink, and two Pens: For (saith he) by Gods grace to morrow I will preach twice: But (God knows) he was not in a fit condition for study; yet with that resolution he went to Bed, and God gave him some rest that night. In the morning upon the Sabbath day he did rise from his Bed; as he used to do, and came out of his Bed-chamber into the Hall, and after Prayer, he called for his ordinary breakfast, which he used before he went to Church (for still he held his resolution for Preaching) which was an Egg; he took it into his hand, but alas! it would not down: Whereupon he said to his daughter.

Eunice, I am not able to go Church, yet I pray thee, lead me to my Bed, I will lie down a little and rest me. So he rose up out of his chair, and walked up and down, she supporting him, and when he came to the Parlour door, before he put his foot over the threshold: Oh Eunice! saith he, What shall I do? Put your trust (saith she) in that God of whom you have had so much experience, who never yet did leave you, nor forsake You. Yes (saith he) the Lord be thanked.

So he gathered up his strength, went to the Bedside, sat down upon it, and immediatly composed himself to lie down. He lifted up one of his Legs upon the Bed without any great difficulty, laid down his Body, and rested his Head upon the Pillow. His Daughter still stood by, expecting when she should lift his other leg upon the Bed, thinking that he had been fast asleep: and she was not mistaken, for so he was. It proved his last sleep, and before she could discern any change in him, his soul had taken its flight into heaven, even into the Arms, and embraces of his Blessed Saviour, whom he had faithfully served all his life long; being about fourscore years old.

He intended a Sabbath labour for Christ, and Christ gave him rest from his labour, even the rest of an eternal Sabbath. When his daughter began to speak to him, and to lift him, she found that his breath was departed, yet was there not any change in his countenance at all: his eyes and his mouth continuing in the same posture they used to be in his sweetest sleeps.

Thus the Lord gave unto his faithful Servant the desire of his soul, and a return of his Prayers, such an easie passage, as that his death could not be discerned from a sweet natural sleep.

Not many days before his death he called his daughter, and said to her, Daughter, Remember my love to my Son John: I shall see him no more in this life: and remember me to the rest of my children, and Family, and deliver this message to them all from me: Stand fast in the faith, and love one another. This was the last message that ever he sent to them.

He ended his life with a Doxology, breathing out his last, with these words, The Lord be thanked.

When he had thus yielded up his Spirit into the hands of his heavenly Father, his daughter Eunice dispatched away a Messenger to his Son John at Norwich: for so had her Father given order before he died, that his body should not be put into a Coffin till his Son John came: and God carried him through the journey in hard weather, so that through Gods good providence, he arrived at Belford early on the Tuesday, and going into the house of mourning, he found the Body of his deceased Father still lying upon the Bed: they uncovered his Face, and sweetly he lay, and with a smiling countenance, and no difference appearing to the eye between his countenance alive and dead, only that he was wont to rejoyce, and to bless his Son at their meeting, and now he was silent. His son fell upon his face and kissed him, and lift up his voice and wept, and so took his last leave of him till they should meet in a better world.

His Funeral.

February the 4th. in the afternoon, Anno Christi, 1634. was he Interred, at which time there was a great confluence of people from all the parts thereabout, Ministers, and others, all taking up the words of Joash King of Israel: Oh my Father! my Father! the chariots of Israel, and the Horsemen thereof!

Good Master Samuel Ward, that famous Divine, and the glory of Ipswich, came to the Funeral, brought with him a mourning Gown, and offered very respectfully to have preached his Funeral Sermon, now that such a Congregation was gathered together, and upon such an occasion.

But his Son, and daughter durst not give way unto it: for so their Father had often charged them in his life time, and that upon his blessing, that there should be no Sermon at his burial: For (said he) it may give occasion to speak some good of me that I deserve not, and so false things may be uttered in the Pulpit.

Master Ward rested satisfied with this, and accordingly did forbear: But the next Friday at Ipswich, he turned his whole Lecture into a Funeral Sermon for Master Carter, in which he honoured him, and lamented the Churches loss, to the great satisfaction of the whole Auditory. Gloria fugientes sequitur.

Glory is like your shadow! follow it, and it will flie away from you; but flie from it, and it will follow you.

His Humility.

And so it proved with Master Carter. He was most eminent for Humility: Humble he was in his habit, and humble in all his deportment: For though his Gifts called him before great men, yet his most ordinary converse was with those of an inferiour rank, in whom he saw most of the power of godliness. So that he might truly say with David, Psal. 119. 63. I am a companion of all them that fear thee, and of them that keep thy precepts.

His Works.

He wrote very much, but he left nothing behinde him save what is Printed, and his Exposition upon the Revelations; and a Petition to King James for the taking away burdensome Ceremonies out of the Church. Nothing else but a few broken Papers, which he regarded not. Probably he burnt the rest, when he saw his appointed time draw neer, meerly out of a Low opinion of himself, and his own gifts.

He avoided all things that might tend to outward Pomp, and ostentation: He would have no Funeral Sermon: He left order in his Will not to be buried in the Church, but in the Church-yard; where he, and his wife, that glorious pair, lie interred together without so much, or rather so little as a poor Grave-stone over them.

He

He had learned of Christ to be meek and lowly in heart: He was humble in his Life, and humble in his Death, and now the Lord hath highly exalted him.

He kept a constant Diary, or day book, in which every day he set down Gods extraordinary dispensations, his own actions, and whatsoever memorable things he heard, or read that day.

His Diary.

He cast up his Accounts with God every day: and his sins were blotted out before he came to his last reckoning; his day of refreshing came, and he rests from his labours.

Plus vivitur exemplis quam preceptis, saith Seneca; Examples of the dead, are Sermons for the living:

He was a true child of Abraham, and the blessing of Abraham fell upon him. I will blesse them (saith the Lord to him) that bless thee, and I will curse them that curse thee. Some years after his death, his Son John being at Bramford, there was an ancient Gentleman, that had lived there long, and was Master Carters old Friend, who spake thus unto him, Master Carter, I have now lived to see the downfall of all your Fathers opposites, and enemies; there is not one of them, but their Families are scattered, and come to ruine. Let all the enemies of Gods faithfull Messengers hear and fear, and do no more so wickedly.

Now.

It may be truly said of him, and his faithful Yoke-fellow, as it is written of Zacharias and Elizabeth, they were both righteous before God, walking in all the Commandments, and Ordinances of the Lord blameless; and truly the world will, and can testifie, that neither of them did ever do that thing that was evil, or unjust, or scandalous, or uncomely, even their enemies themselves being Judges, they were as to men, without blemish: their life was a sweet savour, and they went out of this life as a fragrant perfume.

This Life was drawn up by Master John Carter, Junior, now also with the Lord, one who degenerated not from the steps of his Learned, and holy Father, and by him was sent to me some years since, together with this ensuing Epistle: which I have the rather inserted to provoke, and stir up others, who can in this way, revive the memories of the Dead Saints, to do it, which will be a more lasting Monument to them, and far more beneficial, and advantageous to the Church of God, than any sumptuous, and costly Funerals, or Grave-stones whatsoever.

TO

To his Reverend Brother, and fellow-Labourer in the Lords Vineyard, Master Samuel Clark, Pastor of Bennet Fink, London.

Worthy Sir,

That which Naomi spake to Ruth concerning Boaz, He hath not left off his kindnesse to the living, and to the Dead, It is fully verified of your self: You cease not to shew kindnesse to the Living, and to the Dead. To the Living, by your Preaching, and Ministry, you make Saints daily.
To the Dead Saints you shew kindnesse, by perpetuating their Names, to their honours, and the good of many: And herein you are a greater gainer: you shine your self by making others shine. Amongst the rest of those that honour you I am one, though I never saw your face, otherwise then in the Frontispiece of your Learned Books.

In the first part of your Marrow of Ecclesiastical History, we had information, that you did resolve to add a second Part; and so put in the Lives of such godly Divines, and others, as were eminent in these latter times, if you were furnished with faithfull Informations. Hereupon, divers did set upon me with very great importunity, to write the Life of my dear Father, and to send it up to you.
Truly worthy Sir! I was desirous of the thing, but durst not undertake the work:
I was sensible of mine own weakness, and also that his Sayings and Doings had so far slipped the memories of this Generation, that I should have brought to light such an imperfect thing, as rather would have been a blemish to so eminent a Saint, then any Honour. Hereupon I laid aside all thoughts of meddling, or attempting such a thing. I know that he is glorious in heaven, and on earth too, so far as his name is spread.

Now, good Sir, let me be bold to give a short account of my self. Some few days since I went about to make a new Diary for my self, I was desirous in the first place, to set down some passages of my Father, for mine own satisfaction, and use. I began so, and before I was aware, it amounted to so much, as I thought better that that should be published, than nothing at all: and at last my Spirit grew restless, I could not satisfie myself, till I had digested it into some order, and made it publick. And now, Sir, here it is; I present it to your judicious view; accept it in good part from a meer stranger.

My humble request to you, Worthy Sir, is this, that, though I slipped the last opportunity, yet if you shall set forth any more Lives; or if you shall have a new Impression of any of the former, that you would extract so much of my precious Fathers Life, as you shall judge fit, and place it where you please in your Ecclesiastical History. Your Monuments will be lasting in after Ages, when my poor Pamphlet will be worn out with time. Pardon my boldness: The Lord lengthen out your days, for the good of his Church, and the honour of his Saints.

Your most observant friend and brother, that truly Honoureth you,

JOHN CARTER.

expected some rare and excellent Notion from him, as Doctor Gouge (his frequent Hearer) told me.

Master of Katherine
Hall.

About the year 1625. or 26. he was chosen Master of Katherine Hall in Cambridge, the Government whereof he continued till his dying day; and indeed like a faithfull Governour, he was alwaies very solicitous and carefull to procure and advance the good of that little House. For he procured good means and maintenance by his interest in many worthy Persons, for the enlargement of the Colledge, and was a means and Instrument, to establish learned and Religious Fellows there; insomuch as in his time, it proved a very famous Society for Piety and Learning, both in Fellows and Scholars.

Preacher at Graies-Inne.

But before this, viz. about the year 1618. he was chosen Preacher to Graies-Inne, one of the Learnedest Societies in England, where his Ministry found such generall approbation and acceptance, that besides the Learned Lawyers of the House, many Noble Personages, and many of the Gentry and Citizens resorted to hear him, and many till this day, blesse God for the Benefit which they received by him.

The success of his Ministry.

His prudence in his Ministry.

His Learning was mixed with much humility, whereby he alwaies esteemed lowly of himself, and was ready to undervalue his own labours, though others judged them to breath spirit and life, to be strong of Heaven, speaking with authority and power to mens Consciences. His care in the course of his Ministry was to lay a good foundation in the heads and hearts of his Hearers. And though he were a wise Master-builder, and that in one of the eminentest Auditories for Learning and Piety that was in the Land, as was said before; yet according to the grace which was given to him (which was indeed like that of Elisha, in regard of the other Prophets, 2 King. 1. 9. the elder Brothers priviledge, a double portion) he was still taking all occasions to preach of the Fundamentals to them, and amongst the rest, of the Incarnation of the Son of God, one of the chief Fundamentals of our Faith, one of the chief of those wonders in the Mercy-seat, which the Cherubims gaze at, which the Angels desire to pry into, 1 Pet. 1. 12. And preaching at several times, and by occasion, of so many several texts of Scripture concerning this Subject, there is scarce any one of those incomparable benefits which accrew to us thereby, nor any of those holy impressions, which the meditation hereof ought to work in our hearts, which was not by him sweetly unfolded, as may appear by those Sermons now in Print. And therefore (saith a Reverend Divine) the noted humility of the Author I lesse wonder at, finding how often his thoughts dwelt upon the humiliation of Christ.

Master
Dods testimony of his Sermon on
Cant 5.

As for his Sermons upon Cant. 5. Reverend and holy Master Dod upon the perusal of the Manuscript, was so taken with them, that he professed that he found them so full of heavenly Treasure, and containing such lively expressions of the unvaluable riches of the love of Christ towards all his poor servants that sue and seek unto him for it, that by his great importunity he prevailed with Doctor Sibbs, otherwise much undervaluing his own meditations, to commit the same to the Presse; to which Master Dod gave this attestation.

"I (saith he) judge it altogether unmeet, that such precious matter should be concealed from the publick use. I judge these Sermons a very profitable and excellent help, both to the understanding of that dark and most Divine Scripture, as also to kindle in the heart, all heavenly affections towards Jesus Christ; The whole frame whereof, is carried with such Wisdom, Gravity, Piety, Judgment and Experience, that it commends itself to all that are godly wise: and I doubt not but they shall find their temptations answered, their fainting spirits revived, their understandings enlightened, and their graces confirmed; so that they shall have cause to praise God, for the worthy Authors godly and painful labours.

Indeed

Indeed he was thoroughly studied in the holy Scriptures, which made him a man of God, perfect, thoroughly furnished unto every good work; and as became a faithfull Steward of the manifold graces of God, he endeavoured to reach to others the whole counsell of God, and to store them with the knowledge of Gods will, in all wisdom, and spiritual understanding.

He was a man that enjoyed much communion with God, walking in all the Laws of God blamelesse; and like John the Baptist, was a burning and shining light, waiting and spending himself to enlighten others. He was upon all occasions very charitable, drawing forth, not only his Purse in relieving, but his very bowels in commiserating the wants and necessities of the poor Members of Christ. He used sometimes in the summer-time, to go abroad to the houses of some worthy Personages, where he was an Instrument of much good, not only by his private labours, put by his prudent counsell and advice, that upon every occasion he was ready to Minister unto them. And thus having done his work on earth, he went to receive his wages in heaven, peaceably and comfortably resigning up his spirit unto God, Anno Christi 1631. and of his age 58.

His death.

The Life of Doctor Chaderton who dyed
Anno Christi 1640.

Aurence Chaderton, was born of an ancient Family at Chatterton in Lancashire, about the year 1546. and his Parents being both Papists, they trained him up in that Religion, yet bred him to Learning; and when he came to some maturity of years, his Father sent him to the Inns of Court: But he being not pleased with that kind of life, through the motion of Gods holy Spirit, who had a work for him to do in another

His Parents

Calling and place, left the Inns of Court, and went to Cambridge about the twentyeth year of his age, and the sixth year of Queen Elizabeth. And getting some acquaintance in Christs Colledge, it pleased God that the Master and Fellows took such a liking to him for his ingenuity and industry, that they admitted him into a poor Scholars place.

His removal to Cambridge.

Then did he write to his Father, to acquaint him with his present condition, and to request some means of maintenance from him: But his Father disliking his change of place and studies, but especially of Religion, sent him a Poke with a groat in it, to go a begging withall, further signifying to him, that he was resolved to disinherit him, which he also did: Yet did the Lord Lord support his spirit, to preferre an heavenly before an earthly.

His Father casts him off

earthly Inheritance; and seeing that he had nothing else to trust to, he fell close to his studies; and through Gods blessing upon the same, he so eminently profited in all sorts of Learning, that Anno Christi 1567. being but yet Batchelour of Arts, he was chosen Fellow of Christis Colledge. Anno Christi 1578. he commenced Batchelour of Divinity; and the same year, October the 26. he preached a Sermon at Pauls Crosse, which he also Printed.

He was chosen Lecturer at Saint Clements Church in Cambridge, which place he supplied about the space of sixteen years, and by his Holy, Learned, and judicious Sermons, did very much good, and was succeeded therein by Master Michael Bentley Fellow of Christis Colledge, a godly, plain, and profitable Preacher.

Chosen the first Master of Emanuel.

He was a man famous for Gravity, Learning, and Religion; so that when Sir Walter Mildmay (Counsellor of State to Queen Elizabeth, Chancellor, and under-Treasurer of the Exchequer) Founded Emanuel Colledge, Anno Christi 1584. he made choice of this man for the first Master: and when Master Chaderton shewed himself not willing to undertake that great charge, Sir Walter replied, saying, If you will not be the Master, I will not be the Founder of it.

In the beginning of King James his Reign, he was one of the four Divines for the Conference at Hampton-Court, chosen by the Ministers that desired a Reformation in the Church-Government; and for his Learning and sufficiency, was the same year chosen to be one of the Translators of the Bible.

He commenced Doctor.

Anno Christi 1612. when the Prince Elector Palatine came to visit Cambridge, he would needs have Master Chaderton commence Doctor of Divinity, which accordingly he did.

His care for the Colledge.

He deserved very well of Emanuel Colledge, for whereas the Founder gave allowance, for the maintenance of three Fellows only, together with the Advowson of Stranground Rectory in Huntingtonshire, near Peterborough, Doctor Chaderton procured by his Friends and acquaintance, allowance for twelve Fellows, and above forty Scholars of the House, besides the Advowsons of Auler and Northend-berry Rectories; as also of the Vicaridge of Dulverton in Somersetshire, Piddle Hinton in Dorsetshire, and Loughborough in Leicestershire, of the Noble Henry Hastings Earl of Huntington, which Noble man was a great friend to godly Ministers.

His care of young students.

After he was Master of Emanuel, his manner was, not to suffer any young Scholars to go into the Countrey to Preach, till he had heard them first in the Colledge-Chappel. All his younger days he used to expound a portion of Scripture twice a week in his Family.

His care of Servants.

He was married fifty three years, and yet in all that time he never kept any of his Servants from Church to dresse his meat, saying, that he desired as much to have his servants know God as himself. If at any time he had a Servant upon triall, though they could do as much work as three others, yet if they were given to lying, or any other vice, he would by no means suffer them to dwell in his house.

He resigned his place.

Towards his latter end Arminianisme began to sprout up apace in the University, and he being fearfull that an Arminian might come to succeed him in his place after his death, resolved if he could procure a godly and worthy man, to resign his place to him in his life time, which accordingly he did to famous Doctor Preston, whom he yet survived, and saw after him Doctor Sancroft, and after him Doctor Hollsworth to succeed in his Mastership.

He was of a very charitable disposition, insomuch as if he heard of any godly Minister that was in want, he would send them forty or fifty shillings at a time.

Though

Though he lived till he was very old, yet his sight remained very good, as may appear by this example:

A little before his death, an old Servant of his came to see him, and found him reading in a Book, so that at the first he took no notice of her; but when she came nearer, lifting up his head, he spake to her, asking her what a Clock it was: She told him Eleven. I have (said he) here got a Book that I have been reading of ever since eight a Clock, for I like it very well; and yet all that time he had read without Spectacles.

He lived eighteen years after the Resignation of his Mastership, and in November, Anno Christi 1640. resigned up his spirit unto God, being about the age of ninety four years, and was buried in Saint Andrews Church; Doctor Richard Holsworth, the then Master of Emanuel, preached his Funeral Sermon, and gave him a large and deserved Commendation.

His Death.

The Life of Master John Ball, who died
October 20. 1640.

John Ball was born about the year 1585. at Cassington, an obscure village, (a mile from Hanborough) in Oxfordshire: He being set to School at Tarnton, was found so apt to learn, that the School-master prevailed with his Parents, (though of low estate) to continue him Scholar there, till he was fitted for the University.

His birth and education.

Gods Providence, by means of friends, made way for his placing in Brazen-nose Colledge in Oxford, where he improved very much in the knowledge of the Arts, and he proved a quick disputant. When he was Batchelour of Arts, (wanting meanes for his maintenance to continue longer in the University) he accepted a motion made for his removal into the Countrey, and was placed in the Lady Cholmleys house in Cheshire, as Tutor to her Children, where many other Children also were taught by him. And though he came Raw and ungrounded in Religion (as himself was wont to expresse it) from Oxford, yet within a short time there appeared (with the increase of his Scholastic abilities) the breakings forth of the power of Godliness in his Conversation, unto them who were most Religious and judicious there, who thereupon took him into their society for mutual edification in the wayes of Gods fear. Whereas there was a great scarcity of godly painfull Preachers in that corner of the Countrey, in those times, he did much frequent the Ministry of Reverend Master John Ford, whereby he was not a little edified.

His going to Oxford.

His remove into Cheshire.

His improvement of his parts.

He had few Books, and therefore perused the more seriously such as he had under-hand. Calvins life published by Beza, and his Commentary upon the Psalms, made deep impressions upon his spirit. Growing into acquaintance with the most godly people in those parts, who much lamented the evils of the times, he often associated with them, in keeping private daies of Fasting and Prayer. Himself with some other honest Christians, were often convened

His mar-

gent studies

ned to Chester, and much troubled there, for keeping a Fast on Ascension-day, their fault being aggravated by the Bishop and his Officers, because they fasted upon that holy day. As he took not up, any opinion or practice, till he had well weighed it: So was he not much moved by any trouble which assaulted him in his way. When others judged him ripe for the Ministry, he was not hasty in adventuring upon that Calling, because he was sensible of the weight thereof, and also desirous to satisfy his conscience concerning the way of entrance by Episcopal subscription. And upon the serious studying of the points in controversy, betwixt the Bishops and Non-conformists, he was dissatisfied to yield unto that subscription which was then strictly commanded.

Some conflicts he had with the then Bishop of Chester, about Non-conformity; but though he looked upon a Bishop in those times as a formidable creature, yet he came off unshaken. Having resolved (upon the encouragement given by judicious Divines) to enter into the Ministry, when God should make a fair way for his admission, without subscription, by the intercession of Friends, he with Master Julines Herring, (who afterwards was famous for the work of the Lord in Salop;) were made Ministers by an Irish Bishop, (being occasionally in London;) with freedom from the formentioned snare. About the year 1610. he was called to be Minister at Whitmore, (a small village near unto New-Castle in Staffordshire) where he was entertained into the house of Edward Mainwaring Esquire, a pious and much esteemed Gentleman.

Here he married a godly Wife, whom God had provided as an help meet for him (he himself being alwaies a meer Scholar, neither much minding nor intermeddling in worldly affairs, beyond the bounds of his Calling,) by whom he had six Sons and one Daughter. Six of his Children were born unto him while he continued in Master Mainwaring's Family, where he found much love, and did much service; for every evening he expounded a portion of Scripture, which was read in course, and many mornings also was helpfull in Catechizing of the Family. Hither many Ministers and others had often recourse unto him for counsell, where they were alwaies friendly entertained; and the Lord blessed that Family very much, which doth still shew much kindnesse unto the Children of this good man. Afterwards he removed with his own Family unto an house which Master Mainwaring had built for him, where he had his seventh and last child born to him, and where he dwelt till his death.

He was a great lover of Learning, and therefore laid out in the first years of his Ministry, all the money which he could spare, from necessary expences, in buying good Books, with which he was so well acquainted (having both a quick understanding and strong memory) that he could readily give an account of all passages most remarkable in them. He had so well studied Bellarmines controversies, that it is scarcely credible what Relation he could make ex tempore of them from point to point; and shew from particular to particular, where the fallacy and the weaknesse of his Arguments did appear. And the like might be truly attested in reference unto the Arminian disputes, and the other Church-Controversies both in former and latter times. It was his custom to read over a Book, when once he undertook it, and no man could be more cautious in entertaining opinions without much mature consideration, having well weighed all arguments produced on both sides, both for and against them; and wherein his apprehensions were different from his Brethren, he did wisely forbear to vent them in such sort, as might occasion any division or offence.

Oh how well had it been with England, if all other men had managed their Studies and practices according to this pattern! for then, so many sparks (cried up as new lights) had not been kindled amongst us, which being blown abroad by pride and ignorance, do threaten to set the whole world on fire. But to proceed ceed in the Narrative of this worthy mans life. He was so enriched with knowledge both in Practical and Polemical Divinity; He was so able to interpret and reconcile difficult Scriptures; He had such dexterity in dealing with afflicted consciences, and he was so well furnished with Ministerial gifts for Preaching, Prayer, and the administration of both Sacraments, that it was not easie to discover wherein he most excelled. His ability to counsell and comfort dejected, tempted Christians, was occasioned, (as himself would acknowledge,) by his conversing with Mistrresse Sarah Mainwaring, (Wife to the Gentleman in whose house he continued many years, as was before mentioned) who was much exercised in that kind, and was an unparallel'd Gentlewoman for holy tendernesse and exactnesse in Religion.

His skill in comforting afflicted consciences.

Willing he was to trade every Talent with which God had trusted him, as opportunity was offered; and he was a man most unwearied in all waies of service.

His indefatigableness.

As he took extraordinary pains in publique, so did he also in private, especially on the Lords-day. For having by way of Preparation upon the Saturday in the afternoon, spent about two houres in his house, in praying and expounding some Scripture, (to which exercise divers did resort) on the Sabbath-Morning, he expounded a portion of Scripture in his Family, (whereof many neighbours were partakers): Then he preached twice in publique, read divers Chapters, and Catechized also in the afternoon, spending much time therein, (especially in the summer season) after the evening Sermon, he went unto Master Mainwarings house (being near at hand,) where he repeated both his Sermons, and prayed; likewise after Supper he had another exercise in his own Family, equivalent to a Sermon, unto which divers well-affected of the neighbour-hood did repair. These his great labours were the more wonderfull, in that they were so excellent and solid, as many Ministers and Scholars yet living know, who did often frequent them. He taught a School also (both from a desire to do good, and that he might provide the more comfortable subsistence for his Family,) having not only the children of poor neighbours, (for he refused none who were willing to learn, but of persons of better quality sent unto him; some whereof were tabled in his own house, and the rest placed in the neighbour-hood. Every morning of the six daies in the week, he instructed his own Children and Scholars in the Principles of Religion, whereby many young ones (of whom some are now Ministers) were well seasoned and settled in the grounds of godlinesse. Every night likewise he opened and applyed some portion of the Scripture, for the edification of his Family.

His unwearied pains on the Sabbath.

And besides his frequent preaching at Lectures, at Madeley especially; where he was the principal upholder of a weekly Sermon, and a monethly Fast, and his helpfulnesse in holy Fasting and Prayer elsewhere, (when desired) it was his custom to set apart daies (when freed from attendance upon his School) for the solemn seeking of God, with his godly neighbours, as the necessities of the times did require.

His frequent Fasting, and Prayer.

He was most ready to communicate his learning, graces, experiences, yea, his All, for the profit of such who conversed with him: The remembrance whereof, is very smarting upon the hearts of some of his surviving Friends, because they made not a fuller improvement of him for their own advantage.

His readiness to do good.

In the latter part of his time, he had some scholars, whom he instructed in Academical Learning, reading Lectures to them in Logick and Philosophy, and hearing them to dispute, which often they did during his dinner-time: And while he was at supper, other scholars read a piece of Greek, or Latine, (so exceeding diligent was he in Husbanding the shreds of time, as he called them) the residue of the day, till very late, he spent in his private study.

And

His temperance, and meeknesse.

His frugality.

His charity.

And as he was incomparably abstemious and moderate in the use of meate, drink, sleep, and apparel, so he had an admirable command over his passions. For those who most conversed with him, never saw inordinate outbreaches of anger, or other affections in his conversation. This Character was given by a Friend who was much with him, (viz.) That as Master Dod did turn earth into heaven, by a spiritual improvement of all earthly affairs, so Master Ball did reconcile earth and heaven, because worldly occasions were no distractions unto him in his journey thither. He lived upon a small maintenance, (viz.) twenty pounds per annum, for serving the cure at Whitmore, and the keeping of one Cow, both summer and winter, by Master Mainwaring aforesaid, with what he got by teaching School. Yet he would often say, that he thought never man passed through this world with lesse care. God indeed stirred up some Friends, (who knew his great worth and mean outward condition) to be helpfull unto him, towards whom he was alwaies really respectfull, requiting their love by his daily Prayers, and his readinesse upon all occasions to do service unto them and theirs. Through Gods singular blessing upon his yearly incomes, he lived very comfortably, was given to hospitality, and also unto liberality to the poor, (considering his estate) and left a good competency unto his Wife and Children. Yea, such was this holy mans gratitude and contentment, that he would say, I have enough, and enough, and enough. Whereas he went once every year into Oxford-shire, to expresse his dutifull respect unto his aged Parents, he made choice of that time for his journey, that he might enjoy the Benefit of Oxford-Act. And as his love to learned disputations was large, so by strength of memory, he could give a punctuall account of all the most considerable Arguments urged, and Answers returned, upon the severall Questions discussed.

And still this Journey was made profitable unto his Christian Friends (near to whose dwellings he travelled) by conference, his assistance in private Fasts and other exercises of Religion.

His humility

It would be too tedious and tiring unto the Reader, if relation should be made of all those memorable passages in this Reverend mans life, (which his Friends surviving, do well remember) which did proclaim the high degree of holinesse, with which God adorned and Crowned all his other great abilities, therefore some few of them only shall be reported. His constant carriage towards all who conversed with him, did speak out his deep humility. For alwaies he was apt to prefer others before himself, and he was never observed, by any reproachfull speeches, or behaviour, to cast the least contempt or discouragement upon the meanest Christian.

His esteem of the weight of the Ministry

He was all his life-long, very apprehensive and sensible of the weightinesse of the Ministers Calling, saying, That no man should dream of ease in that Function; and would often much bewail before the Lord in Prayer, his own inconsiderate entrance upon it. A Friend being weary of teaching School, and acquainting him with his purpose to enter into the Ministry, Master Ball told him, That he would find it a far heavier task to teach men than boys. And a Fellow-Minister telling him of his danger to be silenced by the Bishop, he returned this answer, If he should deal so with me, I would put off my hat and thank him.

His humility

Having experimentally poysed the weight of the Ministers work, he would say unto his Non-conforming Brethren, (when Prelatical persecution threatened to drive him out of England;) If we be necessitated to transplant our selves, you shall preach, and I will teach School. And alwaies when other Ministers were in company, he would endeavour earnestly to put them upon the performance of Family-duties, as judging them to be better able than himself.

Such

Such who knew this mans learning of all kinds, and rich ministerial gifts, will admire (upon the consideration of these passages) at the forwardnesse of illiterate Mecanicks in these times, to intrude upon the Ministers Office. And whereas the blessed Apostle himself cryed out, Who is sufficient for these things! we may do more than guesse what spirit animateth those men, whose praïses speak thus, Who is insufficient for these things!

He did lay to heart the want of labourious learning amongst godly Ministers, because so many neglected to acquaint themselves thoroughly with the controversies of the times; and he thought that positive Divinity, mighty of study, be best gained by the study of controverſie, when the main Principles were ing controverſie. first well drunk in. He would say, that a subtil Jesuite would make wilde verſes. work in many places of England, because neither the people nor their Ministers had sufficient in-sight into the points of difference betwixt us and the Papists. Now what other errors (no whit lesse dangerous,) have for the same reasons been entertained of late years, (as he foresaw and feared) it is too notorious.

Although he himself was much pleased with sober, profitable disputations, yet he would shrink with trouble upon the appearance of their audacity, who dared to question Fundamentals in Religion, or to speak slightly of the matters of God. Once observing a man in the heat of conference, carried beyond the bounds of modest inquiry after the Truth, he used these words with holy admiration; And whither will the love of arguing carry a man!

He compared many Professors of late times, unto young Travellers, who so soon as they are mounted, begin to gallop, and do out-ride their fellows; but they either fall short, or come late (if not lame) home.

And he called the waies of separation a Labyrinth, wherein men tire themselves and grow giddy, as in a maze; but when all is done, there is no way of separation, but that whereby they entered. The danger of Separation.

He, made it his businesse to raise and maintain high and honourable thoughts of God at all times, as himself would alwaies speak of the titles of the Almighty, with much gravity and reverence, endeavouring to draw forth holy thankfulnesse in all conditions of life. Here two or three things shall be touched upon, to give a tast of this good mans gracious spirit. His high esteem of God.

He with a Neighbour Minister, having occasion to meet at a place, where they had only bread and cheefe to their dinner, the Master of the house expressing trouble, that he had no better provision for so good unexpected guests: Hereupon he said, that it would cost a man many years labors, to be truly and thoroughly thankfull unto God for one piece of bread and cheefe, proceeding to discover, most divinely, the many mercies which were to be acknowledged, in that meal and meeting. His gratitude for mercies.

And whereas at that time Rochel was besieged, and the inhabitants were in great distresse through want of food, he moved a serious consideration, how much bread and cheefe with peace and fellowship, would be valued at Rochel: yea, he seriously made his demand, whether their obligations in the present place and meeting, were not much greater, because they in their instant enjoyments, had not experienced Rochels fears and sorrows.

At another time a dear Friend Relating his great danger by a fall off his horse, in a journey, and saying, that he never had received such a deliverance. Master Ball answered, Ten hundred times, (viz.) so often as you have ridden and not fallen; because the preventing of perils, is to be prized as much as our Rescuing out of them.

At a Marriage feast, where Christian Friends were civilly rejoycing in the good occasion of their meeting, the many good blessings provided for their comfort, and in their mutual society, this speech came from him with much

His high esteem of Jesus Christ. much gravity; One thought of Jesus Christ reaching the heart, is more to be valued, then all Creature-contentments whatsoever, though they should be enjoyed in their fulnesse for a thousand years without interruption.

His prudence.

That he might keep Gods servants of the lowest parts, alwaies high in his own estimation, he would wisely weigh their peculiar serviceablenesse in some kind or other, though they were inferiours in sundry excellencies. Hereupon when one admiring worthy Master Dods holy conversation, said, Oh how well would it be if all Ministers were like unto him; Master Ball answered, The Church would be quite undone if all others were like him. For though no man more honoured Master Dod, (which not many years before his death he witnessed, by listening unto his fatherly counsell bare-headed, with his hat in his hand) yet he knew, that other men, much inferiour in graces, had some special way of advantage to the cause and the people of God.

His distaste of frowardnesse.

He was a zealous opposite to passionate frowardnesse, observing the lamentable fruits thereof, in many persons and Relations, and he had an extraordinary dexterity to calm them who were boisterous. He would thus advise them, Put judgment into Office; for Affections are good followers, but bad guides. Look well to your hearts, for Passion is the effect of pride. And he would say unto them, You had need to get a strong bit and bridle; for you ride an unruly horse. Observing one bitterly to bewail the death of a dear Friend, he said, Rather labour to get good by it.

The means of cure.

He was wont to humble passionate Professors, who in their heat would speak unadvisedly, by this position, which he would undertake to prove, (viz) That a moral Heathen who never heard of Christ, might possibly by watchfulnesse secure himself from uttering one froward word all his life long; And therefore it was a great shame for Christians to be worse, who had more grace and greater helps to suppress sin. This was one parcell of good counsell, which he commonly bestowed in all cases, Inform Judgement; Set Faith on work; Be of good courage. As he used to be large in his Prayers in behalf of the Church of God, (according to the peculiar concernments thereof) both at home and abroad, so was he particular in minding his special Friends before the Lord, and the spirituall wel-fare of his children was so much upon his heart, that he daily desired to lodge them in Gods bosome, yea, he seldom gave thanks either before or after meat, (especially towards the end of his life) without some touch of tendency towards his children, in reference unto whom this was one constant Petition, That they might never seek great things for themselves in this world. And his own practice from his youth, proved the sincerity of his heart in this suit, because he never looked after, nor would entertain any motion of removing for wealth or worldly promotion, though his charge was great, and his eminency, both in ministerial and scholastical gifts, with the power of godlinesse, which did shine in his whole conversation, gained him many Friends, and rendered him in their account, a man more meet for a place of publique note and resort, than the village where he dwelt.

His love to the Church, and to his Children.

His contentednesse.

When the Prelatical opposition against the Non-conformists was hot and high, he spake thus unto a Neighbour-Brother, Be confident, that although all who are now known-Nonconformists were dead and gone: yet God would rather raise some out of our Ashes to protest against Episcopacy, and the Ceremonies, then suffer that cause to fall unto the ground. He would say, The Fathers wanted some of our lights, but we want more of their hearts.

His care to keep the Sacraments from pollution.

He was exemplarily carefull to preserve Gods Ordinances from pollution and contempt, and therefore did alwaies take great pains with his people, to prepare them for the Sacrament of the Lords Supper. In his Sermons he was wont to tell his Auditours, that their persecuting, impoverishing, imprisoning, and thrusting daggers into their Ministers bodies, would not be more grievous, then then their unworthy communicating at the Lords Table, and their unanswerable walking unto the Ordinances of graces dispenced amongst them. And when Parents presented their children in the Congregation to be baptized, he would very affectionately lay open their duty, pressing Sacramental engagements home to their hearts, with strong Arguments and authority Ministerial; Though no man was known by his Friends, who more did relished the Corruptions in Church-Government, and in Administrations of holy Worship, yet he hath sufficiently published unto the world his great dislike of the way of separation from our Church Assemblies upon such pretences. Thus he spake unto a Friend who had moved him to maintain our Church-Communion against the Separatists, How little am I beholding unto you, who drew me from more Profitable Studies, to peruse those senseless speculations?

His dislike of separat-
on.

He much lamented in his Prayers before God, the first breakings out of Independency in England, both in respect of the present offence, and the wofull consequences thereof, whereof he was much afraid: yea, he did very often tell his Friends (both in the time of his health and last sicknesse) that if God should give opportunity and hopes of Church Reformation, that we might be eased of our present grievances, the Brethren of the new separation, would be found the greatest obstrucers thereof.

His judgement about independen-
cy.

His Remembrance of the History of former Separations (with which he was fully acquainted) and his prudential fore-sight of the diducts which would necessarily follow from their Principles, (viz. Anabaptisme, &c.) together with his wise insight into the dispositions of some persons who then appeared therein; these were the grounds of his foretelling the confusions, the spreading of pernicious Errours, and hinderances of Reformation, which we since have sadly suffered under. These Reasons of his Prediction (which is noised abroad) are expressed, lest any should imagine him to have inclined to regard injections and impulsions of spirit, which some cry up as propheticall. His dislike whereof may be evidenced by this one instance, (viz.) Being asked by one who much pretended unto immediate inspirations besides Scripture, whether he at any time had experience thereof in his own Heart, his answer was this: No, I blesse God; and if I should ever have such phantasies, I hope God would give me grace to resist them.

His judge-
Revelations

When there was discourse concerning the new, (or rather the renewed) Errours, which were broached, he would ordinarily say, A good Treatise of the sufficiency of the Scriptures would put an end unto these matters. His exceeding love to study, and his great modesty caused unwillingnesse to go far from home, or to appear publique in any kind. And if the extraordinary importunity of some much esteemed Friends, had not conquered this avernesse, he would (in probability) never have printed any thing in his own name, or have come into the company of persons of chief place and quality; yet God was pleased in both these waies to make him serviceable. For besides the profit which many have received from his printed Books, he was happily instrumentall by conference to preserve some men of chief esteem, (in regard of their Piety, Parts, and places of command) in the Countries where they lived; from warping towards the waies of new separation, upon the solicitation of such who were busie sticklers therein.

His humility
and modesty.

Upon the calling of the Parliament in the year 1640. some hopes being conceived that he might be an instrument of publique benefit to the Church, by dealing with some Parliament-men, that (if further Reformation of things wofully out of order, could not be procured,) men unconformable to the Ceremonies might not be thrust out, and kept out of the Ministry in that regard. He thereupon took a journey unto London, with his Neighbour and endeared Brother Master Langley, but receiving small encouragement to his hopes and endeavours in that kind, he returned home with sorrow upon his heart, complaining of the many symptomes of Gods displeasure, which he saw ready to break out against poor England, and resolved to do what service he could in any other way.

His intended works. And being convinced that his labours might be profitable to the Church, both in the present and succeeding ages, he was resolved to lay forth himself for publique service in any kind, as his good Friends should advise; and in pursuance hereof he designed these three works. viz. 1. A Treatise of the Church. 2. An Exposition of obscure Scriptures out of all the original Languages. 3. A more full Systeme of Divinity by the enlarging of his Catechism. For all which he had much good provision under hand, when the Lord saw cause to put an end to his labours. And here, all those must silence their hearts, (who knowing him, may be apt to judge his removal at this time to be unseasonable) with these words, (which were much in his mouth when God checked hopes by crosse-Providences) The Lord is wisest: God is most wise. Many conflicts he had with men of greatest strength,

His great abilities. (as was imagined) to maintain the new pathes, into which divers had stepped aside. But the truth is, never was any of them able to stand up under his Arguments. Though God was pleased to take him away (whom some in scorn called The Presbyterians Champion) yet he hath raised up other Worthies, who do strenuously gain-say those extravagancies.

His last sick sicknesse. When his nature was enfeebled by constant study, and great long-continued labours, he passed the time of his languishing sicknesse with a sweet, humble, divine, peaceable spirit. He preached in publique so long as bodily ability could bear it; and he continued to pray in his Family till strength failed. Now his addresses to God were most holy and heavenly, as Swan-like Songs, the sweetest at last. Though he spake not very much during his bodily decays, yet the words which he used were solid and savoury.

His Faith. Being asked what he thought of himself, whether he should now die or recover? he answered, I do not trouble my self about that matter. He often bewailed the infirmities of his life, and in special (now as at former times) his inconsiderate entring upon the weighty Calling of the Ministry; but he manifested withall an holy child-like confidence in Christ, still strengthening his heart, after his humble mourning for sinne, with this consideration, that the Scripture mentioneth weaknesses in the choicest Saints, which were neither totall hinderances to the exercise of their faith in Christ, nor to their salvation through grace. This question being propounded to him, what he now thought concerning his labours (part whereof were then printed) against the present separation in England? He answered, that though he had been weary of those controversies, which hindered his going on in more profitable studies, yet he did not repent of that which he had done, only he desired God to pardon the defects, which had cleaved unto that and his other services. When any mention was made before him of his great labours to do good, he would say, (and this was a speech which he much used) If the Lord were not a God pardoning sinnes, I was in a miserable condition.

His humility. And however he did say with tears, that he had too much respect amongst men, and that many judged that to be in him, which was not, (such was his humility;) yet Friends expressing ardent desires of his health, for service sake, he told them, that he could have been content to have lived longer, (if the Lord had been pleased) that he might have been further usefull in his place, and have borne his share in sufferings with his Brethren. For he expected a very sharp storm, though he hoped it would be but short. And he called it, The last combate which we should have with Antichrist. When towards his end, he was asked, how he did? he would thus answer answer with a cheerfull countenance, Going to heaven space. And as his conversation had for many years been in heaven, the Lord, (who had ripened him for immediate Communion with himself) took him unto himself, Octob. 20. 1640. and of his age about 55. The materials of this Narrative, (concerning the pious, fruitfull life of that faithful Servant of Christ, Mr. John Ball,) were received from these Ministers of the Gospel, and men of known integrity, (viz. Master John Taylor of Checkley in Stafford-shire, (who was his Countrey-man, and of his most ancient acquaintance.) Master Thomas Langley of Middlewich in Cheshire,) who besides his former intimatenesse, continued under his Ministry above five years, he being taken off from the exercise of his own Ministry by Episcopal power,) Master Simoon Ashe of St. Austins London (who for the space of many years had been his bosome Friend,) and from Master George Crosse of Clifton in Stafford-shire, (who daily conversed with him for sundry moneths, both before, and in the time of his last sicknesse,) who all of them do acknowledge themselves obliged to God, for the spiritual good, gained by this their dearly respected, and much honoured Friend and Brother, who since his death, have been very sensible of their great losse by his removall. But they and all others must learn to live upon Divine-immutable-All-sufficiency, when creatures do fail.

His death.

Now the Just shall live by his Faith.

The Life of Doctor Potter, who died Anno Christi 1642.

Arnaby Potter was born in Westmerland, Anno Christi 1578. within the Baronry of Kendal, and brought up at School there, till he was fitted for the University; Thence he was sent to Queens Colledge in Oxford, where he was chosen, first a Scholar of the House, then a Fellow, and afterward Provost. Whilest he was Fellow, he was a very carefull Tutor to many worthy Gentlemens sons, whom he trained up in Learning, but especially in true Religion. He was a very humble and meek man, a man of few words, a sweet Preacher, and a favourer of strict Professors of Religion. It was the fashion and custom of the Fellows after dinner, to sit or stand a while at the Hall door, and discourse usually of divers points of Religion, or of good Writers, and sometimes of other trivial matters. This man, on a certain time, when he heard them talk of many trivial things, said nothing, but observed what they said; and when they had done talking, he thus bespake them: Now, my Masters, will you hear all your extravagant discourses? for I have strictly observed and marked what you said, and he told them every whit, and they admired him for his memory.

His birth and education.

His preferments at Oxford

His humbleness.

His holiness.

His Lectures at Abington, and Totness. It was his custom first to write one part of his Sermon, and to commit it to memory presently, and then another, so that he could preach with much facility, and upon a little warning. He was for a while Lecturer at Abington, and at Totness in Devon-shire, where he was much respected. Then he proceeded Doctor in Divinity, and was preferred by Sir Edward Giles to a Pastoral Charge, which Knight was a worthy Gentleman in his Countrey, and often chosen a Parliament man for Devon.

He is chosen Provost of Queens Colledge. Doctor Potter married the Lady Giles her daughter, when he was Doctor but of a years standing. Not long after, Doctor Aray, a worthy Provost of Queens Colledge died; whereupon he was chosen to succeed him in the Provostship, with the unanimous consent of the Fellows, when he was far from the University, and never dreamed of any such preferment.

He is chosen Bishop of Carlisle. He was also Chaplain in ordinary to Prince Charles, and accounted at the Court the penitential Preacher. When he had been Provost about the space of ten years, he resigned his place, and went to his Pastoral charge in the Countrey, and there resided; yet he had not been there long, but King Charles his Master, cast a favourable aspect upon him, and seeing he had not rewarded him for his long and faithfull service, he chose him to be Bishop of Carlisle; and though many sued for the place, yet he said peremptorily that none but Potter should have it; and surely his gracious Master honoured not him so much as he did himself and that age, in the freedom of his noble and unexpected choice.

His painfulness. That which Nazianzen said of Basil, may be fitly and properly said of this Bishop; He was promoted, he did not steal or shuffle himself into the chair, he did not invade it, the honour sought and followed him. When he was Bishop, he was a constant Preacher, and Performer of Family duty, both evening and morning, and kept his Servants and Attendants in good order.

His Sermon at the beginning of the Parliament. Being called to London, in the beginning of the Parliament, he made at Westminster a worthy and zealous Sermon, wherein he inveighed against the corruptions that were crept into the Church, especially in respect of Ceremonies so eagerly prest by sundry Bishops, as bowing to the Altar, and such like innovations. His Sermon was well approved of by the best; but he seeing the tumults that were then raised in London about the Parliament House, and hearing that he himself was censured as Popish, because a Bishop, he took it grievously to heart, sickned, and died there, about the great Climactericall years of his age.

A favourer of godly Ministers. He was a great favourer of zealous Professors, and Lecturers, and therefore he was accounted by many a Puritanical Bishop; and indeed, some at the Court in King James his time, said, That Organs would blow him out of the Church.

Mr. Thomas Richardson now Pastor of Newbold Pace in Warwickshire. He was well skilled in the Hebrew tongue, and for his further Progress therein, disdained not to learn of one of the Fellows, even when he was Provost.

An enemy to the book of sports. He utterly disliked the Book of sports for Recreation on the Sabbath day, and told a Minister with whom he was acquainted, that if it were sent down to his Diocese, he would sleight it and urge none of his Jurisdiction to read it.

He was of a weak constitution of body, melancholick and lean, as being a hard Student, and therefore to recreate his spirits he loved vocal musick, and to this end, he sent divers times for such Scholars in the Colledge as could sing well, and he would bear a part with them in his lodgings after supper, where they made most excellent melody. He was the last Bishop that died as a Member of the Parliament, and was Bishop of Carlisle some fourteen years.

*The Life of Master Richard Sedgwick who died
Anno Christi 1643.*

Richard Sedgwick was born at East Deereham, in the County of Norfolk, Anno Christi 1574. His birth and education. His Father was a Clothier; but by reason of a great losse by fire, fell in to decay. He had an Uncle living in York-shire, who was very rich, and of large yearly revenues having no Children; whereupon he took this Richard in his tender years home to himself, and put him to School, with an intent to make him his heir; but God had laid up a better portion for him. His Uncle and his Family were prophane, having the power of godlinesse, and wedded to games and sports; yet even in such a Family God visited him in mercy, and awakened his soul by working in him hearty desires after himself. While the rest of the Family were at their games and dancings, he would be in a corner mourning. His Uncle at first thought his retirednesse to have been bookishnesse, and therefore rebuked him gently, and called upon him to take more liberty; but at last perceiving the truth of the thing, began to hate him, and to deal roughly with him, and not being able to bring him to his will, cast him out of his Family, saying, that a Puritane should never inherit his land. His conversion.

Before this, his Father died, and his Mother being industrious and sparing, out of the little means she had left her, maintained him at Peter-house in Cambridge, where he profited greatly in all kind of learning. He began the exercise of his Ministry in Kent; where he being called to preach in the Cathedral at Canterbury, in his Sermon touching the corruption of the Prebends, and their Cathedral service, he so far displeased them, as that by threats they brought him to condescend, through weaknesse, to promise to recant, and a day for this was appointed. He is rejected by his Uncle. His going to Cambridge. Humane infirmity.

Upon his return home, and his second thoughts, he became very sad, and in his perplexity took his Bible and opened it, and at the first, lighted on that encouraging Word of God to Jeremiah, Jer. 1. 7, 8. Whatsoever I command thee thou shalt speak; be not afraid of their faces, for I am with thee to deliver thee, saith the Lord. By this he was so strengthened, that he resolved to stand to what he had formerly delivered, whatsoever dangers did attend him. At the time appointed, he preached again in the Cathedral, having a very large Auditory; both of the Countrey and City, in which Sermon he confirmed what he had before delivered, earnestly pressing the Prebends to reform the abuses amongst them. By this they were so offended, that they complained of him to the Bishop, and so persecuted him, that he was forced to forsake his place, and to retire himself into private, and was entertained for a time by Sir Edward Bois the elder, a man eminent for Piety in those daies. During this his retirement, he came upon occasion to London, and by the means of Master Egerton, Pastor at Black-fryers, was received into the Family of Sir Edward Anslow, who lived in the City during the winter, and in Summer at Crawly in Surrey, a place destitute of a Preaching Ministry. In this Family his encouragement was great, but his labours abundant. Every day his usual course was to pray in the morning at six a clock with the Husbandmen, and at ten to pray with the rest of the Family, and expound a Chapter, in which course he went through the four first Books of Moses. His course at night was after Prayer, to catechize the Family by turns, wherein he used no respect of Persons, the meanest not being left out, and the chiefest not forborn. On the Lords-day, during his abode at Crawly, he preached twice constantly, and after publique exercises, called the whole Family in private to render an account of what was delivered in publique. In the winter, when the greatest part of the Family was at London, under an able Ministry, he was ready to help others, and by Providence, was called to improve his talent at Battersey in Surrey. Master Wybourne, a Reverend Divine, who constantly Preached in that place, having by a fall broke his legge, and being disabled thereby to continue his labours, desired his assistance. At this place the people were so affected with his Ministry, that they requested him to continue to preach among them, promising to strain themselves to provide him maintenance.

He had a fair call and opportunity (denying himself) to answer it, for Sir Edward Anslow, about this time had an estate befallen him in Hertsfordshire, whither he resolved to go to dwell, in which place was an able and godly Minister; Master Sedgwick seeing that by continuing in this Family, he should not have occasion of exercising his publique Ministry, relinquished fifty pounds annuity during his life, assured to him by this worthy Knight, and accepted of this call to Preach at Battersey.

Before his departure out of this Family, he married a Wife of an honest and Religious stock in the City of London. He had not long exercised his gifts at Battersey, bringing glory to God, but the devil again raised up persecution against him. One Master King, Church-warden of the place, was offended at him, because he freely reprov'd sinne, and boldly spake against the corruptions that were then in the Church; By this man he was presented into the Commissaries Court, and by his means cited to appear to answer certain Articles. This was about the latter end of Queen Elizabeths reign, not long before the coming in of King James. Upon this citation he resolved to appear, and come to London, and being at the door of the Commissaries house Master Egerton his faithfull and Reverend Friend, by Providence passing by, came to him, and having saluted him, told him he had heard of the opposition made against him at Battersey, and asked him if he would accept of a Call to go beyond the Seas, his answer was (having returned thanks for his kindnesse) that he could not as yet resolve him, forasmuch as he stood accused at present, and was resolved what-ever came of it, to defend those Truths that he had publicquely delivered; but yet professing a willingness to follow Providence, whither-soever the Lord should call him. Appearing before the Commissary, he met with courteous usage, and was friendly dismissed; for at this time those men feared a change to be brought in by King James.

Not long after this he was called by the Merchant-adventurers to be Minister to their company beyond Sea, whither, breaking through all discouragements, he went. During his abode beyond the Sea at Stoade, and Hamborough (which was about the space of eleven years and an half) he by the advice of the godly learned, erected and established Discipline in that Church. God did greatly blesse his Ministry, and he begat among that little company, many Sons and Daughters unto God. He had Communion with the Nether-land-Dutch Church at Stoade, and at Alienon near Hamborough.

rough, and with the godly that came out of England, admitting them, being desirous to come to the Lords Table.

In his Ministry he was very searching, many coming and confessing those things which he had never heard of, till it came out of their own mouths. The efficacy of his Ministry.

In his carriage he was affable and courteous, yet grave and awfull, so that many durst not for fear do those things that otherwise they were disposed to. The Merchants here found the benefit by the orderly carriage of their Factors there. Yet here the Devil was not quiet, for one of the prime Merchants taking exceptions against his impartial dealing in his Ministry, and the order in the Church, threatened by such a day, naming it, to have him over into England; but before that day came, himself was summoned by death to another place. Gods judgement on a persecutor.

He was very charitable himself, allowing something yearly towards the maintenance of the suspended Ministers here, and greatly furthered charity in others. By his direction and encouragement Mastes Jones, a rich Batchelour, and one of the Elders of his Church, bequeathed many thousands of pounds to pious uses, which to this day speaks his praise. His charity.

He was eminent in self-denial, for being made Executour by the said Master Jones of his last Will and Testament, whereby he might have gained much to himself, he never rested till he had caused him to alter his Will, and to place others in his room. His self-denial.

Upon the dissolving of that company of Merchants he came over into England, and being disappointed of a place in London, intended for him by Master Jones, he went to Monmouth in Wales, and for some time held the Lecture settled there. Afterward a Chappel being erected at Wapping, he was called to that place, and became the first Minister there. Here he abode to his death, being holy and exemplary in his life and conversation, and abundant in labours, preaching constantly thrice a week, and catechizing on the Lords-day besides. His return into England. His Lecture in Wales. His call to Wapping.

The tenderesse of his fatherly care and love of this people, he expressed all the time of his living with them, but especially in the time of the great sicknesse, when, remaining with them, he preached constantly every Lords-day, and the Fast-dayer, notwithstanding all the danger that he was in, the infection in that place being much spread, and very violent. The Providence of God over him at that time was very remarkable. For although all the Families round about him were infected, and his house adjoynd to the place of Burial, yet neither himself nor any of his Family were any waies smitten with it. His painfulness. A special Providence.

Many were his labours in private, being much sought unto both for counsel and for comfort. What successe God gave unto his Ministry, was evident by the many souls won and built up by him. He was very studious, and wrote much, yet was always averse from publishing any thing, though often requested; saying, that the many Books that were daily set forth, hindered the study and reading of the Holy Scriptures. Once, he committed to the Presse a Catechism fitted for his own Congregation, and before his death, had finished a large Tractate of the body of Divinity, which still lies by. His humility.

He sought the good of all, and was a precious favour unto some, in whose hearts to this day his memory flourishes. He foresaw the ensuing distractions with a grieved heart, and raised himself up to comfort, by contemplating the approaching time wherein Christ and his truth, and his ways, shall have the preheminance. His judgement concerning some hath proved true, asserting often that their principles would not (if they continued in them) suffer them to sit down on this side Anabaptism. He was a Friend of truth and peace, and an Instrument of refreshing the bowels of the poor; many strangers gers for his sake giving in largely towards their relief. Having finished his course, being spent with labours, he quietly and comfortably ended his days, and according to his last words, went unto his God Anno Christi 1643. and of his age 69. having continued his Ministry at Wapping six and twenty years.

*The Life of Master Julines Herring, who dyed
Anno Christi 1644.*

His Birth.

Julines Herring was born in Flamber-mayre Parish in Montgomery-shire, 1582. His Father within three years after returned with his Wife and Family into Coventry, where his Ancestors had been chief officers of the City, in their course almost for the space of two hundred years, and where he himself also was Sheriff and Mayor, living and dying in good estimation there.

His education.

This Julines his Son, having had his first education in Shrop-shire, with Master Perkin, Minister at More-Chappel, his Mothers near Kinsman, (where he learned the Principles of Religion) was brought home unto Coventry, where he was trained up in Learning, under Reverend Master Tovey, who then was Head School-master there. While he was a school-boy, he was noted for his diligence in reading the holy Scriptures, delighting in those Chapters especially, which treat of Faith in Christ, and of Repentance from sin to God. And even then in his child-hood, he, with two or three of his School-fellows, were so religiously disposed, that on play-days they would pray together, and repeat the heads of their Catechisme, with the Sermons which they heard upon the last Lords-day, before they went unto their Lusory exercises. Thus this Timothy grew acquainted with God and his Word, and the ways of Religion while he was a Child.

His love of the Scriptures.

His remove to Cambridge.

Being very well fitted for the University, he was sent unto Cambridge, about the fifteenth year of his age, and admitted into Sidney Colledge, where he was studious, and a good Proficient in Academical Learning. When he was Master of Arts, coming home to his Father, he Preached often in Coventry, with very good approbation amongst those, who were best affected towards the ways of Godlineffe. Here he had special encouragements in the study of Divinity, from Master Humphrey Fen, famous for his Ministry and Non-conformity at Coventry, (who in the Preface to his last Will and Testament, made so full and so open a Protestation against the Hierarchy and Ceremonies, that the Prelatical Party would not suffer it to be put among the Records of the Court, when the Will was tendered to be proved) and his conscience was unsatisfied to enter into the Ministry by Episcopal subscription, but through a good Providence, he, with Master Fohn Ball, were made Ministers by an Irish Bishop without that subscription. The first place of his settled Ministry was Cawk in Derby-shire, (a small village) whither he was called by means of his much honoured good Friend, Master Arthur Hilderfam, and where he had good encouragements from Master Bainbridge, a Gentleman there.

His call to Cawk.

thereof good estate and estimation for Religion. In this place, (which was six miles from Derby, and three from Asby de la Zouch,) his peace and liberty was the better preserved, because it was a peculiar, and so not subject unto Episcopal visitation. Here God was pleased to set a broad Seal to his Ministry, making him an happy Instrument to build up many, who were brought to Christ by Master Hilderfams labours, and also to turn many others from darknesse to light, and from the power of Satan unto God.

At this time there was great scarciry of good Preachers in those parts, whereupon people from twenty towns and villages flocked unto Cawk-Chappel, (as Doves to the windows) every Sabbath-day, where more congregated, (especially in summer and in afternoons,) then the Chappel could contain; yet standing at the windows without, they might hear the Sermons Preached, and Scriptures read, because Master Herrings voice was clear and strong. Hither great companies came in the morning, with joyfull expectation of wholesome soul-provisions; here they continued all day with cheerfulness, (some bringing their victuals from home with them, and others going to a three-peny ordinary, provided purposely for the refreshing of strangers) and they went from hence in the evening in companies, repeating the Sermons, and singing Psalms in their return home. Here amongst many others, Master Simeon Ashe received some of his first impressions, and bent towards Religion, whom Master Herring loved from his child-hood, and who lived in his heart and Prayers unto his Death.

And this is a matter considerable, that few (if any) in those parts, who were hopefully brought unto God, by the Ministry of Master Hilderfam and Master Herring, have been turned aside into the by-paths of error and separation in these broken dividing times, but they continue sound in their judgements, and holy in their conversations, well remembering the principles whereof they were well instructed and grounded by those two Worthies, their Fathers in Christ.

When he had continued at Cawk about the space of eight years, he was forced from thence for Non-conformity by the Prelatical power, being informed against by ill-affected men, who maligned the great service which he did, and envied the great respect which he had in those parts. Before he removed from thence, the Lord provided for him a most gracious yoke-fellow, who was no discouragement, but an encouragement rather unto him always, both in his services and sufferings for Christ and his cause. His Wife was the third Daughter of Master Gellibrand, (sometimes Preacher to the English company at Flushing in Holland) and Grand-child to that man of God Master John Oxenbridge, (Minister of Southam in Warwick-shire, and afterwards of Bablick in Coventry, where he died) and as she came out of a godly stock, so she hath expressed, and still doth expresse the power of godliness, in every condition and relation of her life, to Gods honour. By her he had thirteen Children; and as they were happily, mutually helpfull in the ways of holiness, so it was their joynt care to educate their posterity in the nurture and fear of the Lord. They were taught the Principles of Religion from their child-hood, and their tender good Mother (according to their Fathers appointment) caused them to learn the Proverbs of Solomon by heart. Neither was this gracious care in vain; for the blossomes and fruits of grace, sweetly appear in their lives, to the comfort of their Parents, and Christian Friends. And here this one thing is notable and imitable in this worthy man, in reference to his Children, (viz.) That ever before he gave them correction, he endeavoured to convince them of their sin against God, and sought by tears and prayers for Gods blessing upon that means for their good.

When the course of his Ministry was interrupted at Cawk, and there was no hope of his peaceable continuance there, God (by means of Master William Rowley, a wise religious man, and his faithfull Friend) was pleased to o-

The education of her children.

His call to pen a door for the more publique exercise of his Ministry in Shrewsbury. Here he Preached at Alkmare's Church, every Tuesday morning, and upon the Sabbath also, (so long as liberty was allowed) which Sermon was at one a clock, that neither the Ministers of the town might be offended, nor other Congregations emptyed, by the peoples flocking unto his Ministry.

The Sermon which he Preached on the Lords-day, he Repeated it the same night before Supper, at the houses of Master Edward Jones, Master George Wright, and Master William Rowley by course; and whereas some spies were usally sent thither, (crowding in with the company) to pick quarrels, he behaved himself so prudently, and prayed always so affectionately for the King and present Government, that his adversaries gave this testimony of him, (viz.) Though he be scrupulous in matter of Ceremony, yet he is a loyal subject unto the King, and a true Friend unto the State.

Satans Malice.

Beside the great good service which was now done in Salop, by his Ministry, and private conferences with Christians: In reference unto him many other Ministers had the more frequent recourse unto the town, (Master Pierſon, Master Nicols, &c.) who were put upon Preaching once or oftner, before they departed thence, whereby knowledge was much increased, and the power of Godlineſſe much cherished and promoted. But Satan maligning those opportunities of service unto Christ, some envious ill-affected persons, (amongst whom Master Peter Study was the chief) were stirred up, to lay in complaints against him as a Non-conformist: For such was his Prudence, Sweetneſſe, and Peaceableneſſe of Spirit, that other Objections could not with any colour of Truth be made against him there. Hereupon Doctor Morton (then the Bishop of that Diocesse,) referred him unto two neighbour Ministers for satisfaction; and in pursuance of this order, Mr. Herring gave in his scruples in writing, and also replied, upon their answer. The consequence of this paper-dispute was a Certificate to the Bishop from the Ministers, that they believed Master Herring from conscientious grounds, in his own apprehensions, remained unsatisfied, and the Bishop himself told Master Herrings Friends, that he was satisfied in his integrity. But such were those times, that he was suspended from the use of his Ministry, though by mediation of Friends, the suspension was divers times taken off, and then brought on again by Persons of contrary minds and ways. Thus he continued in Salop for the space of seventeen years, sometimes enjoying, and sometime wanting liberty for the exercise of his Ministry in publique. But when the Pulpit door was shut against him, he was the more frequent in keeping private Fasts, and in expounding the Scripture three times a day in his own Family; by which exercise some of the neighbours were edified also.

His suspension.

Alwaies upon the Lords day, (where he was at home or abroad) he frequented the Ordinances of God administred in publique, professing thereby (as himself said) that his practice should declare his judgement against separation from the Congregations in England, though there were corruptions in them. When some seeds of separation were scattered in Salop (by Daniel Chidley and his Wife,) their growth was check'd by his appearing against them. He had many bowels towards them who were misled in this kind, as was expressed by the many prayers with tears, which he poured forth before God in their behalf. And having upon this occasion, studied that point the more thoroughly, he would often say, It is a sinne of an high nature, to un-Church a Nation at once, and that this would become the spring of many other fearfull errours; for separation will eat like a Gangrene into the heart of Godlineſſe. And he did pray, that they who would un-Church others, might not be un-Christianed themselves. When the Plague was in Salop, he gave himself unto prayer for the town, and in particular for the persons infected; and many from the Pest-houses returned thanks unto him, for the spiritual comfort received by his Prayers.

His judgement against separation.

He

He took great delight in his studies (having a very good Library) and was often willing to misse a meal, that he might the more satisfie himself in conversing with his Books. He was seldome hungry, (as himself was wont to say) while he was in his study, and those who best knew him, could easily render the reason thereof; for as he was afraid of doing Gods work negligently, so it was his meat and drink to converse with his God, and to do the will of his heavenly Father. And yet such were his compassions towards afflicted consciences, that he gave charge unto his whole Family, to send none such away till they had spoken with him: yea, unto them, his manner was to give full liberty of speech, that they might not go away without some clearing and satisfaction. His experience, humility and sweetnesse of disposition was such, that seldome any one who was troubled in spirit departed from him without some relief and comfort; whereto may be added his great faithfulness towards them in perplexed cases, who opened their hearts into his bosome for spiritual satisfaction.

His Study-
ousnesse.

When he was not allowed liberty to preach in publique at home, he was willing to bestow his pains abroad; and every where he in his Ministry proved himself a solid well-studied Divine, A Workman who needed not to be ashamed. It may truly be affirmed concerning him, that when he was in journeys, he imitated the Lord Christ his Master, Who went about doing good. For in the Families whither he came, (if there was not opportunity of more publique employment, wherein he might appear with safety in those Prelatical times,) he was alwaies ready by Prayer and Exposition of Scripture, to be serviceable unto the souls of such who desired to improve him. He was a man of an ingenuous and cheerfull spirit, yet very grave and inoffensive; yea, the lightfomeness of his behaviour being accompanied with holiness and humility, did make his serious services the more acceptable, and more taking upon the hearts of those who conversed with him.

His painful-
nesse.

Amongst many other rare gifts, with which God had enriched him, this did shine forth brightly unto all them, who were acquainted with his way, in performing Family duties, whether in his own house, or elsewhere, (viz.) That he would alwaies most aptly and affectionately enlarge himself upon the Sermon lately heard, or the Chapter read, by confession, complaint, petition, thanksgiving, &c. unto the great advantage of them, who joyned with him in that exercise. He was indeed a man made up of love and meeknesse, for the discovery whereof, take two instances, which will tell the Reader, that he was Dove-like, without gall. The one is this; Doctor Lambe having broken his legge by a fall, was brought into the same Inne in Northampton-shire, where Master Herring had taken up his lodging, being in a journey; and that night he prayed very affectionately for him, though Doctor Lambe was a notorious violent Persecutor of Non-conformists, both Ministers and people; yea though he had been a bitter opposite against Master Herring particularly. He being asked the reason why he expressed so much respect towards so unworthy a man, returned this answer; The greater enemy he is to the Church, the more need he hath of Prayers. And then wished those who were with him, To prove themselves Christs Disciples by loving their enemies, and by praying for their Persecutors. The other instance is this, (viz.) understanding the Arch-bishop said unto some of his Friends (Petitioners for the liberty of his Ministry) I will pickle up that Herring of Shrewsbury; He used these words, If he will abuse his power, let it teach Christians the more to use their Prayers. And he then prayed, that the Non-conformists enemies might by observation, know that they have a good God to trust unto, when trampled upon by ill-despised men.

His Humility, and Charity

times would overtake this Nation; and at a conference about the affairs of England, he used these words: Gods rod (I much fear) will be homebred Warre in State, and Errours and Heresies in the Church, with Gods visiblle departure from us.

His remove to Wren-bury.

A character of Mr.
Nicholls.

When all hope of regaining the liberty of his Ministry in Shrewsbury was quite gone, and therefore his continuance there, in many regards, was judged inexpedient; he removed with his Wife, and such of his Family, who were not disposed of elsewhere, unto Wrenbury in Cheshire, where he sojourned with his Wives dear Sister Mistresse Nicolls, a godly woman, the Widdow of worthy Master Robert Nicolls, who had been very famous in those parts, both for his labours and great abilities; of whom this true character may be given: He was a man who had a clear head, and a tender heart, who led an holy life, and abounded in the work of the Lord. Here Master Herring lived privately and comfortably, under the Ministry of his good Friend Master William Peartree, doing what service he could by comforting afflicted consciences, and confirming the hearts of Gods people in the Faith of the Gospel, as opportunities were offered. Before any further progresse be made, in making known his call unto Amsterdam, here may seasonably be inserted, the description given by a Reverend Neighbour Minister, which is as followeth.

Mr. Herrings Character.

Whereas you desire my opinion in writing, concerning that Reverend and Religious man of God, Master Herring deceased; The truth is, I fear my Pen may rather darken his Honour, than my Pensil can draw out his Character; yet as the Martyr counted it a great mercy to be cast into prison, if it were but to see the face of that blessed Angel of God, Master Bradford; so I have look't on it as no small happinesse, that the Lord in his Providence did cast me into these parts, to see the face, and hear the voice of Master Herring, that blessed Angel of a Church in Salop. And I blesse God, that I had some intimate acquaintance with him, and knew his Doctrine, manner of life, &c. as Timothy did Pauls, 2 Epist. 3. 10. And I should wrong him, if I should withhold this just testimony. He was one of whom the world was not worthy, a Messenger, one of a thousand, a faithfull Minister of Jesus Christ; A Boanerges (a sonne of thunder) to brawny-hearted sinners; A Barnabas (a sonne of consolation) to broken-hearted sinners. As sweet a grace he had in Elocution, as ever I heard man in the Pulpit, whose gift of utterance did set a fair glosse on all his holy Sermons; Another Apollos, eloquent and mighty in the Scriptures; and you know the common saying, Bonus textualis bonus Theologus. His Sermons preached in the Congregation, were printed in his conversation; In Doctrine, shewing incorruptness, gravity, sincerity, (for he was a pious and learned Divine) and in life, shewing himself a Pattern of good works; free from visible blame, (saving humane unavoidable infirmities,) none could say (justly) black was his eye. He was indued with an admirable gift of Prayer, and was frequently employed in daies of private humiliation, even then, when meetings in that kind were branded with the odious names of Conventicles; yet the perils (to which he rendred himself obnoxious,) could not stave him off, from opening his window (with Daniel) toward Jerusalem. He was very fruitfull in conference, discreet in carriage, and cheerfull and couragious in his sufferings, of which this good old Non-conformist had his share. And when every door was barr'd, and no hope left to enjoy his publique liberty, he left the land of his Nativity, and (on a clear call) went into the Netherlands, where (after some years spent in the work of the Lord) this bright star did set, to the no little sorrow of his dear Christian Friends, &c.

This faithfull Servant of Christ had many invitations into New-England, but received not satisfaction in his spirit, to transplant himself thither.

After-

Afterwards in the latter end of the year 1636. he was propounded by some Friends unto Master Rulice, ( who was sent from the English Reformed Church in Amsterdam unto London, to provide a Minister to succeed Master John Paget ) as a man most meet to undertake that place. For the case there was this, ( viz. ) Master John Paget ( whose works praise him in the gate ) being through old age, rendred unable to uphold his wonted work in that Reformed Congregation, was eased of his Pastoral attendance there, ( though the Lords of the City, according to their commendable custom, continued his competent maintenance till his death, ) therefore Master Rulice his Colleague, was employed to find out an Assistant.

His Call to Amsterdam.

This motion made known to Master Herring, was the rather hearkened unto, because his suspension from preaching was a burthen to his active spirit, and he espied no ground of hope that he should ever be suffered by the Prelates to enjoy his much-desired liberty in England any more. Hereupon coming up to London, after much seeking of God, and serious consulting with godly Brethren, he was perswaded that this call came from God, and therefore might not be gain-said.

The Reason of his Remove.

Now having resolved ( in the pursuance of this Providence ) to leave England, amongst other difficulties to be encountred, he was much affected with a double conflict, the one relating unto his Manuscripts, the other unto his near and much endeared Friends. He had many papers and letters ( which he much prized ) containing both the spiritual breathings of gracious hearts, and matters of great concernment: and those he durst not adventure to take with him ( fearing a search, ) nor yet did he judge it safe to leave them, because he knew not into what hands they might come; therefore upon advice he burnt many writings, though both then and afterwards he did with tears think of that Letter martyrdome, ( for so he called it, ) wherein many of the best thoughts of his dearest Friends were committed to the flames. If this was so grievous, then let the Reader guesse, with what grief of heart this thought was entertained, that now he must leave thousands of his precious Friends, without any hope of seeing their faces any more in the land of the living.

His Letter
Martyrdom

And truly his labours and his lovely conversation had gained him multitudes of Friends, in every Countrey and corner where he was known; for no man was more generally and intirely affected, by all sorts, who feared God, then good Master Herring. Although it be not possible to give a particular account of the Gentry and Ministry, ( most eminent for Religion ) who highly prized and heartily loved him, yet the vertuous Lady Margaret Bromley, ( who then dwelt at Sheriff Hales in Shropshire ) deserves an honourable remembrance, because she was a constant and unparallel'd favourer of all good Ministers and People, being both tender-hearted and open-handed towards such who suffered under Prelatical pressures, and otherwise; and at her house, the most famous Ministers in all neighbour Countries, had hearty welcomes, with manifold sweet opportunities of service unto God, and of mutuall edification. Besides the frequent soul-helps which the Parishoners of the Congregation, to which she was related, had upon sabbath days for her sake; there were few Holy-days, ( daies of Vacancy from worldly busineses, ) in the year, wherein they had not one Sermon at the least, preached by some able Minister of Jesus Christ; amongst whom, Master Pierston, Master Ball, Master Herring, and Master Nicolls, ( before mentioned, who dyed at this good Ladies house, ) were of chief worth.

The Lady

Love to Christs Ministers.

Oh! what pathetical Blessings, with Exhortations, Encouragements, and Prayers, did this worthy man of God bestow upon this, and the Families, of other choice Friends, before he took his last farewell of his dear native Country! This Narrative would swell too big, if report should be made of generals only in reference unto them, who were naturally, nearly related unto unto

unto himself and his gracious Consort, besides such who were very dear unto them both, in the Spirit of Jesus Christ. Some who beheld the last greetings betwixt him and Reverend Master Ball of Whitmore, professe that they stick too deep in their breasts to be forgotten: For after they had spent together well nigh one day and one night in conference, they did (like Jonathan and David) frequently fall upon one another with mutual embracings, they parted and closed again a third and a fourth time, and when Master Herring was on horse-back, and Master Ball on foot, they went together, often shaking hands over the hedges; and upon the finall Salutation they comforted each other with this consideration, That though they should never see one another again on earth, yet they should meet in Heaven. And Master Herring was so deeply affected with those passages, that he said to some of his company, Two or three more such partings would hinder my journey beyond Seas; and yet adding withall, Master Ball hath conquered my passions. In his passage out of England, he with warm affections and heavenly benedictions, took his leave of his own and his Wives Sisters, with their Husbands, whose dwellings were in divers Countries. Those two eminently worthy Reverend Divines, Master Oliver Bowles of Sutton in Bedford-shire, and Master Barry of Cotsmore in Rutland, (who had married two of his Wives gracious Sisters) as they had Brotherly respect in his bosome, so they had special visits in his journey towards Holland. He was necessitated secretly to take shipping at Tarmouth, (whither his Brother-in-law Master Bowles did accompany him,) because the then Arch-bishop had given order, that no Scholar nor Minister should passe, without License from the Councel-table. Now whereas in his journey he had often prayed, that God would yet further clear his call into Holland, by two special Providences, viz. 1. That he might not be examined whether he was a Minister, (for he professed that he durst not deny his holy calling.) 2. That God would strengthen him at Sea, and grant him a comfortable voyage. He had answers of singular grace returned in both. He landed at Rotterdam September 20. 1637. and went aside from company so soon as with conveniency he could, to blesse the Lord for his safe arrival, and for all other favours vouchsafed unto him, who had never before been upon the Sea. The next day he went in a Waggon to Amsterdam, and was met on the way, by his dear Colleague, with the Elders and Deacons of the Church, and many of the English Merchants, who expressed much joy for his safe coming unto them. By them he was accompanied to the house of his good Friend, Master Whittaker, where he continued till his removal unto his own house, upon the coming over of his Family into Holland.

His Arrival in Holland.

His entertainment
there.

His first
Sermon.

His first Sermon was upon Psal. 24. 1. The earth is the Lords, &c. wherein he much insisted upon this consideration, That Gods Children still tread upon their Fathers ground, whithersoever his Providence doth remove them; and he preached with such satisfaction unto the hearts of his hearers, that thereby way was made for his future acceptance and service. The week following he was presented first unto the Honourable Lords, the Magistrates of Amsterdam, (who kindly accepted him, and gave him a gratuity towards the charges of his journey,) and afterwards to the Reverend Classis, where he was lovingly received into that Society, and thanks were given unto God for bringing him safe unto them. Whereas it was his custom to pray every night before he went into his bed, the night before a fasting day, (appointed by the States, to seek direction in their Counsels, and successe upon their Armies now before Breda) he spake thus to his Son who attended him, My heart is more fit for a thanksgiving day, and it would be so unto me, if God would bring over my dearest Christian (for that was his Wives name) thy tender Mother with her company. Come let us pray for him. And the next morning when he was ready to go to the Congregation, gation, he heard that his dear Wife was come unto Amsterdam, by which Providence his spirit being raised unto holy astonishment and admiration, he uttered these words; Oh what a God do I serve! How exceeding mercifull is my God unto me? What his prudent and pious conversation was, and what high estimation he had in Amsterdam, may be understood by the testimony of Master Rulice, written by his own hand, March 2. 1650. which is as followeth.

Return of prayers.

How acceptable and dear Master Herring, (my once Reverend Colleague) was to us all, Church, Classis, Magistrates, yea to all who knew him, it is publicly known. How faithfully he employed those excellent gifts, which God in a large measure bestowed upon him, in publique, in private, in his Sermons, in his Advices, in Consistory and Classes, &c. what need I mention, for all well know? For his private conversation, what sweetnesse and inoffensiveness, yea exemplary godlinesse did not he shew upon all occasions?

His sicknesse was lingering, his death like a sleep. As in his life, so in his sicknesse, and to his last breath; he shewed that his heart was truly stored with patience, faith, love to God and his People, heavenly-mindednesse, zeal to the honour of God, and with intire love to his Wife and Children.

But I must break off; I hope that Reverend man, who undertakes to publish the life and death of my most dear Brother and Colleague, will so set it out, that it may be a spur to provoke the living to follow such a worthy Pattern, and be a means of quickning many, not only to walk faithfully in the way to heaven, but also in that great function of the Ministry. Thus farre Master Rulice.

The strangenesse of Independent Brethren of England, when they came over into Holland, was a great trouble unto this reall Saint: and his constant Prayers were, that they might neither be deceived themselves, nor do any hurt unto the Government of the Reformed Churches. He often said, that those men had need of much caution, because the devil in the times of purest Reformation, would be a more subtil Angel of light than he was in Luthers dayes.

His fear of Independency.

When his Son returned into England, he warned him to take heed of joyning with any party, against the Presbyterial Government of the Reformed Churches; For I am sure (said he) it is the Government of Jesus Christ.

When the Scots first came into England, it was his constant and affectionate Prayer, that they might be instruments of much good, but of no blood nor division between the two Nations.

He was one of Gods special Remembrancers, in behalf of England, begging fervently that the Lords and Commons in Parliament, might be preserved from the two destructive Rocks of pride and self-interests. He poured out his soul before the Almighty, that he would appear for the Non-conformists cause in England, and set up the Presbyterial Government according to the Scripture Rules. He often professed himself to be no enemy unto the Persons of Bishops, but an opposite to their Pride and Prelaticall Rule. When news came unto him of the Battel at Edge-hill, thus he spake with tears: Oh Lord, wilt thou write Englands Reformation in red Letters of her own blood; yet preserve thine own People, and maintain thine own cause for Jesus Christs sake. He greatly bewailed the obstructing of Church reformation in England by them, who professed themselves zealous for Reformation, and it was no small offence unto him, to hear of the Letters which came from some Independents at London into Holland, wherein fallhoods were reported, to the reproach of some Presbyterians, his known godly Friends in England.

His death.

He was a true Nathaniel indeed, in whose spirit there was no guile; and therefore all falshood and unworthy juglings were an abomination to his heart. There was an holy harmoniousnesse in his whole conversation; his life was a well-spun thread, from the beginning to the end, and tended much to the honour of his Profession and particular Calling. Although he walked exactly with God, and maintained the comfort of constant peace with him, yet Satan was suffered to give him one furious assault the night before he dyed, as was perceived by those who were then with him; for rising upon his knees, with his hands lifted up, he spake these words: He is overcome, overcome, through the strength of my Lord and only Saviour Jesus, unto whom I am now going to keep a Sabbath in glory. And next morning, March 28. 1644. being the Sabbath day, (about the time when he was wont to go unto the Ministerial work in the publique Congregation,) and the sixty two year of his life, he was taken from his labours into rest, unto the spirits of just men made perfect in Heaven, where he shall sing Hallelujahs for evermore.

*The Life of Master John Dod, who died
Anno Christi 1645.*

His birth
and education.His first going to Cambridge.His conversion.

John Dod was born in Cheshire, at a town called Shotlidge, bordering on Wales, not far from Malpus. His Parents had a convenient estate, worth a hundred marks a year, which went to the eldest Brother. This John was the youngest of seventeen, and much beloved of his Parents. He was sent to School to West-Chester, and when he was about fourteen years old, he was disposed of to Jesus-Colledge in Cambridge, where (though he had little acquaintance, yet) the Lord prospering his studies, he was chosen first Scholar, and after Fellow; In that Colledge he there remained near sixteen years. The manner of his Conversion was thus.

The Steward, or Boucher of the Colledge, accused him to the Master, for the non-payment of a considerable sum of money due for one of his Pupils, which Master Dod had truly paid, but he forgot to set it down. Hereupon there was a vehement contest betwixt them about this businesse, and the vexation of mind that he should be accounted a defrauder, did so trouble Master Dod, that he fell into a Fever, and was dangerously sick; yet all this while he was but in a natural estate. For, though he had some good skill in the Theorick part of Divinity, yet he was without any application; and his affliction was this, that he should be blamed for that, which he from the Law and light of nature hated. All his sorrow as yet was but worldly sorrow; and as himself sayes, he neither did, nor could tell how to pray. At length the Lord put into his heart that Scripture, Rom. 7. The Law is spiritual, but I am carnal, and sold under sin, and presently his sins came upon him like armed men, and the tyde of his thoughts was turned, and he left musing how he was wronged, and seriously considered how he had offended God; and he betook himself to great humiliation, and earnestly besought the Lord for pardon and peace in Jesus Christ. Yet for some time he could find no comfort, but going on to seek the Lord, there follows after much humiliation, much consolation, and the Lord sealed to him, that his sins were washed away with the blood of Christ. Then did he desire his accuser to come to him, and told him, that though he had accounted him to be his great enemy, yet now he acknowledged him to be his good Friend, for that he was a means to bring him unto God. And afterwards it so fell out (by Gods good Providence) that it came to this mans remembrance that Master Dod had paid him the money, and he was very sorrowfull for the wrong which he had done him, and did him all the right he could for the healing of his name; and Master Dod said, that he had not a more faithfull Friend in all the Colledge, during his abode there, than this man proved.

Lord

When he was some years standing Master of Art, he was appointed to oppose in the Philosophy Act at the Commencement, which he did with great approbation, insomuch as it was desired, that he should dispute again the next Commencement, but that he avoided. When he preached his first Sermon in the University, he had bestowed much pains about it, binding himself to words and phrases; but in his Sermon he was at a Non-plus, whereupon he resolved afterwards never to pen his Sermon verbatim, but his usuall manner was to write only the Analisis of his Text, the proofs of Scripture for the Doctrines, with the Reasons and Uses, and so leaving the rest to meditation, in which course he never found defect. And whereas Doctor Folk, Doctor Chaderton, Doctor Whitaker, and some others had their frequent meeting to expound the Scriptures, and therein they chose the Epistle to the Hebrews, they were pleased from their loving respect to Master Dod to take in him amongst them.

Note.

While he continued Fellow of Jesus Colledge, by the importunity of He preached some godly people of Ely, he went weekly, and preached amongst them in a Lecture at that City, where the Lord gave a great blessing to his Ministry. His removal from Cambridge to Hanwel in Oxfordshire, was thus occasioned; Master Cope (afterwards Sir Anthony Cope) a man of eminent note, who was much wrought upon by Master Dods Ministry, sent a Letter to Doctor Chaderton, to provide him a Minister for Hanwel, which was then vacant. Doctor Chaderton moved Master Dod to go to the place, and after he had been a while, and preached severall Sermons, by the desire and consent of the people, and by the approbation of the neighbour Ministers who had heard him, he was settled as their Pastor. While he was at Hanwel he preached twice every Sabbath, Catechizing also in the afternoon, and kept a Lecture on the Wednesday constantly, and besides this, he was one of the five Ministers who held up the Lecture at Banbury. He gave himself much to Fasting and Prayer, and as his seed-time was painfull, so his Harvest was gainfull, hundreds of souls being converted by his Ministry. He was given to Hospitality, delighting therein, keeping a constant Table on the Sabbath, and on the Wednesdays Lecture; upon which dayes he had not under eight or twelve persons commonly dining with him, and he spent the time amongst them in spiritual exhortations and conference.

His removal to Hanwel.

His great pains there.

His frequency in fasting and prayer.

His hospitality.

He was about thirty years old when he came to Hanwel, and continued there above twenty years, where he had twelve Children by his dear Wife, formerly Anne Bound, Daughter-in-law to the worthy Servant of Jesus Christ, Master Greenham of Draughton near Cambridge, and Daughter to Doctor Bound, she was one that truly feared God, and after her decease (by the perswasion swasion of some Friends) he took to Wife Mistresse Cleiton, who then lived at Stratford Bowe; she also was a godly woman, and he was contracted to her by Master Egerton of Black-Fryers, and married by his ancient and loving Friend Doctor Gouge.

His second marriage.
The great successe of his Ministry

But to return back again to Hanwel; It pleased the Lord to give a great blessing to his Ministry in that place; yet he had much trouble from the envy of some Ministers that lived about him, who though they seldome preached themselves, yet they would not suffer that their people should go from them, and hence he was frequently questioned in the Bishops Courts. And besides this (though some of Hanwel were very courteous and kind, yet) there were some others who were glad to get from him what they could, and to keep from him what they could, thinking that that which he had was too much.

Upon a time Master Dod took a journey to Draughton, to bemoan himself to his Father-in-law Master Greenham, by reason of his crosses and hard usage, Master Greenham heard him what he could say, and when he had done answered him thus: Son, Son, when affliction lieth heavy, sin lieth light. This deserves the rather to be remembered, because Master Dod used often to blesse God for it, saying also, that if Master Greenham had bemoaned him, which he expected, he had done him hurt; and he forgot not this speech in his old age, but made excellent use of it for himself and others.

His deprivation.

He was suspended from his Ministry at Hanwel by Doctor Bridges, Bishop of Oxford. And (suspecting what would follow) the Sabbath before he went to the Visitation, he gave his Hearers a farewell Sermon out of that Text, I will smite the Shepherd, and the Sheep shall be scattered; The people did attend unto him with sad countenances, and weeping eyes. Being thus driven from Hanwel, he preached at Fenny-Compton in Warwickshire, where he had but small means, but he was desirous to be doing good. From thence he had a fair call unto Cannons-Ashby in Northamptonshire, where he lived quietly divers years, preached over the whole Prophecie of Daniel, with some other Scriptures, having much kindnesse from Sir Erasmus Dryden, (in whom there was a rare Mixture of Piety and Learning) and good affection from Master Cope. He was silenced from preaching at Ashby, upon a complaint made against him by Bishop Neal, to King James, who commanded Arch-Bishop Abbot to silence him. Then he ceased for some time to preach publicly, yet in regard of his heavenly gift in conference, he might have been said daily to preach privately; He was in his Element when he was discoursing of heavenly things. And God in goodnesse so ordered it, that when he was restrained from publique preaching, yet himself conceived, that at that time his life was no lesse profitable, than it had been in former times.

His preaching at Fenny-Compton.

His removal to Cannons-Ashby. He is again silenced.

He had an excellent gift in conference.

He had much employment in comforting such as were wounded in their spirits, being sent for, not only nigh at hand, but also into remote Countries.

His comforting of afflicted consciences.

There was a Gentlewoman who had a great worldly estate, and a loving Husband, but she was so sadly assaulted with Tentations, that she often attempted to make away her self. Master Dod was sent for to come to her, and the Lord so blessed his Counsels, Exhortations, and Prayers, that she did not only recover out of her anguish of spirit, but she was afterwards taken notice of for her singular Piety; and the Lord so ordered, that this affliction was not only the means of her Conversion, but also of her Husbands, so that both of them were a great mercy in the Countrey where they lived, promoting Religion according to their power, entertaining and cherishing godly people: She lived divers years quieted in her heart, and was rich in good works; and when she lay on her death-bed, Master Dod was sent for to her again, who spake of heaven, and to fit her for that glory; she told him, that she felt the comforts of God, and that she could as hardly at that time forbear to be unspeakable.

bear singing, as formerly in child-bearing she could forbear crying, and shortly after she died.

There was a Gentleman related to a noble Family, so perplexed in his mind, that he hath been known in hard frosts to go barefooted, that the pain of his feet might divert his thoughts. Master Dod was sent for to him, who was his spiritual Physician to heal him. Note.

It would belong to insist on all particulars of this nature, the Lord having made him a happy Instrument for the good of many.

When he had spent some years in this kind of service, by the care and industry of Master Richard Knightley of Preston (a worthy Patriot,) after the death of King James, his liberty was procured for preaching again publicly, and then he was settled at Fausley, where he preached twice every Lords day. There he went over the Gospel of John, the Epistle to the Colossians, and other Scriptures. He is placed at Fausley.

He was much given to Hospitality at Fausley, as he had formerly been at Hanwel, so that there was scarce any Sabbath in the year, in which he did not dine both poor and rich, commonly three or four poor persons, besides those that came from other places to hear him. He had so large an heart, that upon occasion, he hath given to some three shillings, to some ten shillings, to some twenty shillings; and when the poor came to buy butter or cheese, he would command his maid to take no money of them. His hospitality. His charity.

At Fausley he had quietnesse from the Courts, as also at Asbby; for in neither of those places was there any Church-wardens. He was beholding at Fausley, to the Right Worshipfull Family of the Knightleys, were his bones were laid.

He used to bear crosses with much patience and meeknesse, being wont to say, that Sanctified afflictions were great promotions, quoting that of the Apostle Peter, 1 Pet. i. 7. Triumphantia crucis, &c. is much more precious than gold, which he conceived to signifie the affliction that tryeth faith, and that the word should be rendred exploratorium, rather than exploratio. The benefits of afflictions.

He alwaies expected troubles, and prepared himself for them, and put this difference between the affliction, for which we are provided and others, that the one are but blows on the Harnesse, but the other are blows on the flesh. Troubles to be expected

Upon a time when an affliction was upon him, which went to his very heart, and in the expectation whereof he wept; yet when he saw that it was the Will of God that it should be so, he said to one whom he loved, I will go and blesse God, for I believe this shall be for my good.

He gave himself much to Fasting and Prayer, and when he fasted, his custom was to abstain from the dinner of the day before, to the Supper of the day after. His diseases till he was above threescore, were only Feavers, and these for the most part high and violent. In the sixty third year of his age, he had a Feaver in which there was small hope of life. Doctor Oxenbridge was his Physician, who waiting for the breathing out of the disease by sweating, (in which at last he had his desire) he came to Master Dod, and in the presence of divers, said unto him, Now I have hope of your recovery: To which Master Dod answered, You think to comfort me by this; but you make my heart sad; It is as if you should tell one who had been sore weather-beaten on the sea, and conceiving he was arrived at the Haven, where his soul longed to be, that he must come back again to be tossed with new winds and waves. In his greatest health and prosperity, he would speak how he desired to be dissolved. Upon a time, a Gentleman blamed him for it, saying, he liked not servants who would have their wages before they had done their work; but he seemed to be constant in this desire, alledging these reasons amongst others, that God had given him a settled assurance of Heaven, and a sight of the excellency of Heaven, and that the earth was but a prison, and Heaven the Palace, and there was perfect holinesse and happinesse. His frequency in Fasting, and Prayer. His diseases. His desire of death. The reason of his desire.

Throgmorton.

His weaned-ness from the world.

He took all occasions to do good ; when he was in company, by godly speeches, seasoning those which came to him, that unlesse it were their own fault, they might be the better for him. Being invited to a great feast where there were sundry Gentlemen, and some of them began to swear, he stopt them by discoursing of the greatnesse of that sin ; and that he might not burden their Memories, he quoted three Chapters, every one was the first : as the first of Zachary, the first of Matthew, and the first of James, and he opened those Scriptures in such sort that they were all hushed, and did not again offend in that kind while he was present amongst them.

The word of God was his great delight, his meditation was of it in the night, and his discourse in the day. When those that were with him were speaking of earthly things, he would find out some way to bring in heavenly. When he could not sleep in the night, he would say, that the meditation of the Word was sweeter to him than sleep. When he had preached twice on the Sabbath, and was aweary, yet to those that came to him, he would go on afresh in holy Discourses ; and the comforts which he found in his soul, made him sometimes forget his body, that he hath been speaking till he was ready to faint.

His eminency was in frequency, aptnesse, fresnesse, and largenesse of godly discourse ; in which respect it may be said of him, that in the Countrey where he lived, none were known who therein were equal to him. But he was Micans inter omnes, velut inter ignes luna minores.

He was very mercifull himself, and to move Parents that were rich to mercy, he would say thus, You are caring and contriving to lay up for your children, but lay up for your selves a good foundation against the time to come, being rich in good works ; you will lay up treasure in the earth, which is an unsafe place ; lay up treasures in Heaven, that is the sure and safe place.

He loved and honoured those that feared God, though in point of Subscription and Ceremonies they were not of his judgment ; and as he sowed, so he reaped. He was full of love of himself, and greatly beloved of others.

Doctor Preston, whom good men loved for his excellent Piety and Learning, was a faithfull friend of Master Dods, and often entertained him at his chamber, and esteemed much of him for his spiritualnesse in conference and conversation, and for his ability to open Scripture, and to comfort troubled spirits. When the Doctors Consumption was upon him, which put an end to his life, he came to Master Richard Knightsleys at Preston in Northamptonshire, which was but a mile from Fausley, where Master Dod had his abode, and desired him to speak to him of death and heaven, and heard him with patience and thankfulness. Master Dod prayed by him when he lay a dying, and preached his Funeral Sermon.

Also Master Throgmorton, a pious and painfull Preacher of the Word ; an approved good man, dying the same year of a Consumption, came to Ashey not far from Fausley, to have the help of Master Dods comforts and counsels. He was oppressed with Melancholy, and a little before he gave up his soul to Christ, he asked Master Dod, What will ye say of him that is going out of the world, and can find no comfort ? To whom he answered ; What will you say of our Saviour Christ, who when he was going out of the world found no comfort, but cryed out, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me ? This speech refreshed Master Throgmorton, and within a little space of time after this, he went to his heavenly inheritance.

Master Dod, as he was of a weaned disposition from the world himself, so he laboured to wean others. He put this difference between rich Christians and poor, that for poor Christians their Father kept the purse, but the rich Christians keep the purse in their own hands. But it might oftner fall out, and did ; therefore the purse was better in the Fathers hand than in the Christians. He was wont to compare wicked men to waves of the Sea, those which which were of a great estate, were great waves; those which were of small estate, were small waves, but all were restless as waves. What wicked men are like.

To a Friend of his that was raised from a meaner estate to wordly greatness, he sent word, that this was but as if he should go out of a Boat into a Barge or Ship; but there ought to be a serious and godly remembrance, that while we are in this world, we are upon the Sea.

He often repeated this, that nothing could hurt us but our own sins; and they should not hurt us, if we truly repented of them; and nothing could do us good but Gods favour, and that we should be sure of, if we unfeignedly sought it. Speaking of Dauids penning the 51 Psalm, after his Murther and Adultery, he put this glosse upon it, That hearty and true repentance shall have cause to praise the Lord for his pardoning mercy. Note.

He said, Afflictions were Gods Potions, which we might sweeten by Faith and faithfull Prayer, but we for the most part made them bitter, putting into Gods Cup the ill ingredients of our own impatience and unbelief. He gave this reason why many of Gods people lived uncomfortably, for that they shut their ear against what God said, where they should open it; and they opened their ear to what their Carnal reason, and Satan, and the world said, where they should shut it. But (said he) the Psalmist was wiser, Psal. 85. 8. He would hear none of them all; I will heare what the Lord God will speak. Afflictions. Gods potions.

His preaching was searching; and when some did suppose that he had Informers and Spies; because he came so close to them, he answered; that the Word of God was searching, and that if he was shut up in a dark Vault, where none could come at him, yet allow him but a Bible and a Candle, and he should preach as he did. The power of his Ministry.

He had an excellent gift in similitudes, which did flow freely and frequently from him, as all those knew, who either heard him preach publicly, or discourse privately. He called death, the friend of grace, though it were the enemy of nature; and whereas the Word, and Sacraments, and Prayer, do but weaken sin, death kills it. Speaking of Prayer; he said, a man was never in a hard condition, unlesse he had a hard heart, and could not pray. His excellency for similitudes. Benefits of death. Benefit of Prayer.

Having preached out of that Text, O woman, great is thy Faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt; he invited some women to dinner, and told them it was a usuall saying, Let a woman have her will, and then she would be quiet. Now the way for a woman to have her will, is to have a strong Faith, and to pray as that woman in the Gospel did. Benefit of Faith.

Upon a time when he had preached long, so that it was somewhat late before he went to dinner, he said, you shall have some Gentlemen will follow hounds from seven in the morning, till four or five in the afternoon, because they love the cry of dogs, which to me was unpleasant hearing; so if we love the Word, we should be content though the Minister stood above his hour. And he added, methinks it is much better to hear a Minister preach, than a Kennell of hounds to bark. Speaking of Recreation, he said, he marvelled what the Vocation of many was, who were so eager for Recreation. And if we should come into a house, and see many Physick-boxes and Glasses, we would conclude some body is sick; so when we see Hounds, and Hawks, and Cards, and Dice, we may fear that there is some sick soul in that Family. We should not be weary of hearing.

He told some Friends, that if he were to passe sentence who was a rich man, he would not look into his purse or Chest to see how much gold he had laid up, but look into his heart what promises were treasured up there. For we count him rich that is rich in bonds, and the pleading of the Promises in Prayer, is suing of the bonds. Promises great riches.

Speak

His humility. Speaking to a Minister who was to go to a place where there was but small means, he told him, that his care should be to preach, and do God service, and then God would provide for him. When he preached at Fausley, and was much resorted unto, as it was with him in other places, he told a godly man of his acquaintance, that if the Countrey knew so much by him, as he knew by himself, they would not have him in so much admiration.

Love better then Law. Speaking about going to Law, his Opinion was, that it was better to buy Love then Law. For one might have a great deal of love for a little, whereas he could have but a little Law for a great deal. He would frequently say, That was well, which ended everlastingly well; and that was ill, which ended everlastingly ill: And that a man was never undone till he was in hell.

The benefit of turning to God betimes. This was a speech which he often used, that if it were Lawfull so envy any, he would envy those that turned to God in youth, whereby they escaped much sin and sorrow, and were like unto Jacob, that stole the blessing betimes.

A special Providence. This was a remarkable passage of Providence, that upon a time when it was late at night, it came into his mind, that he must see a Friend of his, some two Miles off; he had businesse, and would have put it off, but his thoughts were restless; whereupon he went, and when he came to the place, all the Family were in bed, but only his Friend, who was, esteemed truly godly, but at that time was overwhelmed with Tentations; the occasion whereof was, some cruelty offered to his Children. Master Dod knew nothing, either of the Tentation or occasion of it: But knocking at the door, his Friend opened the door to him, to whom he said, I am come to you, I know not why my self, but I was restless in my spirit untill I had done it. To whom his Friend answered, You know not why you came, but God knew why he sent you; and withall, pulled out a halter, wherewith he had intended self-murder at that time, which by Gods goodnesse, was by this means prevented.

Speaking of losing for Christ, he testified from his own experience, that for the losse of one Carnal Brother, he had two hundred spiritual Brethren.

His Faith. Before he was married, he could not maintain himself, and thereupon he was thinking, how he should maintain a Wife and Children, his living not being great; but looking out of his study window, he saw a Hen and Chickens scratching for their living, and he considered thus with himself, The Hen did but live before, and had nothing to spare, and now she hath as much with that great Family.

When he saw a Christian to look sad, he would use that speech which Johndab did to Amnon, Art not thou a Kings Son? He would say to those that complained of losses and Crosses, that which Eliphaz did to Job, Do the consolations of God seem small to you? God hath taken away your children, your goods, but he hath not taken away himself, nor Christ, nor his Spirit, nor Heaven, nor eternal life.

How afflictions may be lessened. He used to instruct Christians how they should never have a great affliction, nor long, and that was, by looking upon things which were not seen, which are eternal, 2 Cor. 4. 17, 18. What can be great to him that counts the world nothing? And what can be long to him that thinks his life but a span-long?

Meeknesse. To perswade them that are Christians, not to return Railing for Railing, he would say; that if a dog bark at a sheep, a sheep will not bark at a dog.

Comfort in dangers. In these times of War, at the first beginning of them, when many well-affected people came to him, being affrighted with the Caviliers, he encouraged them, using this speech, that if a house were full of rods, what need the Child fear, when none of them could move without their Fathers hand; and the Lord was a loving Father, state and life, and all was in his disposing. When afterwards the Soldiers came to his house, and threatened to knock him on the head, he answered with confidence, that if they did, they should send him to Heaven, where he longed to be, but they could do nothing except God gave leave. They broke open his Chests and Cupboards, and plundered him of his goods; but he said to a Friend of his, that he would not do them that honour to say they had taken ought from him, but it was the Lord, alledging that of Job, who when he was spoiled by the Chaldeans and the Sabians, yet he did not so much as name the Instruments, but, The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the Name of the Lord.

His Faith

At length they came to him, when through weaknesse he was unable not only to stirre out of his chamber, but also out of his bed, they cut the Curtains of his bed, and pulled away the Pillowbeers from under his head, asking him whether he could speak Latine, in all which losses, which were great, he never uttered one word of impatience. In his sicknesse, when extream pain was upon him, as soon as the fit was over, he would say to his maid-servant, that attended him, O think well of God for it, for it is most justly and wisely done, whatsoever he sendeth or doth. When his servants came to visit him in the morning, he would say, have ye been with God to blesse him for your sleep this night? He might have made your bed your grave.

Soldiers cruelty.

His patience.

He would often say in his sicknesse, I am not afraid to look death in the face; I can say, death, where is thy sting? Death cannot hurt me. He spake how death was a sweet sleep to a Christian, adding, that if Parents should tell little children, who had played all the day, that they must go to bed, they would be ready to cry; but a labouring man is glad when night comes, that he might go to rest. So wicked men, death is unwelcome unto them; but a Child of God, who hath laboured and suffered, is glad when death cometh, that he may rest from his labours.

Death not feared.

When he had been long speaking to those who came to him, and used to ask him questions, and hath been perswaded to spare himself, he would say, hear but this one thing more, it may be I shall never speak to you again; but if it should be so, Blessed is the servant whom his Lord when he cometh shall find so doing. Hearken to a few words more; God hath heard all the words we have spoken, and considered with what hearts and affections we have spoken them.

He used to compare rebukes uttered in passion to scalding potions, which the Patient could not take down. And his opinion was, that if we would do good unto others, we should labour for meeknesse of wisdom, whereby we shall be enabled to use soft words and hard arguments.

Passionate rebukes unprofitable.

He allowed to Husbands and Wives only one contention; which was this, who should love one another best; and advised them, that when either of them were in passion, they should not answer passions with passions, but with compassions.

What contention should be amongst married persons His manner of preaching.

He was very plain and familiar both in preaching and conference, yet very spiritual, and performed all with much gravity.

The chief things he sought God for, in his frequent secret fastings and prayers, (as himself said) were the knowledge of the Scriptures, and a blessing upon his Ministry, in both which God answered him abundantly.

The Scope of his Prayers.

As for the Scriptures, God had so enlightened him, that he was able to give account of the drift and scope of the Spirit of God in the greatest part of them, with great clearnesse, and to open them in such sort as proved very effectual, for the bringing of Scripture-light into simple mens understandings, who were not able to reach the obscure and scholastick interpretations of many.

His Exposition of Scripture.

He

His manner was to compare Scripture with Scripture, seldom naming the dissenters; and put sparingly different readings, but making out the truth positively, or by necessary consequence.

His custom
in preaching

In preaching, he usually took some portion of Scripture in order before him, opening a verse or two, or more at a time, first clearing the drift and connection, then giving the sense and interpretation briefly, but very plainly, not leaving the text untill he had made it plain to the meanest capacity; then raising those Doctrines that were most agreeable to the mind and meaning of the Spirit of God in that text, clearing and exemplifying his points excellently out of the Word, opening his proofs, (not multiplying particulars for oppressing memory,) not dwelling so long as to make all truth run through a few texts. He spake most largely and very home in application, mightily convincing and diving into mens hearts and consciences, and leaving them little or nothing to object against it.

What
preaching is unprofitable.

He took great care to speak to the meanest capacity, and to feed the Lambs, saying, he must stoop to the lowest capacity, and if he could reach them, others might help themselves. He could not endure that Ministers should use hard and unusuall English. He said, that most Ministers in England usually shoot over the heads of their hearers.

He did not strive to speak all that might be said to a point, nor to shew variety, or please curiosity, but to speak to the heart. He would say, that there were many tricks and devices that some men used in preaching, but they seldom did good. The pure Gospel, and that preaching which the world counts foolishnesse, was that that works most kindly.

True humiliation.

He was very Evangelicall, striving first to make men see their lost condition clearly, and to be convinced of it, saying, Sense of misery was a good step to the remedy. And then largely, and excellently opening the Promises, and the grace of God in Christ according to the Gospel, looking at that as the most effectual preaching. Some (saies he) labour still to keep men under terrors, and load them with threatnings, &c. lest they should not be humbled enough; but the Gospel works true humiliation, not the Law; it arises from sense of sin, and misery joyned with hope of mercy. The damned have terror and sense of misery enough, but that did not humble them.

His preaching by signes

He desired to speak distinctly, not giving the childrens bread to dogs, but to discover hypocrisie, and sincerity by lively characters and signes, but yet with great tenderesse to Babes in Christ, striving to discover a Babe from an Hypocrite.

He was excellent for practical Divinity and living by Faith, as to spirituals and temporals, and self-denial; And very consolatory, rendring Religion the most sweet and comfortable life, notwithstanding sufferings.

He used to presse much after the seeking of spiritual illumination, in hearing and reading, &c. and divine assistance in religious duties, not contenting our selves with the use of parts and accomplishments, or grace received, but to look higher, saying, David that could preach excellently, and had Nathan and Gad the Prophets also to preach, yet cryes out for teaching; thereby shewing, that all that teaching would not do, unlesse God teach also. And David cryes, Open mine eyes; he had the light without, but he must have light within, viz. sight, else he could not see the wonders of the Law, though he had the Law.

Christians should be cheerfull.

He used to presse much to meeknesse, and a sweet disposition to affability, charity and cheerfulness, not to be rigid, sour, tart, nor sad, lest the world should think that we served an hard Master.

Being

Being above eighty years old, his pains were very great, yet not painfull to him. He preached almost all day long on the Lords day, yet said, it was no great matter to pay money when one had it, all the labour was to get it. He opened a Chapter, and prayed in his Family, after preached twice in publique, and in the interim discoursed all dinner while, but eat very little. He brought in many with him to dinner, besides his four or six constant Widows; if his Wife began to doubt of her provision at sight of so many, he would say, Better want meat than good company, but there is something in the house, though cold. This is not a day to feast the bodies but souls. At first sitting down, he would bid them help themselves and one another, and see that none want. Let me (said he) bid you but once, for I would not speak a vain word to day. After both Sermons, the house would be filled; and he being sate in his chair, used to say, if any have a good question, or a hard place of Scripture to open, let them say on; and when he was faint, he would call for a small glasse of Wine and Beer mixt, and then to it a gain till night.

His indefatigable-
ness.

He was excellent in preaching occasionally from the creatures, as he walk- ed or rode.

The benefit of plain preaching.

His Ministry was so spiritual, and yet so plain, that poor simple people that never knew what Religion meant, when they had gone to hear him, could not choose but talk of his Sermon. It mightily affected poor creatures to hear the Mysteries of God, (by his excellent skill that way) brought down to their own language and dialect.

He was so holy and spiritual both in life and doctrine, that he silenced even desperate and devillish opposers of Religion. It was a discredit for any to speak evil of him, because it must needs expresse much malice, and all men most generally (in his latter time at least) honoured him.

His holy life.

He was very successfull in making peace, though between desperate and almost implacable Adversaries, and some of them wicked, mightily convincing them with Gospel-arguments, to the overcoming and quieting of their spirits.

His peacemaking.

He would answer any questions propounded, that were but fit for a Di- vine to speak to; Yet shewing his approbation or dislike of the question ac- cording to the honesty and spiritualnesse, or curiosity and lightnesse of it.

His acute-
nesse.

When mean inferiour People came to speak with him, if he was walking in the Church, where he used most to study, that he might have room to walk in; (being troubled with the stone) or elsewhere; If he thought them bashfull, he would meet them, and say, Would you speak with me? And when he found them unable to state their question, he would help them out with it, taking care to find the sore: But would answer and deal so com- passionately and tenderly, as not to discourage the poorest soul from coming again to him.

His humil-
ty.

If any questioned him about Ceremonies, about which many then suffered, he was very wary in dealing, (not shy in speaking his judgment) but care- full of advising them according to their strength. He would bid them take heed of being led meerly by the imitation of any body, or other mens ar- guments, but look to their Scripture-light, and see what arguments, they had to bear them out; And whether they could suffer alone in that case if they should survive their patterns. He would not have them make a bu- sinesse about lesser things, and then fall off from what they began to pro- fesse.

His modesty.

Being to advise a young man in his choice of a yoke-fellow, he bad him look principally after Godlinesse. Men talk of a portion, grace is the best portion. The wise woman buildeth up the house, viz. The godly, &c. Not the rich.

What Wife should be chosen.

Some use to say, There is a portion and civility, and we will hope for grace; But, saith he, rather make sure grace, and hope for riches; There's far greater reason for it. For Godliness hath the Promises, riches hath none. A Sonne or Daughter of God shall be provided for.

How we may always have comfort.

— He would say, he that could answer two questions well, might have comfort in any place or condition, viz. Who am I? and what do I here? Am I a Child of God? And am I in my calling or way? He hath given his Angels charge to keep thee in all thy waies.

What will make us willing to suffer.

And that the knowledge of two things would make one willing to suffer or die, viz. What Heaven is; And that it's mine; I (said one) if a man were sure. To whom he answered, Truly Assurance is to be had, and what have we been doing all this while?

Assurance to be laboured for.

He used to say, they that hope to go to Heaven (as most do) and had not good evidence for it, were like a man, that passing by a great house and estate, would say, This is mine; but being bid to shew his title, would say, some body must have it, and why not I? Such is most mens title for Heaven.

Thankfulness, in afflictions. Prayer.

His Tentation, and Victory.

During the time of his last sickness, it pleased the Lord to try him by grievous pains, most bitter and sharp, of the Strangury; but when he had any intermissions, he was breathing out such speeches, as tended to the praise of God, and to the edification of those that attended him. He slept little all the night or day, long before his death, in all which time he employed his attendants which were about him, to read the Scriptures, which he expounded to them. And when his strength was spent with speaking, he retired himself to Prayer and Meditation. When he felt his paines returning, he would intreat those that were about him, to pray to God for him, either to give him deliverance or patience. His Tentations a little before his death, and his wrestlings with Satan were great; so were his Victories. He spake to one that did watch with him all night, about two of the Clock in the morning, that he had been wrestling with Satan all that night, who accused him that he neither preached, nor prayed, nor performed any duty as he should have done, for manner or for end, but he said, I have answered him from the example of the Prodigal and the Publican.

His faith, & patience.

His Faith and Patience were encreased, and perfected by his sufferings. He longed and thirsted to be with Christ, which words he often uttered. One of his last speeches was this, with his eyes and hands lifted up to Heaven, he sighed, and said, I desire to be dissolved and to be with Christ. His pains left him not an hour before his death, his speech also then leaving him; He could not eat nor drink two dayes before his death. And so quietly and patiently he ended his life, making a happy change, being fourscore and sixteen years old, Anno Christi, 1645.

His death.

THE

*The Life of Master Robert Balsom, who died
Anno Christi 1647.*

Robert Balsom was born at Shipton Montague, in the County of Somerset. Having spent some years in New-in-hall in Oxford, upon his removall thence, he was entertained by Master Bernard of Batcomb, in the aforesaid County, to teach School, and preach sometimes as his Assistant; under whom he greatly improved his abilities for preaching. Upon the death of Master Bernard, preaching occasionally at a Neighbour Village called Stoke, among a His call to company of poor untaught people, one that lived thereabouts, told him, that Stoke. if such a Minister should come and preach among that people, where there was so small encouragement, he should think that God had a great work to do upon them. Hereupon Master Balsom promised to be their Minister, where he enjoyed about fourty pounds a year. The successe of his Ministry there, The great was very great, insomuch that he hath been heard say, that there were but few successe of Sermons that he preached there, but he had intelligence that some one or other his Ministry. were converted by them.

The troubles growing in those parts, by reason of our Civil Warres, after one or two years abode there, he was forced for his own safety, to betake himself to Warder-Castle in Wiltshire, where he had not continued long, but the Castle was besieged by the Kings party. Upon the news of their approach, he was minded to have gone for London, but being desired by Colonel Ludlow, the Governour of that Castle, he remained there during the siege. A little before the Castle was delivered up, as they were in Treaty about the surrender of it, Master Balsom walking upon the Roof of the Castle, heard three Souldiers say, That they had sworn upon the Bible, to take away the life of one in the Castle. He asked one of them, Who is that ye mean? Is it our Minister? They replied, Yes; for he is a Witch: which they affirmed upon this ground, because the Castle had divers times been very strangely Relieved with provision. As at one time with a herd of Swine coming down to the gates, which they took in; and at another time by some Deer, Special providences. and Conies, the siege then being not close, but straightning them at a distance. He asked them, what was their names? They told him, they were the Three Merry Boyes: He replied, your names are very suitable to the times. And so after some farther discourse, parted with them.

After the surrender of the Castle, and the enemies entry, they presently seized on Master Balsom, and clapt him up in a close Low Room. About twelve a Clock at night, the key of the Room was given to the three Souldiers that had sworn his death: They having received the key, presently entred the room where he was with another Souldier, who was hanged the next morning:

No sooner came they into the Room, but they put off their hats, and standing still lookt on him at a distance: saying nothing to him. He suspecting them to be the men that had sworn to take away his life, spake to them thus; Friends, what is your business? are not ye the men that have sworn to take away my life? They answered to this purpose, We have taken a wicked oath, God forgive us, but we will do you no hurt. He desired them to come near unto him, but they stood trembling, perswaded him to make an escape, voluntarily offering him their best assistance. He answered, now I suspect you, you are ashamed to take away my life, now I am in your hands, but would perswade me to a flight, that you might with the more colour kill me in the pursuit. They assuring him, they intended really the setting of him at liberty; He asked what they thought would become of them? They answered, they would go along with him. He replied, That you shall not do; for if I be taken again, I shall be but in the same case I am; but if you be taken, it will cost you your lives. And therefore I will rather suffer the utmost that God shall suffer them to inflict upon me, then hazard the lives of those that have shewed themselves so friendly to me.

Upon this, they had him forth into the fresh air, and in the mean time made clean his room, and so left him. The next morning, a Council of War was call'd, and as they were debating to put him to death, a Captain of the Council stood up, and said, I will have no hand in the blood of this man, so went out of the Room, and no farther progress was made as concerning him. Afterwards they carried him in a Cart to Salisbury; As he was carried through the town to the Prison, the people of the town entertained him with great scorn and contempt; and that night another Council of War was called, and pickt for the purpose, by which he was condemned to be hang'd. Hereupon the High Sheriff of the County went unto him into the Prison, and after much ill language that he used towards him, he told him that he was come to tell him, that he must prepare himself to die, for he was condemned by the Council of War, to be hang'd the next morning at six a Clock; but withall, assured him, that if he would ask pardon of the King for his offence, and serve his Majesty for the future, as he had formerly served against him, he should both save his life, and have what preferment he could reasonably desire. He answered, for me to ask pardon where I am not conscious of an offence, were but the part of a fool; and to betray my conscience in hope of preferment, were but the part of a Knave; and if I had neither hope of Heaven, nor fear of Hell, I had rather dye an honest man, then live a fool or a knave.

The next morning he rose about five a Clock, being something troubled that he had slept so long: About six a Clock the officers came into the room to bring him forth to execution. While he was preparing to go with them, he heard a Post ride in, asking hastily, Is the Prisoner yet alive? who brought with him a Reprieve from Sir Ralph Hopton, to whom he was carried to Winchester. As he came to the gates of the town, Sir William Ogle the Governour met him, and told him, that he would feed him with bread and water for two or three dayes, and then hang him. Then he was brought to Sir Ralph Hopton, who spake to him thus; Master Balsom, I little thought one day that you should have been my Prisoner, and I cannot but wonder, that such men as you should be engaged in a rebellion against the King. To whom he replied, Sir, I cannot but wonder, that such men as you should call this rebellion. Sir Ralph desired him to give him an account of the grounds, upon which he and his party proceeded, promising him, that he should not suffer for any thing that he spake to him. After about half an hours discourse, he committed him to his own Marshall with this charge, Keep this man safe, but use him well. The Marshall received him, and after some little rough entertainment, upon his entrance into his house, he at length used him with great seeming respect. Long he had not been there, but a Gentlewoman came to him with a bottle of Sack, urging him to preach a Recantation Sermon the next morning before the the Lords, promising that if he would so do, the King would make him a Doctor. He is urged to recant.

He replied, Sure you do but mock me; for should I preach upon such short warning, the Lords would never hear such extempore stuff; but if you be in good earnest and would make me a Doctor indeed, then let me have the same Law ye use to give your Doctors, viz. a quarter of a years time to make a Sermon, and by that time you may know more of my mind.

The next morning an Order was brought for the conveying of him to Oxford, His remove to Oxford.
whither he was accordingly carried. He lighted first at the Blew-bore, whither they brought a company of the Queens followers, who with much fury oftentimes swore, that he should not go alive out of the room. But the Musqueteers, who were set as a guard upon him, desired them to be quiet, telling them that he was their Prisoner, and should not suffer there, but they would suffer with him. Thence he was conveyed to the Castle, where after two or three dayes abode, he enjoyed the same liberty with other Prisoners, And a while after, he set up an Exposition Lecture in the prison twice a day: To which, not only the Prisoners, and some of the Soulders, but divers Courtiers, and many out of the Town often came. Being prohibited once or twice to go on in this Exercise, he answered, if ye are weary of me, I am not willing to trouble you any longer; ye may turn me out of your doors when you will; but while I have a tongue to speak, and people to speak to, I will not hold my peace.

After some moneths of imprisonment, he was released by exchange. As His Release he was departing thence, some Courtiers and others, that had formerly shewed him some favour, perswaded him to close with their party, and to stay with them. He utterly refusing, divers of them accompanied him out of town; And as they were parting, one of them said; Sir, If any of us should fall into your hands, we should desire no better entertainment then you have had amongst us. He replied, Gentlemen, I could wish that ten thousand of you might fall into our hands within this moneth, that you might see how kindly we would deal with you. Thence he was sent for by the Lord Generall Effex to be Chaplain in his Army, with whom he continued during his command.

Then he went to Barwick; where he was received with great affection of the People, and saw in a short time great successe of his labours in the Ministry. During his abode there, two things were very remarkable: One, whereas there was a Child that had been strangely visited with such a weakness, as neither Physicians or Divines could guesse at the cause, or find out the cure; Master Balsom moved some Christians there, to seek God with him, by Fasting and Prayer, which accordingly they did, and obtained a suddain and extraordinary answer. For as the Mother of the Child came home from the Exercise, her Child met her, and told her, she was very well, who before had kept her bed of a long time. His going to Barwick.

The other thing remarkable was this; A Scottish Lord, by name, the Lord of Granson, took up his habitation for a time in Barwick, and brought with him his Family. In which, amongst others, was the Steward of his house, formerly reputed a godly man, who was very much afflicted in mind: Master Balsom came to visit him, and administred some comfort to him for that time. But two or three daies after, he being sorely afflicted again, Master Balsom was sent for, who finding him very much weakened and worn out by the violence of temptation, began to speak comfortably to him. But perceiving that no words of comfort would fasten on him, he whispered to him in his ear to this purpose, I doubt there is something within, that you should do well to discover. Whereupon immediately the mans tongue swelled out of his mouth, insomuch that he was not able to speak. Master Balsom continued speaking to him, till at length, to the astonishment of those in the room, being many, and some of them persons of quality, a shrill voice was heard, as from out of his throat (having not any use of his tongue) to this purpose:

A special Providence.

Possession. Satan.

What

Possession. What dost thou talking to him of Promises, and free grace? He is mine. Master Balsom apprehending it to be the voice of the Devil, replied:

Balsom. No Satan, thou dost not know any man to be thine while there is life in him.

Satan. But this is a notorious wicked wretch, and therefore is mine.

Balsom. The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin.

Satan. If God would let me loose upon you, I should find enough in the best of you, to make you all mine.

Balsom. But thou art bound Satan. And so turning himself to the people, with a smiling countenance; he said, What a gracious God have we, that suffers not Satan to have his will upon us?

Satan. Then the Devil began to curse and swear, and blaspheme the Trinity in a most fearfull and horrible manner.

Balsom. The Lord rebuke thee.

Satan. But this man is mine, for he hath given himself to me; and sealed it with his blood.

Balsom. I do not believe that the father of lies speaketh truth, and I do believe, how confident soever thou art, that thou wilt lose thy hold before to morrow morning.

Satan. The Devil continued to curse and swear, further saying, How canst thou endure to hear thy God blasphemed? I will never give over blaspheming so long as thou stayest in the room.

Balsom. I will pray for him.

Satan. Wilt thou pray for a man that is damned?

Balsom. I will go home and pray for him, and get all the force I can in the town to joyn with me. After this, there being no more voice heard, Master Balsom went home about Eleven a Clock at night, where he found in his house divers Christians, which he intended to have sent for, waiting for him; and upon the sight of them, he spake to them to this purpose: Friends, I wonder at the providence of God, in bringing you hither at this time, for otherwise I must have sent for you. And so declaring to them what had hapned to the afflicted man, he desired them to spend some part of the night with him, in seeking God for him, which accordingly they did. The next morning Master Balsom going to visit him again, found him in a comfortable condition; and asking of him, how he did? He answered, Through the goodnesse of God, I have overcome, and am now as full of comfort, as I was before of trouble. And so continued all that day cheerfull, but in great weaknesse, and the next morning dyed, no disease appearing upon him.

After some time of Master Balsom's abode there, he was earnestly intreated to return into his own Countrey, to which, for some important reasons he was inclined, but was as earnestly importuned by many of the inhabitants of Barnwick, either to abide with them, or to return again to them. And after many other Arguments, as he was just parting with them, as their last Argument to perswade him to stay with him, they presented him with a list of about three-score that had been (as they were verily perswaded) savingly wrought on by his Ministry, during the time of his continuance there. He left them, but with a mind of returning to them again, if providence crost it not, but his return was prevented by his death, which hapned about two years after, as he was endeavouring to get himself free from the place, where he then was, to return to them. In which space of time he did much good, as in converting many, so in reducing many that were drawn away by Sectaries. Anno Christi 1647.

M. HERBERT PALMER.

*The Life of Master Herbert Palmer, B. D. late Master of Queens-Colledge in Cambridge, who died
Anno Christi 1647.*

Herbert Palmer, was descended of an ancient Family of that name, allied to divers other Families of note, of the Nobility and Gentry. His Father, was Sir Thomas Palmer of Wingham in East-Kent, about six Miles distant from Canterbury. His Mother, was the eldest Daughter of Herbert Pelham, of Crawley in Suffex Esquire. He was born at Wingham, and was there baptized, March 29. 1601. His parentage.

He had the happinesse of a prudent and pious Education. His Father, beside his Piety, being a very wise man, and of a more than ordinary understanding, as well in State-affairs, as those of a more private Concernment. His Mother, beside her Prudence and other accomplishments more than ordinary in her sex, was also eminently Religious, and both of them exceeding carefull of his education. Himself also, being even from his infancy, much addicted to the serious study both of Religion and Learning, in both of which he had made more than ordinary Proficiency in a short time, and continued the exercise and improvement of them afterward. His birth & education.

The Symptoms of Grace and Piety, began betimes to put themselves forth to the view and observation of others, as soon almost as the exercise and use of reason; so that we may not without good ground, esteem him sanctified even from the Womb. When he was about the age of four or five years, he would cry to go to his Lady-mother, That he might hear somewhat of God; So soon had these her Religious discourses, made pleasing impressions on his apprehension. Neither did these, and such like expressions of affection to good things soon vanish away, (as childish apprehensions use to do,) but continued and encreased, according as his years and the use of Reason increased.

He was sanctified from the Womb.

His early desires of the Ministry.

Hence was it, that even from a child, being asked at any time what course of life he best liked to follow, whether to be a Lawyer, a Courtier, a Country Gentleman, &c. he would still answer, that he would be a Minister of Jesus Christ. From which, while some of his Friends (for triall sake) would seem to dissuade him, as being too mean an employment for a Gentleman, telling him that Ministers are hated, despised, and accounted as the off-scouring of the world, &c. he would reply, It was no matter for that; for if the world hated him, yet God would love him.

His frequent reading of the Scriptures.

He was early acquainted with the Book of God, which he much delighted in, and read with great affection, (insomuch that while he was but a child, little more than five years old, he wept in reading the story of Joseph) and took much pleasure in learning of Chapters by heart. And here was laid the first foundation of that great exactness in the knowledge of the Scriptures, to which he did afterwards attain.

His natural endowments.

He had excellent natural parts, both intellectual and moral: which as they were soon capable of being employed, so they were soon set on work; his Parents vigilancy being such, that they suffered no time to be neglected.

His skill in the French.

He learned the French tongue almost as soon as he could speak English; even so soon, as that he hath often affirmed, he did not remember his learning of it. And he did afterwards attain so great exactness of speaking and preaching in that language, together with a perfect knowledge of the state and affairs of that Kingdom, especially of the Protestant Churches amongst them, that he was often, by strangers, thought to be a native Frenchman; and did not doubt but to entertain discourse with any person of that Nation, for some hours together in their own language, concerning the affairs of that Kingdom, who should not be able, by his discourse to distinguish him from a native Frenchman, but judge him to be born and bred in France; so well was he furnished with an exact knowledge, both of the Propriety, and due Pronunciation of that language, and of the persons, places, and affairs of that Kingdom, and the Churches therein. A thing not often seen in one who had never been out of England.

His industry.

When he learned the Latine tongue, with such other parts of learning as younger years are usually employed in at School, his diligence and proficiency therein was such, as produced both commendation and admiration. And while others at vacant hours, were following their sports and recreations, he was constantly observed to be reading studiously by himself; taking as much pleasure in good employments, as others in sports; and counting that the best Passé-time, wherein the time was best passed.

His observance of his parents.

His carriage towards his Parents, was dutifull and obsequious; not only during his Minority, but even afterwards; which was very evident in that honour and reverend respect, which he continued to expresse to his godly aged Mother to the day of her death, which hapned not long before his own; being also a special helper to her in the ways of holiness. And what he thus practised himself, he did frequently commend to others, being always (though himself unmarried) a great asserter of Parental authority; as well from that great emphasis which God puts upon it through the whole current of of Scripture, as from those remarkable judgments, which in Scripture, and in his own experience, he had observed to be inflicted on disobedient and undutifull children, (whom, as he was wont to say, he had scarce ever known to escape some visible judgment for it in this life, though possibly otherwise godly persons,) as also from those unavoidable mischiefs, which do frequently ensue in Civil Societies, where the authority of Superiours is vilified or contemned, and which (if well considered) will be often found to take their first rise, and original from the contempt of Paternal authority.

He was about the year 1615. admitted Fellow-Commoner in Saint Johns Colledge in Cambridge, where he continued his former diligence, as well in the exercise of Religion, as the improvement of his learning, both in his private Study, and in the performance of Exercises in the University and Colledge, notwithstanding the exemption which Fellow-Commoners in Colleges are ready to plead from the performance of them.

After that he had there taken the degree of Master of Arts, about the year 1622. he was in the year 1623. constituted Fellow of Queens Colledge in that University; where, although he were a Gentleman, that beside his Fellowship, had an estate of his own, and so had the lesse need in point of maintenance, to take that trouble of Pupils upon him; yet (not satisfying himself, to take a place upon him, without performing the Office thereunto belonging) he took many Pupils, of whom he was more than ordinarily carefull, being very diligent both in praying with them in his Chamber, and instructing them in the grounds of Religion; as also keeping them to their studies, and the performance of disputations, and other exercises of learning, privately in his Chamber, beside the more publique exercises required of them by the Colledge, to the great benefit of those that were his Pupils.

While he was Fellow of Queens Colledge, about the year 1624. he was solemnly ordained to the work of the Ministry, whereunto from a Child he had addicted himself; And about the year 1626. was called to the publique exercise thereof, as a Lecturer in the City of Canterbury, where, for divers years, (notwithstanding the great oppositions he there met with, from such as were enemies to the power of godlinesse,) he did with much diligence and very great successe discharge that great work, to the spiritual edification, and comfort of many yet alive, to whom his memory to this day is precious.

The occasion of his coming thither was this; Coming from Cambridge, to give a visit to his Brother Sir Thomas Palmer at Wingham, he did at the intreaty of some Friends, preach a Sermon at the Cathedral Church in Canterbury, and that with so much true zeal, and reall savour of Piety, as did much affect the godly Hearers. The report hereof coming to the knowledge of Master Delme (a godly, faithfull, prudent, and laborious Minister of the French Church in Canterbury) he made a journey to Wingham on purpose to gain a further knowledge of him, and acquaintance with him, (with whom he was already not a little in love, from that good report he had heard of him, though as yet by face unknown to him;) and hereby not only obtained the knowledge of the man, but was also, by his gracious and savoury discourse and carriage, very much confirmed in that good opinion which he had before conceived of him. And this was the first Foundation of that intire and Christian friendship, which with much spiritual advantage to them both, was contracted between these two holy men, which continued, and increased dayly to their mutual comfort, and contentment while they were both living, and the memory thereof is still precious to him that doth yet survive.

After this, before his return to Cambridge, having (at the request of Master Delme,) preached a second Sermon at Saint Georges Church in Canterbury.

bury, on a week day Lecture; the most godly and best affected in the City were more and more taken with him, and expressed great desires of enjoying his Ministry amongst them, if it might be obtained.

Hereupon Master Delme, with divers others, of the most considerable Gentlemen and Citizens, having earnestly sought direction from God in a matter of such concernment, did seriously advise about it; and being first assured, of the concurrent desires of many others, did by Letters, and Messages to Cambridge, signifie to him the desire of the godly in that City, that he would undertake to preach a Lecture amongst them.

His self-denial.

This invitation after mature deliberation, he thought good to accept of, preferring the opportunity and probability of doing good in that populous place, before the hopes of preferment, either in the University or elsewhere, which, by reason of his many Friends and acquaintance great at Court, and otherwise, he might likely have attained unto; holding steady to that resolution (which long before that time he had taken up,) so to imploy himself as might probably most promote the Work of God, whatever became of his own advantages. Whereupon a License being obtained for him from George Abbot, then Arch bishop of Canterbury, Authorizing him to preach a weekly Lecture on the Lords day in the afternoon at Alphage Church in that City; He left his Fellowship in the University, and undertook this work.

He was a burning and shining light

During his abode in this employment, he did much edifie the people there, both by sound Doctrine, and exemplary Conversation. His Sermons were altogether spiritual and heavenly, full of solid explications and practicall applications of the Word of God; whereby the City was well seasoned as with savoury salt, and much preserved from those innovations and Corruptions, both in doctrine and Worship, which in those dayes were creeping on apace; by reason whereof that Leven of formality, which many of the Cathedralists were promoting, (who preferred pompous Ceremonies before the power of Godliness) was stopped from spreading and Corrupting so much, as otherwise it might have done. For although he was not then perswaded of the unlawfulness of the then Government, and some Ceremonies then in use, yet he could no way approve of the corrupt innovations coming on in those dayes, but did with all wisdom and zeal reprove them, countenancing goodness and good men.

His opposition to innovations.

His humility.

And by this means, he was a great stay and comfort to the godly Ministers and People, both in the City and Countrey thereabouts; whom, not only by his publique preaching, but by many other Christian and Ministerial helps administred in his more private Converses, he did very much encourage in true Piety. Of this very many Families in that City had great experience, (even those of the meanest ranke,) whom he was wont often to visit as he had opportunity, that he might the better understand their spiritual condition; admitting also persons of all ranks freely to apply themselves unto him as they had occasion, and to partake the benefit of private Conferences, Prayers, and other Religious exercises; as likewise affording his Christian advice and direction in cases of difficulty, especially to distressed Consciences; in which cases, by most of his prudent and judicious Resolutions, he was frequently consulted with as a kind of Oracle. And that not only during his abode at Canterbury, but wherever else the Providence of God did cast him. And herein he had an excellent ability and dexterity, and took much delight in it.

He doth good a-broad.

And his assistance he afforded not only to those of that City, but also to many of the most Religious Families of the Nobility, and Gentry thereabouts; to whom, both by his personal Converses, and his Christian Letters (of which there are great numbers yet to be seen) he afforded frequent directions and encouragements in the wayes of God; And particularly the Noble Family of

Thomas

The Life of Walter Herbert Palmer.

Thomas late Earl of Winchelsey, then Vicount Maidstone (whose abode at that time was at the Mote, a place near Canterbury:) the exemplary Piety of whose Family, and the several Noble Branches thereof, was by him in a special manner promoted.

The like assistance he afforded also to those of the French Congregation in Canterbury, whom, by reason of his exact knowledge in the French language, he was able to edifie very much. And (at the request of their Eldership) he did twice preach to them in that language upon most solemn dayes, to the great astonishment and edification of the whole Congregation. It is memorable, that an ancient French Gentlewoman, when she saw him the first time coming into the Pulpit, being startled at the smallness of his personal appearance, and the weakness of his look, cryed out (in the hearing of those that sate by her) Hola! que nous dira cest enfancy? Alas, what should this Child say to us? But having heard him pray and preach with so much spiritual strength and vigour, she lift her hands to heaven with admiration and joy, blessing God for what she had heard.

Yet this his faithful discharge of the Ministry was not without some opposition.

On the one hand those of the Separation, and such as were inclineable thereunto, were somewhat troublesome to him; but could get no advantage upon him, nor did prevail any thing (while he remained there) upon his Hearers.

He is opposed by Separatists and Cathedralists.

On the other side, the Cathedralists and their favourers did oppose him, fearing (it's like) lest his godly courses and exact walking might be a blemish to their loose and carnal wayes. And therefore, though the greatness of his birth, and friends, hindered them somewhat from prosecuting of him, as probably they would otherwise have done; yet once some of the chiefest of them adventured to exhibit Articles against him: But his cause and answers proved such, as that they were not able to hurt him.

After three years, or thereabouts, his Lecture there was put down by the Dean and Arch-Dean, upon certain instructions then on foot concerning Afternoon Sermons) to the great grief of his godly Hearers. But not long after, upon the petition of great numbers of the Gentry and Citizens, to the then Arch-bishop, by whose License and authority he had been before established (accompanied with the laudable testimony of divers Ministers, concerning his Orthodox Doctrine, and unblamable conversation, together with the concurrent testimony of ten Knights, and divers others of the Gentry and chief Citizens) he was again restored.

His Lecture put down.

He is again restored.

During his continuance here, he was twice (by the procurement of his Friends at Court) likely to be made one of the Prebendaries of Canterbury, But he often admired and praised that Providence of God, that his Friends endeavours therein succeeded not; seeing himself by this means delivered from many Temptations and dangers, which had been incident, if he had been one of that company; they being afterward, by the succeeding Arch-bishop, mainly set on work, for the setting up and promoting superstitious innovations.

Temptations prevented.

After some years he was removed from Canterbury, to the Vicaridge of Ashwel in Hertfordshire, whereunto he was presented by William Laud the late Arch-bishop of Canterbury, (which in his defence before the House of Peers in Parliament, was by the Arch-bishop insisted upon as one of his good deeds:) to which he received institution, February 7. 1632. where he continued the same zeal, diligence and care, which he had before discovered, in seeking the good of those souls that were committed to his charge.

His removal to Ashwel.

Beside his constant preaching there twice every Lords day, he did also very frequently preach to them occasionally, as any opportunity was offered; nor willing to let passe any advantage offered of doing them good. Wherein, notwithstanding the excellency of his Learning, whereby, if he had sought it, he might have attained great applause, and admiration (even from knowing men) in the ostentation thereof: yet he chose alwaies to condescend to the capacities of his Hearers, with so much plainnesse, as that (if possible) he might be understood by all, even those of the meanest capacities, as being most studious, both for the matter and manner of his preaching, how he might be able most of all to profit those that heard him. And on this ground upon any Emergent occasions he endeavoured as much as might be, to sute his matter thereunto, that so the Word of God, and the Providence of God, might one edge unto the other, and both joyntly become the more effectually. And for the same reason he did the more approve of Funeral Sermons, for that at such times the minds of men, especially those more immediately concerned, are thereby rendred the more pensive and serious, and so the more fit to take impressions by the Word. On the same ground also was he carefull to observe the advantages of sicknesse, or any other considerable afflictions, because his Admonitions and Christian Advice, were like to be at such a time the more effectually, when God had, as it were, softned their heart, and opened their ear to hear.

He was also carefull by Catechizing, both in publique, and at his own house to instruct in the Principles of Religion, not only the Children and youth, but even those that were more aged, in case he discerned them ignorant, and such as stood in need thereof; and yet not so as might expose them to scorn and reproach, but so as might most conduce to their edification in the knowledge and fear of the Lord. To which end he had prevailed with those of his Parish, at least the farre greater Number of them, and those the most considerable persons to concur with him in it; by sending their Children and Servants constantly to be Catechized one the Lords day before the Afternoon-Sermon (some of whom he Catechized publicly in the Congregation, and others more privately in his own house, either by himself or his assistant) that so the publique Catechizing might neither be too tedious, nor intrench upon the time allotted for other exercises, as Praying, Reading, Expounding, Preaching, &c. nor yet the examination of others for want of time, be wholly omitted; as also by their own endeavours at home to help on this work: and likewise to contribute their assistance in perswading others to the same willingnesse. As for those who were more eminent, but yet needed instruction, he laboured both by his own perswasion, and the perswasion of others, to work in them a willingnesse to repair to him in private at convenient times, that by conferences with them, and friendly discourse in a familiar and gentle manner, he might bring them to such a sufficiency of knowledge, as was necessary for their own salvation.

And the better to perswade people to a willingnesse thus to receive instruction, he used by way of encouragement, (especially to those of the meaner sort) to give Bibles to such as could read, and five shillings in money to such as could not, when they attained such a measure of knowledge, as that they were judged fit to partake of the Lords Supper. And such like rewards and encouragements he used to bestow on others, as he saw occasion; furnishing them with Books and writings, and otherwise encouraging them according as they should manifest their diligence in gaining and improving their knowledge. All which the generation to come, and the children yet unborn, may have cause to blesse God for, when they shall receive the benefits thereof, Communicated from their Parents to them, while others do as much as in them lies, intail ignorance and Atheism upon their posterity.

And because he found it difficult, to bring those of shallow memories and weak capacities to understand and remember the Principles of Religion; discerning, discerning, that many who could not distinctly repeat the words, did yet understand the matter, and therefore were not to be despised or discouraged; and others of firmer Memories, who were able to learn the words, did understand little or nothing of the meaning of them. He did therefore study how he might best remedy both those evils; and to that end, framed several forms of Catechisms in divers kinds. At length he pitched on that form, as the most convenient that he could think of, which he published in print, intituled, An endeavour of making the principles of Christian Religion plain and easie, of which so many thousands have been printed of late years, and entertained with great approbation.

His Catechism.

His method therein is this; The answers which make up the main body of the Catechism, are so many distinct Aphorisms, or entire Propositions in themselves, without dependance on the questions to make the sense entire, containing in themselves a brief module of Divinity: And to that purpose so much of the question is still repeated in the answer, as is necessary to make the sense perfect. Hereby the Learner is freed from a double inconvenience: The one is, that where the sense of an answer is imperfect, he is forced to charge his Memory with Learning the question also, or else to make use either of this Book or anothers help to ask the question, that so that answer which he hath learned may be perfect sense. The other is, that aptnesse in the Learner to misapply the answer to a wrong question, when he learns only the predicate of the Proposition without the subject. Both which inconveniences are in this way in a great measure prevented.

Another thing mainly considerable in his method, is, That beside the main questions and the answers thereunto, there are also annexed divers explanatory questions, which require no other answer but Yes, or No; which without any further charging of the Learners Memory, do direct him to the distinct observing of what is contained in the principal answer, and so to the understanding thereof; whereas otherwise heedlesse Learners are apt (Parot-like) only to learn the words without at all regarding the meaning of them. The same also will help to direct a weak Memory the better to recite the larger answer, if he be first required to give a particular answer to those expository questions; for he will then have nothing to expresse in the full answer, beside what in the Preparatory questions had been suggested to him. As for example, Quest. In what condition was man created by God at the first? Was he made miserable? (No) or very happy? (Yes) In the Image of God? (Yes) In what condition then was man created by God at first? Answer, Man was created at the first in a very happy Condition, in the Image of God.

And in the same method he intended to digest the lesser Catechism, composed by the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, (and authorized for publique use) if God had afforded him life to have seen that Catechism perfected, to the compiling whereof he had contributed no small assistance; which therefore since his death hath been performed, by one that was intimate with him, and fully acquainted with his resolutions in that particular.

As he was careful thus to instruct his flock, so was he also vigilant to prevent disorders and Misdemeanours amongst them in point of practice, wherein he was not contented to use his own personal endeavours, but did also engage his Parishioners to contribute their best assistance thereunto; whereunto they did oblige themselves in divers excellent Resolutions and Agreements, concluded by common consent amongst them, and subscribed by their hands, viz. for the preventing and punishing of Drunkenness and Tippling, of prophaneing the Lords day, and of other prophane, or disorderly demeanours during the exercise of Divine Worship, by sleeping, talking, playing, &c. as likewise of stealing, and pilfering, of prophane swearing and cursing; of Rayling, slandering, whoredome, fighting and quarrelling, disobedience dience to Parents and Governours, and of other Misdemeanours in whomsoever.

His Family-
Government.

In the Religious ordering of his own Family, he was extraordinary vigilant and painfull, that it might be, so much as in him lay, a Garden without weeds; and that those which were under his roof, might either not perish, or at least not through his default. Indeed his house was a School of Religion, such as there are very few to be found; insomuch that it was counted a great happinesse to live under his roof, under the constant enjoyment of so much means for the soules good.

It was his great care to entertain none in his Family, but such as were either truly godly, or at least willing to be instructed and educated in the wayes of God, and who would be ready and willing to attend the exercises of Gods worship, both publiquely and privately, and to avoid all scandalous conversation.

It was his constant practice twice every day to pray with his Family, not allowing any to be absent; at which times he read to them some portion both of the Old and New Testament.

He was carefull also to Catechize his Family twice every week, and likewise on Fryday and Saturday to require an account from them of the Sermons preached the Lords day before, which he then repeated to them.

Having also while he was at Ashwel, the Sonnes of divers considerable persons of the Nobility and Gentry, sojourning in his house, for their better education in Religion and Learning, (he maintaining in his house an Assistant as a School-Master to teach them) he required of them the like account in Catechizing and Repetitions as of his own Servants.

He had also daily, after dinner and Supper, a Chapter read by one of those Gentlemen in course, and he whose turn was to read, was required also, after he had read, to repeat the substance out of his Memory, which (by constant custom) they had attained an ability to perform very exactly; after which, himself used to go over the same briefly, by way of exposition, of what appeared difficult, and noting such observations as were most obvious from the most remarkable passages therein.

Beside this, he required his Servants, after every Meal, to have some portion of Scripture read amongst them, or some other Religious Treatise Concerning the Fundamentals of Religion, if not both.

His care for sanctifying
the Sabbath

But especially he was carefull that all his Family should sanctifie the Sabbath-day. And therefore would not suffer them to be employed late the night before, about their ordinary employments, but caused them to conclude sooner then on other days, that they might not be indisposed for the duties of the day following. And on the Sabbath-day it self, he was carefull that they should not spend any part of it idly or vainly, no not in any unnecessary preparations of diet or the like, but only of such and so much as was necessary for their comfortable refreshment that day; but would have them spend the whole day, as much as might be, in the exercises of some of Gods Ordinances publique or private, insomuch that if he had known of any dish that had kept any of his Servants from attending on any of Gods Ordinances, he would not at all eat of it.

And for better sanctifying of that day, he was carefull not only to perform private duties in his Family, as Prayer, Reading, Singing of Psalms, &c. but also when he went to the publique Ordinances, he would call all his Family together to go along with him, that so they might be present at the whole service of God. And in the evening of the day, he required of all his Servants, and the young Gentlemen that sojourned with him, an account of such portions of Scripture as had been read in publique, that as they recited particular passages thereof, he gave brief expositions of them, and observations ons from them: pressing them to meditate in private of what they read in publique.

Beside this great care of his Family joyntly, he was also frequent in giving them personall councell and direction in the ways of God, exhorting them also to a dayly constancy in the performance of secret duties between God and their own souls; so that scarce any Family enjoyed the like measure of helps and encouragements in the ways of holinesse.

His exact walking in his own secret devotion, was also exceedingly remarkable. He was a man much in Communion with God. Twice every day, he was in secret a Suiter at the Throne of grace, and oftner, as any particular occasion was offered. He would very seldom enter upon any business, either by himself, or with others, without first seeking of God. He did often set dayes apart to humble himself in secret by Fasting and Prayer, according as either publique or particular occasions did seem to call for it; as also in solemn Thanksgivings, for mercies received, whether publique or private.

He was a great admirer of the holy Scriptures, and much conversant in them. Beside what he had read and heard read in his Family, he did every day by himself read some part both of the Old and New Testament, and constantly writ thort Meditations and observations of what he so read, whereof he hath left behind him many hundred sheets written in Characters. He was so thoroughly acquainted with it, that it was not easie to name a Chapter or Verse, but he would presently tell the Contents of it; nor to name any sentence of Scripture, but he could presently tell in what Chapter or Verse it was to be found; yea scarce any particular case could fall out in practice, but that he would be able to shew what particular directions the Word of God afforded for it.

He was also a great observer of Providence, and took special notice how the Providences of God, and the Word of God did constantly agree together. And from hence was able to give very near conjectures, if not evident Predictions in many cases, what God was about to do, and what good or evil events were likely to come to passe; by comparing present actions with such Precedents as he had before observed, in the Providences and Word of God in like cases.

And as he was very carefull to order all his actions according to his constant rule, of being subservient to the glory of God, and the good of souls, so that even his journeys, visits, discourses, and familiar converses with any, were not undertaken without a special eye hereunto; so did he also keep an exact account of what had passed, every night before his going to rest, setting down in writing (in his usuall Character;) the passages of that day, what actions or discourses he had been employed in, what successes or disappointments, what mercies or Crosses he met withall, and what failings he observed in himself: all which he surveyed again at the end of every week, writing down the chief passages of that week, and so from moneth to moneth, and year to year. By means whereof he was thoroughly acquainted with his own spiritual condition, and did maintain a constant exactnesse, and even walking with God; which being so uniform, might perhaps by some be the lesse observed. Like as the Sunnes constant brightnesse, produceth lesse admiration, then some Blazing Starre that appeareth but for a while, men usually more admiring things rare than excellent.

In the year 1632. he was by the University of Cambridge made one of the University-Preachers (having proceeded Bachelor of Divinity about two years before;) A matter of honour and repute, rather than of profit or employment. Yet also a matter of some advantage in some cases, (as times then went) being in the nature of a general License, whereby he was authorized to preach, as he should have occasion, in any part of England.

At the beginning of the Parliament, he with Doctor Tuckny, were chosen Clerks of the Convocation, for the Diocese of Lincoln, wherein he might have been of good use, in case it had been thought fit to have kept up that kind of Assembly, to have acted in concurrence with the Parliament as in former times.

He is made a Member of the Assembly.

His conscientiousness
therein.

His fitness
for it.

In the year 1643. he was by authority of Parliament, called to be a Member of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster. And after some time he was chosen one of the Assessors, appointed to assist the Prolocutor in case of absence or infirmity. He was in that Assembly an eminent and very usefull Member, exceeding diligent and industrious, being very rarely absent, and that not but upon urgent unavoidable occasions. For, as he accounted it an honour to be employed by God in so publique a service for the good of his Church: so he did conscientiously attend upon that service, preferring it before all other more particular employments, which though in themselves excellent, yet ought, in his judgement, to give way to this.

And he was exceeding well fitted for this employment, having a clear and ready apprehension, and firm and vast memory, a solid and steady judgement, and a good ability freely to expresse himself. In matters of deliberation, he manifested much Integrity and Christian wisdom. In matters of debate, whether about Doctrine or Discipline, he discovered a great sagacity in searching out the true sense of Scripture, a clear judgment, and strength of reason, as well in the accurate stating of questions for debate, as in confirming the truth, and dissolving objections against it; in all, a great measure of Zeal, Piety, and Prudence. All which procured him much Reverence, and esteem from the rest of his Brethren, who judged his presence and assistance a very great help, and advantage in that difficult work, and bewailed his death as an unspeakable losse.

His judgment was known to be for the Presbyterian Government; the principles whereof he did thoroughly understand, and was well able to defend, and was a very great Instrument for the promoting of it. Yet in two things he was at first much unsatisfied, but by the debates of the Assembly, did profess himself to receive satisfaction in both.

One was Concerning the Divine-Right of Ruling Elders, wherein he afterwards professed himself to be fully convinced, principally by the Authority of those two places, 1 Cor. 12. 28. (where Government is attributed to a distinct rank of Officers inferiour to Teachers,) and 1 Tim. 5. 17. which implyeth, that there are other Elders which rule well, beside those that labour in the Word and Doctrine.

The other was, whether there ought not to be continued in the Church, an Office superiour to that of Presbyters. For, although he did not approve of the Hierarchical Government, as it was of late established and practised amongst us: yet since it is confessed that Timothy and Titus, as Evangelists, did exercise an authority, superiour to that of ordinary Presbyters, the object of which authority, seemed to be of perpetual continuance in the Church, it seemed probable to him, that the Office also of an Evangelist, was no extraordinary Office, but ought to be continued in the Church. But hereunto he received satisfaction, principally from hence, that in case the Holy Ghost had intended the continuance of that Office, he would withall, have described the work, and qualification of persons fit for it, and taken some course for continuing the succession thereof, as is done in that of Elders and Deacons. But this being wholly omitted, there being no more extant in that kind, then concerning the Apostolical Office, the power of working Miracles, &c. We are rather to esteem that Office, as well as these, to be extraordinary, and but of a temporary continuance, expiring with the persons.

His care for Ashwel in his absence.

Being thus called to attend the Assembly at Westminster, he was forced to intermit his ordinary residence at Ashwel; being able only to exercise such a care of them as might be performed at a distance, and by making occasionall journeys thither, thither, as he could obtain opportunities so to do. But the ordinary exercise of the Ministerial work there, together with the profits of the place, he put over to a godly and able Divine to be performed in his absence; reserving notwithstanding his title to the place, not knowing how soon God might afford him opportunity of returning to them again.

But, unwilling to intermit the exercise of his Ministerial function, he did at first preach occasionally (as he was requested,) in divers Churches in and about London, resolving notwithstanding within himself, to accept of the first invitation for the constant exercise thereof.

And accordingly, being soon after requested by the Inhabitants of Dukes place in London, (who were then destitute of a Minister) to preach amongst them, he did (notwithstanding their inability to raise any considerable maintenance, which might invite him) willingly accept of that employment.

His choice to Dukes place.

His self-denial.

His great pains.

This work he performed amongst them with much faithfulness and diligence, as well by publique reading, praying, and preaching, amongst them twice every Lords day, and at other times as there was occasion; as also by administering the Sacraments, publique Catechizing, and exposition of such portions of Scripture as were read amongst them. And likewise (as his custom had been elsewhere) by more private acquaintance, and converse with them in their Families, whereby he might be the better able to afford personal directions, and other Ministerial helps to them, as their several conditions might require. All which was performed with so much Meekness, Wisdom, and Piety, and accompanied with such a blessing from God, as that it made a very great impression on them for their good, and was entertained by them with much approbation and affection, they being ambitious who should enjoy most of his heavenly Communion and Converse with him. Hereby in a short time he did much good, informing such as were weak in knowledge, settling and confirming such as were wavering in judgement, and stirring up in all, both by his Heavenly Conversation and Christian counsell, a greater zeal and affection to the power of Godliness. By reason of all which, during the time of his abode amongst them, they were much preserved both from errors and divisions, whereunto the great unsetledness of the times did much expose them.

The success of his Ministry.

Afterwards, when the new Church at Westminster was perfected and made fit for use, the Inhabitants there, and others concerned therein, did sollicite him to undergo the charge of that great people; with proffer of far larger maintenance than he received or could expect from those of Dukes place, where the inhabitants were neither many, nor of great estates.

His call to the new Church.

But this consideration did not at all prevail with him, who regarded the work more than the wages. For although he doubted not but that both Religion, and Reason did require a comfortable and honourable Maintenance, for those that laboured in the work of the Ministry, yet for his own part he was willing to deny himself in that particular, if so doing might ought advance the service of God. And so much the rather, because being a Batchelor, and intending so to continue, not at all addicted to pompous vanities or excesses, either in dyet or apparell (in both of which he was exceedingly moderate) he had the lesse need of being solicitous in getting riches; being indeed much more solicitous, how (like a faithfull Steward,) to dispose and order what he had, as might be most for Gods honour and service, then how to encrease it.

His temperance.

Yet his removall being much pressed upon grounds of another nature, he did at length, with the approbation of those concerned on both parts, refer the whole business to be considered and concluded by divers of the most eminent of his Reverend and godly Brethren of the Assembly, whom he did frequently desire that they would wholly lay aside the consideration of maintenance, and deliver their judgements, what in other considerations they judged to be most agreeable to Gods will and his duty.

Cc Heredupon

The reasons of his removall.

Hereupon, they to whom the matter was referred, meeting several times about it; and hearing at large what could on either side be alledged either for his stay or removall; after mature deliberation had, and seeking of Gods direction, agreed in this opinion; That setting aside the consideration of maintenance, yet in regard of the Eminency of the place, the greatnesse of the Auditory, the many persons of quality residing there, and the great need of Instruction to those of an inferiour rank, many of whom were extreemly ignorant, (by reason that amongst such a great multitude of people, there had in former times been so great a scarcity of preaching,) together with divers other reasons of the like nature, which did more then countervail what could be alledged on the other hand, his obligations also to those of Dukes-place not being absolute; they judged it most fit that he should leave Dukes-place, and undertake that charge at Westminster.

To this their Resolution he consented, yet with this Proviso, that those of Dukes-place, should be first provided of an able faithfull Pastor to succeed him, being utterly unwilling to leave them destitute. And accordingly, having prevailed with Master Thomas Young, (since Doctor in Divinity, and Master of Jesus Colledge in Cambridge) to succeed him there, (who was also an eminent Member of the Assembly of Divines, a man of great Learning, of much Prudence and Piety, and of great ability and fidelity in the work of the Ministry) he took his leave of them: commending them to the grace of God, and the pious care of his Successor, taking on him the charge of those belonging to the new Church in Westminster, and was the first Pastor of that Church.

pains.

He was here also eminently faithfull, and laborious in the work of the Ministry, in publique praying, reading, expounding, preaching, administering the Sacraments, and Catechizing, with brief and clear expositions and confirmations of the Principles of Religion, as had been his usual custom in other places. Beside which he was also one of the seven, that by appointment of Parliament did carry on that daily morning Lecture at the Abby-Church; inso-much that it seems almost a Miracle, that so weak a body as his, should possibly be able to do so much as constantly he performed, continuing oftentimes to speak in publique for the space of six or eight hours on a Sabbath day, beside much time spent in more private exercises of Prayer, Repetitions, &c. in the Family; yet when his Friends have perswaded him to favour himself, judging so much pains to be more than his body could endure; his answer hath been, that his strength would spend of it self, though he did nothing; and it could not be better spent than in Gods service. Yea so far was he from favouring himself in this kind, that it was a rule with him which he constantly observed, never to favour himself by declining any Ministerial exercise which he was requested to perform, whether in publique or private, if he were possibly able to perform it.

A faithfull
Pastor.

Neither did he here neglect, what had been his constant practice else-where, to afford private assistance to those of his flock and others, as he had opportunity. But what time he could gain from the more publique affairs of the Assembly, he spent for the most part in such duties, not willing to lose an hour which could be employed in doing good. And to this end, beside that free access that persons of all ranks might have unto him, as they had occasion, he spent much time in visiting them at their own Families, to communicate some spiritual good to them, as Directions, Consolations, and Encouragements in the ways of Godlinesse, which made his company both very profitable and much desired. Hereby, besides others, very many considerable Families of the Nobility and Gentry, (whose practice commonly hath a great influence on others) were much quickned and encouraged in the visible practice of Godlinesse, and the power of Religion, which thereby was much improved; And very many of them are ready upon all occasions, to pro-

fesse that it was, their great happinesse to be acquainted with him, and bewail the want of it as a great losse.

And he was hereunto the more fitted, for that he was naturally of a loving and friendly disposition, of a courteous and affable carriage, even towards inferiours, and those of mean rank, especially if he discovered in them signes of grace, which he did honour and encourage wherever he met with it. Hereby he gained much love, and affection from those with whom he had to do, by reason whereof his counsel, and advice became so much the more effectual. To which we may adde also his birth and education, and his frequent conversing with persons of quality to whom he was related and allied, by reason whereof he was well qualified with such accomplishments as might render his company acceptable, as knowing well how to give due respect to all, according as their places and conditions did require, and yet to preserve the honour and reverence of his Ministerial authority, which by the gravity, Sobriety, and holinesse of his Conversation was much secured.

His amiable and affable disposition.

In that great Ordinance of the Lords Supper, which in these broken and distracted times hath been in many places wholly laid aside, and in many more too much neglected; he took much care and pains how to manage that great businesse, so as it might be neither displeasing to God nor justly offensive to good men.

His care about the Lords Supper.

The difficulty herein hath been, not concerning the manner of administration, which hath afforded lesse matter of contest, but concerning the persons that might be judged fit to be admitted thereunto; which to many men hath been attended with so much perplexity, that they have apprehended a necessity of a totall intermission, and almost an impossibility of administering it in any tolerable manner; while on the one hand they durst not promiscuously admit all, (by reason of the great ignorance of many, and the prophaness or looseness of others;) and yet on the other hand saw not how they might be able, (for want of authority) to debar any: waiting still for the setting of a Government in the Church, whereby this great difficulty might in some measure be removed: Till at length, through the long intermission of this Ordinance, those that are prophane and carnal begin to flight and scorn it, and those of better principles do too much abate in their affections to it. And that remedy, which though late, began at length to be applyed, in beginning to establish the Presbyterian Government, hath been yet so much defective in want of Power, and so much exposed to scorn and reproach, which men of prophane or turbulent spirits cast upon it, either from principles of prophaness, or of separation, or from some other bitter root which renders men unwilling to have their lusts, errors, unlawfull liberties, or Licentious courses, in any kind whatsoever to be checked or contradicted; that the matter is now almost grown desperate, unlesse God will be pleased in special favour, to afford some unexpected remedy.

Herein this holy man did manifest a great measure of singular Prudence and Piety, wisely avoiding both rocks; Neither totally omitting the Celebration of the Sacrament, nor yet promiscuously admitting all unto it, but those only of whose sufficient knowledge he was assured, and whose lives, so far as he could discern, were unblamable and free from scandal. And this he did, not only of late years, but even formerly, from his first undertaking a Pastoral charge; at what time it may well be supposed, to have been a thing both of greater difficulty and danger, then of late years, to keep off unworthy receivers from prophaneing that holy Ordinance.

In order hereunto, his first work was to abate, as much as might be, the number of ignorant people, by perswading them to be willing to receive instruction, which with much care and diligence he was ready to afford unto them, in such wayes as is before expressed: Which, though a difficult work, was yet carried on with so great successe, through Gods blessing on his endeavors, that in his Parish of Ashwel, where was no small number of people, he had in a short time brought them to so great a measure of knowledge, that there was either none or very few, either old or young, who were not able to give a good account of the principles of Religion.

When he had once prevailed with them to be so far sensible of their own ignorance, as to be willing and desirous to learn, it was then no hard matter to perswade such of their own accord to forbear a while, till they had attained so much knowledge as that they might come with comfort; which would be so much the sooner, according as they were more diligent in labouring to attain knowledge.

When they had attained a competent measure of knowledge, if their lives were answerable, and not obnoxious to just Exception; or at least, they willing to redresse what was amisse, and ready to follow such good advice and directions, as were given them for the ordering their Conversations aright towards God and man; there was then no reason why they should be longer debarred, but rather such good beginnings Cherished and encouraged, yet with cautions frequently inculcated to be ware of hypocrisie and formality, and not to rest in these beginnings, but to presse forward to perfection.

But in case they did either obstinately refuse Instruction, or notwithstanding their knowledge, were scandalous and incorrigible, or such as in point of Conversation he could not judge fit to be admitted to that Ordinance: Than probably they would either be found such as were obnoxious to such scandals as might endanger a more publique prosecution, and so durst not be refractory; or else by the conviction of their own Consciences, when the danger of unworthy Receiving should be laid open to them; or by friendly perswasions from himself or others: or by the Reverence and awe of his holy and Grave Carriage, and Ministerial authority, backed with the Concurrence of others amongst them, eminent for worth and Piety; or for fear of being shamed, in case they should be openly reproved, or refused in the face of the Congregation, or upon some other the like Consideration, would be perswaded to forbear, in case he judged them as yet unfit to be admitted to that Ordinance. So that scarce any whom he judged utterly unfit, have ever peremptorily pressed upon him to partake of it. And by these means, even in times of greatest danger, was he able to avoid the mixture of prophane and unworthy persons at the Lords Table.

Hereunto his Naturally Courteous, and affable disposition did much conduce, whereby he could with the more ease, gain access, both to the persons and affections of all sorts of people: together with an excellent mixture of meekness and courage, which being managed with singular Prudence, and indefatigable industry, enabled him happily to carry on that difficult work, which might otherwise seem almost insuperable.

And by the same courteous and prudent carriage, he obtained a like interest in the affections of his people both at Dukes-place and Westminster: Insomuch as those who were fit to be admitted to that Sacrament, were either otherwise sufficiently known to him, by his Conversing with them, or else would willingly upon that occasion approve themselves to him, both in point of knowledge and Coverlation; And others who were unfit, nor cared to attain a fitness for it, would rather of their own accord forbear, then venture the hazard of being refused; By means whereof, himself, and some hundreds of godly persons who did communicate with him, could with great comfort

He is made joyn in that holy Communion, and Fellowship.

Master of On the 11 of April, in the year 1644. he was constituted Master of Queens Colledge in Cambridge by the Earl of Manchester; then employed by Ordinance of Parliament, for the reforming of that University.

He had a great influence upon the general Reformation of that University, and by his advice and Counsell, did very much help forward that work, exciting also, and encouraging others therein, notwithstanding the difficulties in the way, that were represented as almost invincible; and did improve all that interest which he had, both in that Noble and Religious Earl of Manchester, and in the Assembly of Divines (who were to give their approbation to all such as should be put into the places of such as were ejected in that University, whether Masters or Fellows,) that all possible care, and Circumspection might be used, that such only as were both learned and Religious, might be commended to, or approved for those places, lest, instead of those that were cast out, others as bad as they should succeed them, as well in their vices as their places.

But more especially in reference to that place, to the Government where- of he was designed (whereof also he had formerly been a Fellow) it cannot easily be believed how exceeding Circumspect he was, how Cautious and wary in the Choice of those who (as Fellows) were to joyn with him in the Government, that they might be learned, pious, and unanimous. The happy effect of which care, in so quiet and peaceable establishment of that Society, as could not easily be expected in so troublesome a time, was, to the great astonishment and Amazement of all, even of those that hated them; and hath had a very great influence upon that happy, and flourishing condition thereof ever since. What his aim was in that place, did continually appear, by his constant expressions and Prayers, which sounded of nothing more than the advancement of Religion and Learning: And he was as true to those expressions in his continued endeavours and actings.

His first and main care was, the advancement of Religion, and practical Piety, knowing that where this took place, a conscionable improvement of time, in other things could not well be wanting. This made him extraordinary solicitous, for the constant presence of the whole Society at the publique Worship of God; which he did carefully look to; when he was present amongst them, and was usually one of the last things he gave in charge to all the Students, when his more publique employments at the Assembly called him away, and whereof he was very inquisitive in his absence. He took care also for the constant instruction, not only of the young Scholars, but likewise of all the Colledge Servants, in the principles of Religion. The exercises of Common-places or Sermons in the Chappel, which had formerly been in use, only in Term-time, he caused to be continued weekly all the year. Besides which, when he was present in the Colledge, he did frequently himself, either preach, or expound Scripture to them. He also took special notice, of the several Conversations of the particular persons in the Colledge, as well by his own inspection, and observation while he was present, as by faithfull informations in his absence; and was frequent in giving them personall counsel and Direction in private. Consonant hereunto was also the care of the particular Fellows, who beside the instruction of their Pupils in Learning, caused them to come to their chambers to Prayers every night, and to repetition of Sermons on the Lord-day. By all which the practice of Religion was much promoted.

His next care was for the advancement of Learning, which he endeavoured to promote by his frequent exhortations, and encouraging all to diligence in their studies, and conscionable improving their time and opportunities; as also by requiring, the constant performance of publique exercises, by persons of all ranks; and exciting the Fellows to a diligent inspection, as well jointly over the Colledge in general, as severally over their one Pupils in particular for the same ends.

On the same ground also he took care to have the Colledge Library furnished nished with good Authors, giving considerable summes of money for that end, and perswading others also to do the like; And some dues payable to the Colledge, which formerly used to be employed in feasting, were by his means converted to a better use, in buying of such Books, which might feed the minds, both of the present society, and those that shall succeed.

His charity. He bestowed also a considerable part of his profits there, upon the yearly maintenance of poor Scholars, and at his death he gave a considerable summe of money for the same purpose, to be disposed of by the present Society to such as stood in need.

Indeed his resolution was, that so long as he was hindered from residing constantly amongst them, by reason of his attending on the Assembly at Westminster, he would not be a gainer by the place; but whatsoever profits he received more then would defray the charges, of journeys and other expences occasioned by it, he would bestow some way or other for the good of the Colledge.

His prudence.

In elections to places of preferment in the Colledge, he was exceedingly carefull that they might be bestowed on those that were most deserving: and to that end, he did, with the unanimous consent of the Fellows, make a Decree, that in all future Elections, none should be admitted to a Scholarship or Fellowship in the Colledge, till they did first approve themselves for Learning by a publique triall or examination, for two or three days successively in the audience of the whole Colledge, which hath already produced very good effects for the improvement of learning in that Colledge, and more are like to ensue. In case any solicited him for preferment of their Friends, his constant answer was, that if they were found to deserve it better then others, they should have it; but if otherwise, they must expect to go without it; and his actings were exactly consonant hereunto; as indeed in all things, his resolutions, words, and actions were so exactly consonant, and kept so perfect harmony as is seldom seen: whereas in many, their words are more then their intentions, and their actions lesse then their words.

In his converse with the Fellows, it was his great care to preserve unanimity, that as well Elections as all other affairs of the Colledge, should be carried on by a universal consent; so if that in the proposall of any thing, there were any dissent, his usual manner was to defer the determination of it, till every one should see reason sufficient to concur with the rest; and was himself as ready to hearken to any argument produced, though contrary to his present sense, which he would either fully answer or yield to it: So that scarce any thing was over-ruled meerly by plurality of suffrages, but all with universal consent; and nothing more ordinary, then for all differences to be quite reasoned down.

In his absence from them, his mind was still present with them; being more thoroughly acquainted with all the affairs of the Colledge, and more carefull of them, than most Heads of houses are when they are present. For by reason of that sweet harmony, and agreement betwixt himself and the Fellows, he had constantly faithfull intelligence of all affairs, and did communicate his counsel and advice therein, making the good of the Colledge, (as he was wont to call it) his Magna cura, by reason whereof that Colledge hath flourished in a very eminent manner: And I may safely say, without prejudice to any; that scarce any Society in either University, since the late Reformation, both for the general improvement of Religion and Learning, and the unanimous harmony amongst themselves, have been comparable hereunto; yea, so great was that unanimity and reciprocal affection, between him and the Society, that scarce ever any Head of a Society was taken from them with more general sorrow.

Beside what hath been already said, much more might be added, concerning the worth of this eminent Servant of God, much of which hath been already ready penned by himself in that small Tractate, Of making Religion, ones business, together with the Appendix, applied to the calling of a Minister, (which with other small Tracts are printed together with this title, Memorials of Godlinesse and Christianity.) wherein you may read a true Character of his thoughts, as well as his actions, of which I shall only adde this; That his constant practice was so exactly consonant to the strict principles, that are there expressed, as can hardly be believed by those that have not seen it. A true Nathaniel.

He was a man indeed of a very publique spirit, and wholly laid himself out for God: And therefore, though he were ready to deny himself and condescend freely, where his own interest was only concerned; yet was he zealous and tenacious in things that concerned Gods glory, reserving his heart to encounter sin. His zeal.

Hence was it, that notwithstanding his natural meeknesse, he acted in the things of God with much courage and resolution; As in those free and resolute expressions of himself (yet with humility, meeknesse, and sobriety) in Preaching at the Cathedral Church at Canterbury, in presence of the Dean and Prebends, wherein he spared not to set before them such things as were notoriously amisse, (yet for the most part expressing in Latine what did chiefly concern them, that they might take notice of it, not the people;) which, though it procured him some trouble and opposition, yet he did not for that, abate of his courage, and resolution. In like manner, when he was to Preach at the Bishop of Lincolns Visitation at Hitchin, he went thither with a resolution to speak fully, and freely, against the corrupt innovations then in practice, whatever might be the issue; and did accordingly perform it, though he were sensible of the great danger of so doing. The like resolution he manifested in the question about the Sabbath, when opposition was made against the Perpetuity thereof, and the Morality of the fourth Commandment, a matter wherewith his heart was deeply affected, as being an high affront to the Majesty and Authority of God; the thoughts whereof seemed to be continually in his mind, as was evident by his prayers, discourses, Counsels and endeavours; and particularly by that elaborate discourse, which he, in conjunction with that Judicious, Learned, and Pious Divine Master Daniel Cawdrey, published to the world, entituled Vindicia Sabbathi, (the latter parts whereof were long ago fitted for the Presse, and want but invitations of publishing, which might encourage the Stationer to undertake the charge.) His courage and faithfulness.

And therefore when reading the Book for Sports on the Lords day, bowing to the Altar, reading the Service-book there, &c. were urged, he was most resolute against them, resolving rather to lose all, and suffer any thing then to comply therein, and with that Resolution went to the Arch-bishops visitation at Welling held by Sir John Lamb, where yet he found, beyond expectation, rather a connivance at him, than an enforcement thereof. And the like he did concerning the Convocation Oath in the new Book of Canons, in the year 1640. which he vigorously opposed, and took a great deal of pains in evincing the unlawfulness thereof. His vindication of the Sabbath.

It is well known also what freedom and faithfulness he hath used in reference to the publique affairs, as well in his ordinary Sermons at the New Church, the Abby, and Margarets in Westminster, (to which places the greatest number of Parliament men did usually resort,) as in those by special order preached to one or both houses of Parliament, (some of which are to be seen in print) where he spared not to declare fully and plainly what God expected from them, and freely to reprove what was a misse. For (as he was wont to say) he did not in that place preach BEFORE them, (ut coram Iudice) but TO them (authoritative) as by Commission from God, and how much soever they might be superiour to him in other regards, yet he was in that place superiour to them, as acting in Gods Name; and therefore would not be afraid to speak whatever was the Will of God that he should tell them, notwithstanding

A special Providence.

His faithfulness.

Withstanding

withstanding any displeasure or danger which might by this means befall him for so doing.

His judgement about the King.

And upon this consideration, we may look upon it as a wise Providence of God, so seasonably to take him away a little before those great transactions about the change of Government; which were so directly contrary to his deliberate and settled judgement, that he would certainly have thought it his duty to Speak much more then others would endure to Hear. For although his judgement was clear for the lawfullnesse of Defensive Arms (which was the Parliaments case, as it was first stated as) doth fully appear in that Treatise, entituled, Scripture and Reason, pleaded for Defensive Arms (wherein himself of all others had the greatest hand:) yet was as peremptory against Offensive Arms, or attempting the Kings life, whose person he judged Sacred and inviolable, and hath oft expressed himself to that purpose, that in case this should ever come to be the question (which he hoped he should never see) he thought himself bound in conscience, by speaking, preaching, and otherwise, to oppose it to the utmost of his power, whatever danger he might incur by so doing; which zeal of his, though at that time he were like to have prevailed very little with men otherwise resolved, yet it might have proved an occasion of much hurt to himself, and therefore God in wisdom and mercy thought good to excuse him that piece of service.

His temperance, and sobriety.

He was in his Conversation a man of much temperance and sobriety; In his diet, he abstained from strong drink altogether; Wine he drank very sparingly, so far forth only as the necessities of Nature did require, and did usually content himself to eat but of one dish at a meal, and that none of the daintiest, even when he had more before him. In his apparell he did neither affect to be gay nor costly, but decent, nor to spend time in needlesse Curiosity in dressing. As for Recreations, he scarce used any, but in stead thereof refreshed himself with the Christian Converse of Friends; accounting time so precious, that he would redeem it, not only from sports, but from sleep also so far as the necessities of nature would permit.

His liberality and charity.

He was neither Wastfull nor covetous, but very liberall; doing many acts of Charity (beside what hath been mentioned before) to such as stood in need; bestowing plenteous relief, according as he was able, both by his own hands and the hands of others, so that those who received it knew not oft-times whence it came. And when that eminent work of charity was on foot in Cambridge, while he was Fellow of Queens Colledge, whereby divers young Scholars, who were forced by reason of the wars to fly out of Germany, especially of the Palatinate, were sent for hither and educated, partly in the University, and partly under able and godly Divines in the Countrey, whereby they might be fitted to do God and their Countrey service (when God should give them opportunity to return) having here been educated in the knowledge of our language, and the way of practical Preaching, which hath been no where more eminent then in England, (which work succeeded beyond expectation) he was one of the great actors therein, and did contribute liberally thereunto. The like assistance also he afforded to divers Hungarians, Transilvanians, and other strangers, who came over into England for the same reason.

His last sickness.

The time of his sickness was not long; for having spent much of his natural strength in his constant labours in the service of God; there was the lesse work for sickness to do; His deportment therein was holy and heavenly; His humility, faith, patience, and submission to Gods Will, eminently appearing from time to time, and his discourse full of heavenly expressions till the time of his death.

Not long before his death, when one had read to him the 38 Chapter of Isaiah, (having then some little hopes of his recovery) and ready to go to prayer, he desired him to stay a while that he might pray first, which he did briefly, (as his his weaknesse would permit) but very fully, both for himself, the Kingdom, the Church of God, and all to whom he stood in any Relation, The heads whereof were soon after written as near as might be in his own words, so far as the memory of those that were then present could call them to mind.

First, blessing God for his goodnesse the night past.

Blessed be God that hath been so good to us this night.

Then praying in behalf of himself.

Great God, heal the sinfulness of my nature.

Pardon all my transgressions.

Take from me a heart of unbelief, that I may not depart from thee the living God.

Deliver me from Temptation.

Accept of Jesus Christ for me.

Teach me to improve all Providences.

To live upon the Promises.

Let Christ be my life.

O Lord, let me never shrink from thee.

For the good of the publique.

Lord, turn the hearts of this Nation, and all our hearts.

Turn the heart of the King.

Sanctifie the Parliament, and make them faithfull.

Blesse the Assembly, and make them faithfull, and upright with thee.

Let not the Army do unworthily, but what thou wouldst have them to do.

Blesse all the Ministers.

For other Nations.

Lord, do good to Scotland, and the Churches in France.

Blesse New-England, and forraign plantations.

For the places to which he was related.

Lord, provide a faithfull man for Queens-Colledge.

A faithfull man for this place, (New Church in Westminster.)

H faithfull Pastor for those in the Countrey.

For Friends, and those about him.

Lord, Remember all those that have shewed kindness to me, and have taken pains with me, and recompence them. Thou hast promised that he which giveth a Cup of water in the name of a Disciple, and he that receiveth a Prophet in the name of a Prophet, shall have a Prophets reward.

Afterwards (having forgotten to crave a blessing upon somewhat given him to take, he prayed, Lord, pardon my neglect, and forgetfulness of thee; and deliver me from temptation, and the evil of temptation. Thou art holy if thou shouldst forsake us; Our Fathers trusted in thee, and were delivered. Lord, glorified thy name in my poor spirit, and let none of thy people, ever see me shrink from thee for Jesus Christ his sake.

Being spoken to, to cast the burden of his sickness and pain upon God, he answered, I should do very unworthily, if when I have preached to others, that they should cast their burdens upon God, I should not do so my self.

In these and many other the like Christian expressions, he did manifest the same favour of holiness even to the time of his death, which had been constantly discovered in the time of his life. He departed this life, Anno Christi 1647. and of his age 46. having served God faithfully and painfully in his generation, being a very great Instrument of much good, and an excellent pattern for imitation. His body lieth interred in the New-Church at Westminster, and his Memory yet liveth in the minds of those that knew him.

His death.

The Life and Death of Mr. Samuel Crook, who dyed Anno Christi 1649.

His Birth.

Amuel Crook was born at Great Waldingfield in the County of Suffolk, Jan. 17. Anno Christi 1574. He was a Prophet, and the Son of a Prophet, even of that great, and famous Light, Doctor Crook, a Learned, and Laborious Divine, who was sometimes a Preacher to the Honourable Society of Greys-Inn; A Gentleman well descended, and of an ancient Family.

His Education.

This our Samuel was in his younger years trained up in Merchant Taylors School in London, and having perfected his Studies there, he was sent to the University of Cambridge, and admitted into Pembroke Hall, where he was first Scholar, and afterwards chosen Fellow of that House, being chosen by the unanimous consent, and suffrage of all, but the Master, upon whose refusal, he was soon after Elected, and admitted one of the first foundation of Fellows in Emanuel Colledge, where, until this day his name is precious, being preserved in their Library amongst their choicest Ornaments of that House in the Catalogue of their first Fellows, thus written;

Master Samuel Crook, Batchelour in Divinity.

His Proficiency.

From his very youth he was highly esteemed in that University, both for his candid, and ingenuous behaviour in a comely person, as also for his pregnant parts, ready wit, great industry, and answerable proficiency in all kinds of Polite Learning, which renders a man more expedite, and exquisite for any worthy, and noble employment, and is more especially preparatory, and introductory to the Study of Sacred Divinity: which being observed, and taken notice of, he was first made choice of to be the Rhetorick Reader, and afterwards was advanced to be Philosophy Reader in the Publick Schools, both which places he performed with general applause.

His Preference.

His youthly labours.

Amongst his other youthly employments, he translated Virgils Eclogues: The first, and second Books of his Aeneids: Juvenals first Satyre, and most of the memorable speeches both in Virgil, and other Poets; All which were clear demonstrations of his ingenious capacity, and ingenuous sufficiency.

And, to shew that his heart; Even in his youth was drawn Heaven-ward (from whence his wit was sanctified) he translated divers of Dauids Psalms, and composed several Sacred Hymnes of his own: Some of which he sung with tears of joy and desire in his last sickness, having a sweet voice, and good skill in Musick.

In his younger years also, he was a constant, and diligent hearer, and great admirer of that man of God, Master William Perkins, and a Reverend Observer of all the most eminent men of that Time, who were famous in their Generation, carefully, and safely laying up, in the faithfull Treasury of his Memory what he heard from them; which was an evident presage of his future abilities, and that he was likely to become a skilfull Master Builder in the House of God, and an excellent Instrument of winning many souls unto Christ.

Gene-

He was acute in the Greek, and well skilled in the Hebrew and Arabick A good Lin- Tongues, which he sparingly made use of, only upon necessary occasions, not for guist. ostentation, to amuse such hearers as seem to be most pleased with what they least understand; But for the more full, and clear opening of the Text, and giving the genuine interpretation thereof from its Divine Originals, whose full sense, and native Elegancies (proper to every Language) cannot always be expressed to the life without recourse to the Fountains. For as St Austin saith, Habet omnis Lingua sua quaque propria genera locutionum, qua cum in aliam linguam transferuntur, videntur absurda: Every Language hath its proper kind of speeches, which being translated into another Tongue, seem to be absurd.

He very well understood, and spake the Italian, French, and Spanish Tongues, and had read very many grave, and witty Authors in each of them, whereof, by the excellency of his wit, he made admirable use even in Divinity (which What use now adays many illiterate persons, most audaciously, and presumptuously de- he made of file with unhallowed hearts, and unwashed hands) he being able by an holy them. Alchemy (as was said of Virgil, Aurum de Stircore: he could draw gold out of a Dunghil) to make every thing serve to his powerfull persuasions, wherein he excelled.

He likewise studied History, Politicks, and Physick, of all which he made excellent use in his amplifications, illustrations, and insinuations of more Divine Subjects. Every thing furnished him with more moving expressions of his sweet notions in Prayer, and Preaching, which made him a burning as well as a shining Light with greater brightness and lustre. A good Artist.

While he was yet a Fellow in Emanuel Colledge, in a due compliance with the pious Statutes of that House, he entred into the Office of the Ministry, His Ordina- Sept. the 24th, Anno Christi 1601, which he took not upon him as a shelter to save a Fellowship, but to gain souls unto God: For which purpose he immediately betook himself to that Evangelicall work of Preaching, for the His pre- most part at a place called Coxton, not far from Cambridg, and in some o- ching. ther places, thereabouts; where (besides the prosecution of his other studies, and performance of sundry exercises in the Colledge) he had preached twenty eight Sermons within the space of eleven moneths: which was a rare thing in those times, when the Fellows of Houses were rather hinderers than furtherers of so good a work, if undertaken by younger men.

After he was transplanted from that Nursery, and settled in a Pastorall His Grati- charg many miles distant from that University; to shew his thankfull acknow- tude. ledgment of the honorary supports of his breeding received from those famous Seminaries, he gave to the Library of Pembroke-Hall Great Basilis Works, Greek and Latine in two Volumes in Folio, with these Verses written in them, which discovered a specimen of his happy strain, and Genius of purer Poetry, as well as his gratefull minde:

*Qua mihi formasti teneros impuberis annos
Grande va, at gravida ingenii felicibus Aula
Pembrochia, Fas sit minimo, veneranda tuorum Ingentis tenuem officii deponere partem.*

And to Emanuel Colledge Library, he gave all the Councils in Greek, and Latine of Bipius Edition in Folio, in five Volumes, with these verses:

*Sacra Standarda, & studiis Domus hospita sacris
Emanuel, mihi qua juvenilibus arbitra capis
Culturam, comites, victum, & gratissima Musis
Otia porrexti! sic te nascentia porro
Fecundam claris mirentur secula natis,
Donato ut liceat tantillum reddere tantis.*

And to the University Library he gave all Gregory Nazianzens, and Gregory Nissens Works, Greek and Latine, in four Volumes in Folio, with these Verses:

*Accipe parva tui Opuscula, Mater, Alumni,
Sic te perpetua florentem pube, Nepotum
Sera Manus, Sophia lumen, morumq; Magistram, Artis Praesidium, Britonum decus, Orbis amorem: Delicias Regum, & fidei venerentur Asylum.*

His remove
to Wrington

Having thus traced his wayes, and procedure in the University, we must now follow him into the Country: For in September Anno Christi 1602, he was by the cleer, and good providence of God (without the concurrence of the plottings, and contrivances of cunning, or insinuating Friends) fairly, and freely called to the Pastorall charg of a great Flock at Wrington, a Market-Town in the County of Sommerfet, being presented thereunto by that Honourable, and famous Knight Sir Arthur Capel of Little Hadam in Hertford-shire, Great Grand-Father to the Lord Capel now living.

His Industry and Prudence.

There did he (in obedience to his Call) forthwith settle himself, and immediatly he set upon the work for which he was sent, viz. to instruct, and turn unto righteousness that great people, who had never before enjoyed the blessing of a Preaching Minister, or Ministry amongst them (which therefore required the greater skill, and industry of the spirituall Husbandman to manure, and manage, such an incultured plot) so that he was to them (if not to the whole Country adjacent) the first that by Preaching the Gospell, brought Religion into credit, and discovered to them the Heavenly Canaan, which before was to most of them a Terra incognita, as an unknown-land, and thereby left them much richer both in spirituals, and temporals than he found them. Insomuch that he might at length, in a proportion, say of that place as Augustus, the Emperour, did of Rome, Lateritiam reperi, marmoream reliqui: I found it built of bricks, but I left it built of marble.

His Contentment,

Master Crook having thus pitched, and fixed his Pastorall staff, as he never sought higher, or other earthly preferments (though his capacity, and credit was well known to be such as made him capable of, and opened a ready way for it) so he never accepted of any additions, or accessions of maintenance, or honour, though they were Honourably profered by such Persons as were able to have advanced him.

His holy life

As for the course of his Ministry, and deportment: His progress was answerable to his beginings: Yea, his works were most and best at the last: For as he Preached, so he practised: His whole life being but one continued Commentary upon his Doctrine, and an exemplary Sermon consisting of living words, or of words translated into works, as will further appear in its due place.

His esteem

Few men ever came into a place with greater expectation, which yet he not only satisfied, but exceeded it. Few men could draw after them those affections, and admirations which he did; which also were so far from cooling, and diminishing, as that they encreased, and that deservedly, to his last, rather than decreased amongst all that had learned Christ in humility, and truth.

And

And as for those few silly seduced ones, who were carried away towards his latter end, with a spirit of giddiness, through the secret, and subtle insinuations, and whisperings of false Teachers, in corners (who with as much ignorance as confidence delude the simple, by great swelling words of vanity, and uncouth phrases, abhorrent from Christian Religion, sobriety, and truth, and which wise men lament, while fools, who are ignorant of the depths, and methods of Satan, applaud, and admire) endeavoured in their virtigenous fits, to eclipse his credit, and splendour: yet his pious, and affectionate Essayes to reclaim them with the spirit of meekness, as also his fervent Prayers, and yearning Bowels for their reducing, turned all their revilings to his greater lustre, and glory, amongst all such as were able to discern of things that differ, and willing to approve the things that are excellent.

Not long after Master Crook's first settling in this his Pastorall charge, he happily married a Wife of his own Tribe, and after his own heart, who was the eldest daughter of that Reverend Master Walsh, an holy, and painfull Minister in Suffolk, a great, and rare Light in his time, and Famous for his Ministeriall labours, his fervent zeal, and abundant charity. She was a very prudent, and gracious woman, a most loyall, loving, and tender wife, zealous and active for his encouragement, credit, and comfort in all things, especially in his Ministry; To which she constantly bore such hearty respect, and reverence, as did much quicken, and enlarge him in the work of the Lord. She was also continually studious, and carefull to free, and ease him of all emergent occasions, avocations, and businesses of ordinary concernment, that so he might with the more freedom follow (what his soul most delighted in) his diviner employments, and enjoy himself, and Friends in his necessary relaxations. In a word, her behaviour was such as becometh holiness, a teacher of good things to the younger women, and in her Family a worthy pattern, and a great promoter of godliness in all that conversed with her, and to her Husband a meet help indeed, and so she continued all the dayes of their conjugall relation. Children he left none, besides those spiritually begotten unto Christ by his labours in the Gospell.

His Marriage.

His Wives character.

His great frequently, was almost beyond all example: For he constantly preached (if in health) thrice a week, besides his extraordinary labours on many emergent occasions which he cheerfully embraced, as rejoycing in all opportunities of doing good, and that abroad as well as at home.

His great pains.

In all his Sermons (which were many thousands) his expressions were choice, grave, solid, weighty, savoury, and seasonable: His applications home, and pertinent, strongly enforced, and set on from Divine authority by a sweet, and moving elocution, a masculine eloquence, fervent zeal, and strength of love to the souls of the hearers.

His manner of preaching.

He knew very well how to set forth καλὰ, καλῶς, abstruse points plainly, and how to manage κατὰ, κατ'αὐτὴν, plain truths elegantly; not in the words of mans wisdom, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth: Always speaking in Christ, as of God in the sight of God.

He was not like one that makes a Feast once a moneth, or once a quarter, letting his Family beg or starve in the intervals; Nor like such as visit the Pulpit twice every Sabbath day, yet bring no new matter with them scarce once a moneth; But still are setting on the same dishes with a little new garnish, even unto nauseousness: But our Master Crook, as he layed in richly, so he layed out liberally, and prudently, like a ready Scribe instructed in the Kingdom of God; Or a good Householder, who brings forth of his treasury, things both new, and old.

And albeit he could by his quick invention, profound Judgment, and faithful memory (things rarely meeting in the same man) dexterously dispatch that that

The Life of Master Samuel Crook.

that with little labour which costs other men much pains; Yet he seriously professed with rejoycing, that he never durst serve God with that which cost him nothing, well knowing that industry adds weight, and respect both to the matter, and speaker, whereby his words became as goads and nails fastened by that great Master of the Assemblies, which are given from one Shepherd.

His Motto. His Motto was, Impendam, & expendar: I will spend, and be spent, which he cheerfully verified. For he counted not his life dear in comparifon of preaching the Gospell, and of finishing his course with joy, and the Ministry he had received from the Lord Jesus, to testifie the Gospell of the Grace of God. When he was told by his Physician (who was very careful to preserve his life) that he might live longer if he would preach seldom: Alas! (said he) If I may not labour, I cannot live! What good will life doe me, if I be hindred from the end of living?

Et propter vitam vivendi perdere causam?

His Industry. When through age, and weakness, he was disenabled from travelling abroad, any more to perfume other Congregations with the sweet odours of his pretious ointment: And when by reason of his years, and infirmities, he might very well (as an emeritus miles) have sued out (even in the Court of Heaven it self) a Writ of ease, and have passed the rest of his dayes in rejoycing over his Triumphs, and Trophies: Yet would he never give over studying, and Preaching, till all strength of Body gave him over. Yea he often preached, even when his legs almost refused to carry him any more to Church, and that with much spirit, and unexpected vivacity, even as a mighty man refreshed with the Wine of Gods Spirit. And being (some years before his departure) sensible of the daily approaches of Death (which he long expected) to his exhausted, and decayed body, almost ready to be deserted of its Divine Soul; he did severall times preach his own Funerall Sermon (as supposing he should never preach more) and that not without tears, proceeding from the grief of his loving and beloved Hearers.

His hospitality. And when after such preaching, and rejoycing in it, he invited (as his constant manner was) such Ministers, and Friends as came to hear his Lecture, to his Table; he would force himself to sit with them (although for the most part he was forced to be silent, by reason of the expence of his spirits) and much rejoyced that he had once more imployed his Masters Talent, and enjoyed the precious society of Saints in whom was all his delight.

He used often, to say to his Friends, that rejoyced with him, and blessed God for him, That he was nothing but a voice, as being troubled at the decayes of nature growing upon him more, and more, whereby his feeble body was disenabled from serving his still active soul, and his Tongue being no longer able to speak out, at least not so often as he would have had it.

His Self-deniall. In his Ministry he never strove for vain glory, nor of men sought he praise, disdaining to stoop to the lure of popular applause: And therefore he ever shuned those more gay, and lighter flourishes of a luxuriant wit (which like beautifull weeds, make a fair shew at a distance, but stink neerer hand) wherewith the emptiest Cells affect to be most fraught; Like those, who for want of wares in their shops, set up painted boxes to fill up empty shelves. He fed not his flock with airy dews of effeminate Rhetorick (which a masculine Orator would shake off from his Pen, and lips (as St Paul did the Viper from his hand) nor yet with the jerks, and quibbles of a light spirit, which he ever abhorred as the excrementitious superfluities of frothy brains, and unhallowed hearts: But he ever led them out into the green Pastures of solid, and savoury truths, as their necessities, and capacities did require. He had (and alwayes administred τὸ λογικὸν ἄδολον γάλα, rationally) unadulterated for Babes in Christ, καὶ τὴν σαρκαὶν τροφὴν, and strong meat for grown men.

He was a wise Master builder, who intending to raise a strong, and beautiful Fabrick, laid a solid Foundation, able, and sufficient to bear, and strength in his then all his superstructures. He therefore began his Ministry with a Strenuous Ministry: and perspicuous handling of such Texts as might discover to his People, the Divine Authority, sufficiency, purity, and Energy of the holy Scriptures, the ten Commandements, Articles of the Faith, the Lords Prayer, the Doctrine of the Sacraments, God in Trinity, his Decrees, Creation, Providence, of Sin, Christ, the New Covenant, the Fall of Man, the Mediator, the Gospel, Faith, Vocation, Regeneration, Justification, Adoption, Sanctification, Glorification; the Church, the last Judgement, the Christian Warfare, and such like: All which in process of time, he opened, and applied, sometimes more largely, sometimes more briefly; but alwayes profitably and sweetly, as a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, but rightly dividing the word of truth in a practical way.

Out of all which in his more mature, and riper years, greatest strength of parts, and depth of judgement, he (after many serious reviews) compiled that excellently compacted Systeme of Divinity in a Catechetical way, which he deservedly intituled, The Guid to true Blessedness. And out of it he again extracted that lesser Catechisme which he often used, with very profitable, and delightfull explanations, both in his Congregation, and Family. A most profitable, course of teaching, and learning the true knowledge of Christ.

He went also through many intire Scriptures (which doth greatly try, and improve a Divine) and the more obscure any place was, the greater was his diligence, with happy success to bring light unto it. Difficulties which are Lions in the way of the sluggard, proved but spurs to his Industry.

He went over many of the Psalms, as the 1st. 2d. 4th. 6th. 10th. 14th. 19th. 22d. 45th. 50th. 122d. 127. The twelve first Chapters of Isay, Lamentation the 3d. Habbacuk the 3d. the Prophesie of Malachy. Matthew the 5th. 6th. and 7th. Chapters. All the Examples both of good, and bad men in the Scriptures, for imitation of the former, and detestation of the latter. All the Miracles, and Parables of Christ; All St. Johns Gospel (an admirable Commentary:) The twelfth of the Epistle to the Romans: the second Chapter of the Epistle to the Ephesians: the 2d. and 3d to the Colossians, the 2d to the Thessalonians Chap. 2. The Eleventh of the Epistle to the Hebrews: the 2d. and 3d Chapters of the Revelations, with many more, besides very many Texts suitable to the times on every occasion, being exceedingly happy in the choise, and prosecution of them.

Whensoever his Preaching day happened upon January, the 17. (which was his birth day) he still noted his years compleat, with this Penitentiall Epiphonema, ὁ Θεὸς ἐλεῖς μοι τὸ ἁμαρτανίον, God be mercifull unto me a sinner. A Memorable evidence of his pious sence of his own unworthiness in the sight of God, how much soever he was cried up, and esteemed by men. No excellency of natural abilities, no eminency of spiritual endowments, no acceptance of his labours ever puffed him up; but that he still walked in all Lowliness and humility towards all men, even in his greatest exaltations in the hearts of men.

Much might be said of his long continued course of Catechising, (that most profitable, and speedy way of implanting knowledge) by which he set up so great, and cleer a light in his Congregation, as will not only discover the wisdom, and excellency of the workman, and guid their feet in the wayes of truth, and holiness, who have been enlightned thereby: but much facilitate the further polishing of those living stones by succeeding Builders.

His Heavenly, and Divine spirit of Prayer, seemed to excel all other his excellencies, as will be attested, by all that heard him in publick: Or private, and that ever knew what a Prayer of Faith, Elevated to the highest pitch pitch by the Holy Ghost, Meaneth, whether they ever found any to excell him: Or, many to come near him. O! those penitent, unbowelling Confessions, earnest deprecations, petitions, panting-longings, and sighings after God, and his Grace; those mighty powerfull Arguments whereby he set all home; Feeling Thanksgivings; and divine Raptures, carrying up his soul to Heaven in the sacred flames of his own Sacrifices; sweetly perfumed with the Incense of him, who presenteth all the Prayers of his Saints on the Altar of Grace.

He first brought conceived Prayer into use in those parts, wherein he was so happy, so free from impertinent expressions, and unnecessary repetitions, so rich in piercing Supplications, pathetical thanksgivings, and Gracious wrestlings with the Almighty; yea, so dexterous to apply himself to prefer all suits, and to fit every occasion (like an exquisite Archer, able to shoot to an hairs breadth,) and so prompt, and full in expressing the very hearts of those that indeed joyned with him, in whatsoever they desired for themselves or others, as if, by a kind of transmigration, their souls had passed into his, and spake the very bottom of their hearts by his Tongue, which their own could not utter.

And this was such an opening, and warming of his Hearers hearts before his Sermons, and such a sweet closing up of all after his Preaching, as added much to the power, and profit of all his labours, and was to him a transcendent advantage in his whole Ministry. And truly his example took so well with all the godly Ministers that heard him, that they accounted it their great happiness, and honour to follow, and imitate him (with whom yet very few could keep pace) in that most important part of a Ministers work, and office, whereby they might be the more able to pour out their souls, and the souls of their people into the bosom of the Almighty.

labors.

In the Orb of his publick Ministry, this fixed Star shined brightly (without the least Eclipse, or retrograde motion) somewhat above forty seven years. A long time for such a Lamp to burn, as he did: but his long continuance Ministred a fair opportunity of bringing many stragling sheep into Christ fold, the great Shepherd of our souls. Once indeed the last Bishop of that Diocess gave a stop to his Tuesdayer Lecture, but God in mercy to many, set it on again, and cast him that interrupted it out of his place, while this painfull, and faithfull labourer went on with his work.

life.

So much for his publick Ministry: come we now to his private carriage. His whole Life was exemplary. Take him as a Christian, raised by his Ministeriall function to the height of a Beacon upon a hill, and so his light was great, and his smell very fragrant. He not only kept himself pure and unspotted of the world, but his light so shined, that both good men glorified God by seeking his good works, and wicked, and foolish men had their mouths stopped by his good conversation in Christ, and were even enforced to give in testimony to it, maugre their Malice against his holiness, and worth.

In his Family, towards the Wife of his bosom, he walked as a man of knowledge, Wisdom, and great tenderness of love: Towards the rest of his household, as David professed he would do in the 101 Psalms, and as a Bishop of Pauls description, 1 Tim. 3. and Titus 1. Yea towards all, as a worthy pattern of love, zeal, humility, Meekness, temperance, patience, gravity, and of every good work.

What his constancy, pains, and diligence was in his study, the fruits of the great, and long travell of his mind, his Works (which praise him in all the Gates of Sion) do speak to all the world, beyond that can here be spoken of him. For when all is said that can be spoken, of him, so much cannot be said as his own industry speaks.

His Family
carriage.

In his more vacant hours he was far from being idle, or unprofitable. Such as had the happiness (which was never denied to any that desired it) to partake take of his private discourses, never returned empty from his full Magazine, if they brought but vessels capable of the overflowings of his rich mind, and heart. Very many excellent Lights in the Church have lighted their Torches at his Celestial fire. Many young Scholars have been marvellously improved by his prudent, and pious directions, and encouragements in their studies, which now are become excellent instruments in the Church of Christ.

If after his preaching he found no mention made of his Sermon, by which he might Collect, that probably some benefit had been reaped by it, he would be much dejected, as if the fault had been in his preaching (even then when he seemed to excell himself,) rather than in his Hearers, and used to say, That if he had preached better, they would have profited more.

If any Christians, came to him for resolution in cases of Conscience, or for His skil to counsell in straits, or for comfort in spiritual desertions, or for healing of a comfort o- wounded spirit; as God had given him an excellent spirit of discerning to thers. judge of their condition, and of the most seasonable applicatives; and an exquisite dexterity to speak a word in season to the weary, and fainting soul; so he was never shie, Coy: Or difficult to be spoken with, nor lofty, or supercilious to any to whom he gave access; but shewed forth all tenderness, pity, and compassion to them: he heard them fully, and patiently, and wisely administred to their several distresses, and ever sent them away (as its said that Titus Vespasianus did his suitors) not only not grieved, but very well satisfied, and abundantly comforted.

He was very bountifull to his kindred that needed it, and then most, when their necessities swelled highest. He was very charitable, and open handed to the poor members of Jesus Christ: And albeit his Charity shined most to those of his own Flock, yet was it not shut up from strangers, but he was very liberal to them also as he found occasion. Yea, when he went abroad to bestow the Gospel freely upon other Congregations adjacent, such poor as he found to be Hearers (unless they were known to him to take up hearing as a Cloke to cover their idleness, and neglect of their callings) never went home empty handed, but he alwayes warmed, and cheered them with his bounty, as well as instructed them with his Doctrine. His Charity

How much he was given to Hospitality, Gentlemen, Ministers, Neighbours, Strangers, and the Poor, must needs give in such an ample testimony as will hardly be credited by such as knew him not, and are strangers to a bountifull heart. He spared from himself to administer unto others; minding more the wooing of many to receive benefit by his Ministry (some of whom might perhaps at first follow him for the Loaves) than to lay up largely for such as he should leave behind him: and choosing rather to be at a Continual charge to encourage men by his bounty) than to suffer them to be unprovided for, when they came to partake of his Ministry. His hospitality.

When he conversed with Ministers, his Humility usually put him into the place of a Learner: But in Learning he taught, and by teaching he learned more. He was so good, and skillfull a Chymick, that he seldom parted with such company, till he had gotten something by them: yet were they sure to be the greatest gainers, and he alwayes accounted it the best bargain, when others were gainers by him. His humil- ty.

His constant, and continuall preaching, seldom allowed him the much desired opportunity of hearing others: but when he could enjoy that benefit, he greedily laid hold of it: and then would this painfull Bee, gather Hony from every Flower, making a good use of the meanest gifts, and improving his own rich Talent by dipping it into theirs. Nor was he ever heard, to slight or disparage the labours of any the least of his Brethren, that sincerely endeavoured to bring in souls unto Christ: But alwayes he encouraged them, and as he found cause, informed, and directed them, and that in a prudent, and taking way, to their great advantage.

His Mirth.

In his mirth (to which he sometimes unbended himself to Recreate his over-wearied mind, that with renewed strength he might return to his more serious, and severer studies) he strictly observed the bounds of honesty, civility, modesty, and the gravity of his place; well considering, that the least dead fly in the Apothecaries Choicest Oynment, causeth it to send forth an unpleasing savour.

His Table-Talk.

The Table was usually the place of his greatest liberty in his kind, yet even there he would still interlace Mirth with some sprinklings of a more serious wit, which might instruct as well as exhilarate, and make cheerfull; and contained all within the limits of sobriety, without biting Sarcasmes, or unbecoming scurrility. And usually he closed all with reading some portion of Scripture, and giving some short, and profitable instructions thereupon, which might administer Grace to the Hearers, and leave a sweet savour, and relish upon their spirits, and whole converse.

His Character.

To give you a true, and full Character of this whole deportment in few words. He was a good, and a faithfull Steward in his Masters house, always abounding in the work of the Lord; A Pillar in the house of his God, never weary of his Lords work, but best pleased when he had done most service. His conversation was immaculate, and unblamable: His behaviour uniform, and universally pious. He was grave without austerity, pleasant without levity: Courteous without dissembling: Free in discourse where he might profit, yet reserved where he saw cause: He was seldom the first speaker although he was best able to speak. He loved usefull discourse, but abhorred froth, and babling. Hewas witty without vanity, facetious without girding, or grieving of others. He knew his place, yet was not insolent: Resolute he was, but not willfull: He maintained his authority, but was not haughty. A great Master he was of his own Passions, and Affections, and thereby abundantly furnished with the more abilities, and embellishments that most attract, and maintain the dearest love, the deepest reverence, and highest respect. He was a great admirer of Learning, and Piety in others, though they were far below himself in both: His affections were above, though he were below: He conversed more with Heaven than with earth while he remained on it, and is now, A Crown of Glory in the hand of the Lord, and a Royall Diadem in the hand of his God, as being an ornament unto Heaven it self.

His long life

He lived in the world seventy five years (within one moneth,) in which long race he saw many sad changes, and sore storms beating hard upon the Church, tossed with tempests, and not yet at Anchor. But never was David more distressed for his dearest Jonathan, than this man of Bowels was for the Calamities of the dear Spouse of Christ. He was most incessantly inquisitive after the Churches estate in all Countries; A sad Lamentor of all her afflictions; A daily Orator, and mighty Advocate for her at the Throne of Grace, and never enjoyed himself, but when he descried her under sail towards some Creek, or Haven, wherein she might find comfort, and rest: being much in Prayer and Fasting for her full reformation, and perfect deliverance.

His sympathy.

Prayer and Fasting.

Some good hopes whereof he conceived in the prosperous achievements of the Great Gustavus Adolphus, late King of Sweden (semper Augustus.) But when he by the sad, and unsearchable providence of the onely wise God, suddenly and untimely fell, in the full carriere of his Victories and of the Churches hopes, and that the Christian world was by his fall hurled from the height of so great expectation, he continually mourned over the unhappy setting of that glorious Northern Star, as a sad presage of all the inundations of miseries since befallen, and that still are rising higher, and higher upon the Church of Christ, the quick, and deep sence whereof lay close upon his heart to his dying day.

Neither

Neither was he without his sufferings, and dangers in our uncivil Civil Wars. He was affronted by rude Ruffians, and bloody minded Souldiers, who tyrannized over him in his own house; Not permitting him quietly to enjoy himself, and his God in his private study, to which he often retired, not only from their insolencies, but from their Blasphemies: Even thither would they pursue him with drawn swords, vowing his instant Death; for not complying with them in their bloody engagements. Yet it pleased that gracious God whom he had so faithfully served, to preserve him for further service, and to make that an hiding place for his preservation which they intended for his slaughter house, and after all, to bring him to his end in peace.

When he had faithfully served his Generation, by the will of God, in the Gospel of his Son, for above forty seven years, he was gathered to his Fathers in a good old Age, full of Days and Honour, by a blessed, and happy Death (the certain result of an holy life) Decemb. 25. Anno Christi 1649. the day formerly used for celebrating the Nativity of his great Lord and Master, the Lord Jesus Christ.

The last Testimony, of the Peoples great love to him must not be forgotten, by any that desire to preserve his precious memory in their hearts with honour. This amply appeared by their great lamentation, and mourning for him in his sickness, and at his Death, and sad Exequies. His Funerall was extraordinarily celebrated, not only by the voluntary confluence, of the greatest number of People that ever crouded into the spacious Fabrick of that Church; And by many Hundreds more there assembled about the door, which were unable to get in: But by multitudes of Gentlemen, and Ministers, all striving to out-mourn each other, standing about his Hearse with tears, recounting his excellent Labors, his fruitfull Life, their great profiting by him (as sometimes the widows about Peter, weeping, and shewing the coats, and garments which Dorcas made while she was with them) every one aggravating their griefs, and losses in his gain, and striving who should honour him most in bearing his Body to the bed of Rest.

The Testimony given him at his Interment, by him who performed that last office of love with many tears, and which he knowingly spake from his long, and intimate acquaintance, and conversing with him almost forty years together, take with you for a close in that Ministers own words out of the Pulpit.

‘Although (said he) Funeral Orations are commonly, either the vain flourish of mercenary tongues, or the weak supports of an emendicated fame, And since good mens works shall praise them in the gates, it is but to light a candle to the Sun: And since bad mens works cannot be covered with so thin a daub; It is but to paint a rotten Post. Yet some Testimony is due to such as having obtained a more eminent place in Christs mystical Body, the Church, have also been instruments of more than ordinary good to his Members. Samuel died a Judge, a Prophet; a Great man, a Good man in Israel, and all the Israelites were gathered together (to Honour his Obsequies) and lamented him, and buried him, 1 Sam. 25. 1.

‘To say nothing then of so rich a Cargazon, so full a Magazine, so rare a subject of all commendable qualities, and admirable endowments, were a frustrating of your eager expectations.

‘To say little, were a wrong to him that deserved so much; To say much, were both a derogation from his merits, that may challenge, and an imputation upon your Judgements and affections that will acknowledge more due, than I can now deliver. Nevertheless, since the memoriall of the Just is a sweet perfume, give me leave to strew a few of his own flowers upon his Hefse, and I will discharge your Patience.

‘His holy Life, and conscientious courses, his constant Labors thrice a week in the Ministry of the Gospel (unless in times of sickness, or necessitated restraint) for the space of forty seven years (wherein he could give an account of above seven thousand elaborate Sermons preached by him) are so well known, not only in this, or the neighbour Parishes, but through the whole County, and the Country round about, that I need not mention them.

‘Few men ever ran so long a Race without cessation, or cessation, so constantly, so unweariedly, so unblamably.

‘All which time he was a burning, and a shining light, joyfully spending, and being spent for the good of Gods people. Many, many of whom he hath guided to Heaven before him, who received the beginnings of spiritual life from his Ministry; And many more shall walk in that light after him.

‘And from his splendid Lamp, divers faithfull Ministers (some Triumphant before him, some Militant after him) have lighted their Candles: His Tuesdays Lecture being more profitable to teach usefull Divinity than an Academy, whereby he did not only, Dolare lapides, sed Artifices.

‘Two things (rarely met in one man) were both eminent in him: A quick invention, and a sound judgement, and these accompanied with a clear expression, and a gracefull elocution. To which Integrity, and Humility being joyned, made him a transcendent Ministry, and a compleat Christian.

‘In his sickness (full of biting pains, which he bore with great Patience) it was his greatest grief that God had taken him off from his labour, which was his life and joy. His heavenly mind (like the heavenly bodies) counted his work no weariness. If he were weary in work, he was yet never weary of work. His spirit was still willing when the flesh was weak: And he often used to say in his health, Si per hanc viam mors, sum immortalis: And in his weakness, Odi artus, fragilemque hunc corporis usum desertorem animi.

‘And when he saw no more ability for labors, he accounted it superfluous to live; And chearfull, not only yielded, but patiently desired to die in a satiety, and fulness of life; not as meat loathed (as many times natural men do) but as a dish, though well liked, that he had fed his full of.

‘He had his intellectuals strong in a weak body; Witness his last Swan-like song in this place, the sweet Doctrine of our Adoption in Iesus Christ, on Rom. 8. 16. (so far he had gone in that Chapter) most clearly, and accurately delivered, and aptly distinguished from Justification: and Sanctification Yet that day, October 16. going to Church, and sensible of his own weakness, he said to a dear Friend (who told him that he came to see, and hear him) perhaps it may be my last; As to all our loss, it was indeed.

‘And as if his motion in Gods work, had been natural, he was more quick, more vigorous toward his Center, and, like the Sun, shewed his greatest light, when he was nearest his setting.

‘His last Ministerial duty privately done in great weakness of Body (unable to go to the Church) was the Baptizing of two children, wherein he streamed such beames of Divinity; Sounded such bowels of Humanity, shewed such sweetness of affection to his charge, that I seriously wished his whole Congregation had heard him, in this departing farewell, And being told how well it was approved, he replied with tears, in great humility, Lord, what am I? What am I?

‘To divers of his loving Neighbours, visiting him, he often protested, that Doctrine that he had taught them, was the truth of God, as he should answer at the Tribunal of Christ, whereunto he was hastening, exhorting them
‘to

‘to stand fast therein, as he most affectionately prayed for them, professing of ‘them with joy, I have kind friends, kind neighbours, Lord reward them all,
‘and grant they may find mercy with him in that day.

‘His desire was to give to his Neighbours (if enough could have been ‘had) his Printed Catechism, which (to my knowledge) hath had the ap‘probation, and commendation of the profoundest, and accutest Judgements ‘in both Universities; And well it might, being a compleat Body of Orthodox ‘Divinity, and to have this assertion of the Apostle Peter written before it, ‘--- Exhorting, and testifying that this is the true Grace of God wherein ye ‘stand--- and to subscribe his name to it.

‘After he had in himself received the sentence of death approaching (which ‘he chearfully did, when he saw no more likelihood of Labour) he desired
‘his Friends not to pray for his life; But pray God (said he) for Faith,
‘for Patience, for Repentance, for joy in the Holy Ghost; And the Lord heard ‘him in that he desired; For he was a rare pattern in all these, as (amongst ‘many others) these gracious words of his may witness, Lord (said he) cast ‘me down as low as Hell in Repentance, and lift me up by faith to the highest ‘Heavens in confidence of thy salvation.

‘I wish our proud, presumptuous, impenitentiaries had heard him crying for ‘Repentance, and seen him weeping for Grace. It might, perhaps, have ‘melted their stony Hearts.

‘As he was full of days, so was he full of grace, full of peace, full of as‘surance, The Tuesday before he departed, This day seven night (said he) is ‘the day on which we have used to remember Christ's Nativity, and on which ‘day I have preached Christ; I shall scarce live to see it; But, For me was ‘that Child born, unto me was that Son given, who is, Wonderfull, Counsellor,
‘the Mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of peace.

‘And no less full was he of true Honour for his worth, and work-sake in ‘the hearts of all that feared God; His memory shall be blessed, and his ‘name a sweet perfume to posterity, when the names of his reproachfull ‘scorners (the last brood of Beelzebub) shall rot, and stink, and be an abhor‘ring to all flesh.

‘He is now come to the end of his labour, and the beginning of his rest.
‘His work was with his God, and his reward shall be from his God: Now
‘he sees the blessed, and blessing face of God, which is the glory of all ‘sights, and the sight of all glory.

‘Thus set this bright Occidental Star: A Star of the first Magnitude. One ‘of the first, and I dare say (without envy of any, that knew him, and ‘that knows himself) one of the most glorious Lights that ever shone in this ‘Orb, or ever is like to arise in this Horizon. O! how is such a publick ‘loss to be lamented! Of such a Champion of Christ! Such an Atlas of ‘the Truth! that set his shoulders to support the shaken pillars thereof in ‘these days of abounding, and abetted errors.

‘Well may this Parish mourn, well may this Country, well may his ‘Friends, his Family: Well may we of the Ministry bewail it, saying, O
‘my Father, my Father, the Chariots of Israel, and the Horsemen thereof! Ab ‘my Brother, my Brother! I am distressed for thee, very pleasant hast thou been ‘unto me: Lovely and gracious in Life, lovely and glorious in Death.

— Hen tua nobis
Morte simul tecum solatia rapta!

‘I end in one word of Exhortation.

‘You that have heard the joyfull sound of this (now broken) silver ‘Trumpet so long, remember that by the space of forty, and seven years, ‘he ceased not to warn every one with tears: Remember what he hath spoken while

'while he lived: Remember what he yet speaks being Dead? Hold fast
 'the form of sound words which ye have heard of him. Hold fast the 'faithfull word which he hath taught you. Hold fast the Profession of 'your Faith without wavering. Take heed of wolves: Beware of Dogs:
 'Take heed of men: Men of perverse minds, speaking perverse things to 'draw disciples after them. Although the Prophets die, yet Gods word 'spoken by them shall live for ever, and will do good to them that walk up-
 'rightly, and shall take hold on them that obey it not

'So let us leave our Brother in the Bed of Honour, till the joyfull morn'ing of the Resurrection of the just, when he, amongst them that have turn'ed many unto righteousness, shall shine as the Stars, for ever, and 'ever.

His Birth.

This care in his Parents was quickly above expectation answered in the first-fruits of their Sons proficiency, who more, and more encreased great hopes concerning him throughout the whole time of his minority, wherein he was trained up in the Grammar School of Derby.

From Trinity he was removed to Emanuel, that happy Seminary both of Piety, and Learning: and in that Society the Lord gave him favour, so that in due time he was honoured with a Fellowship amongst them; when he was elected to it, after a diligent, and strict examination according to the Statutes of the Colledge; wherein this is not unworthy the taking notice of; that when the Poser came to examine him in the Hebrew Tongue, the place that he made trial of him by, was that portion of Scripture, Isaiah the third, wherein the Prophet declaims against the pride, and haughtiness of the Daughters of Sion; which Text hath more hard words in it, than any other place of the Bible, within so short a compass: and therefore, though a present construction, and resolution thereof, might have put a good Hebrician to a stand, yet such was his ability, and dexterity, as made those hard words facill, and easie, and rendred him a prompt respondent. And this providence is further remarkable about him, That whereas his Father (whose calling was towards the Law) was but obscure, and had not many Clients: that made use of his advice in Law-matters before; it pleased God after his Sons going to Cambridge, to bless him with great practice, so that he was very able to keep him there, and to allow him full, and liberal maintenance. The Life and Death of Master John Cotton, who died Anno Christi 1652.

John Cotton was born at Derby, Anno Christi 1584. His Parents were persons of considerable quality, and of good reputation. Their condition, as to the things of this life, competent: neither unable to defray the expences of his education in good literature, nor so abounding, as to be a temptation on the other hand unto the neglect thereof: and God, who had then predetermined this then tender plant, to be a Tree of Life, for the seeding of many thousands, and to be a chosen Vessel to bear his Name before the Nations, in way thereunto, he inspired his Parents with an effectual sollicitude concerning the ordering of this their Son in his minority.

His Birth.

This care in his Parents was quickly above expectation answered in the first-fruits of their Sons proficiency, who more, and more encreased great hopes concerning him throughout the whole time of his minority, wherein he was trained up in the Grammar School of Derby.

His Education.

When he was about the age of thirteen, he was admitted into Trinity College in Cambridge, where his industry was great, and his profiting in the Arts, and Languages above his equals, so far commended him to the Master, and Fellows, as that he had undoubtedly been chosen Fellow of that College, had not their extraordinary expence about building of their great Hall at that time put it by, or at least, deferred their election, until some longer time.

He goes to Cambridge.

From Trinity he was removed to Emanuel, that happy Seminary both of Piety, and Learning: and in that Society the Lord gave him favour, so that in due time he was honoured with a Fellowship amongst them; when he was elected to it, after a diligent, and strict examination according to the Statutes of the Colledge; wherein this is not unworthy the taking notice of; that when the Poser came to examine him in the Hebrew Tongue, the place that he made trial of him by, was that portion of Scripture, Isaiah the third, wherein the Prophet declaims against the pride, and haughtiness of the Daughters of Stan; which Text hath more hard words in it, than any other place of the Bible, within so short a compass: and therefore, though a present construction, and resolution thereof, might have put a good Hebrician to a stand, yet such was his ability, and dexterity, as made those hard words facill and easie, and rendred him a prompt respondent. ## The Life of Master John Cotton.

His prudence.

compeers will leave him behind: and though he quicken it, there are still those that are before him: But he was, not only a lover of Labour, but Communicative of his Learning, and therefore he proved a diligent Tutor, and had many young Students committed to his care. He was a Didactical man, both able, and apt to teach: And truly ability to instruct youth argues a Wise man: and to be willing to teach, argues a good man: For goodness is communicative: And such was his Academical dexterity, that he could impart (as Scaliger speaks) the felicities of wit to his hearers, so accomodating and insinuating the matter in hand, as that his Pupils might both perceive their profiting, and taste the sweetness of that wherein they profited. Thus by his School stratagems he won the hearts of his Pupils both to himself, and to a desire of Learning: They were each to other as the Prophets, and the sons of the Prophets: His Pupils were honourers, and lovers of him: and he was a Tutor, a Friend and a Father unto them.

His Conversion.

The manner of his Conversion, according to his own relation was thus. During his residence in the University, God began to work upon him by the Ministry of Master William Perkins of blessed memory: But the motions, and stirrings of his heart which then were, he suppressed, thinking that if he should trouble himself with matters of Religion, according to the light he had then received, it would be an hinderance to him in his Studies, which then he had much addicted himself unto. Therefore he was willing to silence those suggestions, and inward Callings which he had from Gods Spirit, and did wittingly defer the prosecution of that work until afterwards. At length, as he was walking in the fields, he heard the Bell toling for Master Perkins who lay a dying, whereupon he was secretly glad in his heart, that he should now be rid of him, who had (as he said) laid siege to, and beleagured his heart. This became matter of much affliction to him afterwards, God keeping it upon his Spirit, with the aggravation of it, and making it an effectual means of convincing, and humbling him in the fight, and sense of the natural enmity that is in mans nature against God.

Afterwards hearing Dr. Sibs (then Mr. Sibs) Preaching a Sermon about Regeneration, wherein he shewed, First, what Regeneration was not, and so opening the state of a meer Civil man, Master Cotton saw his own condition fully discovered, which (through Gods mercy) did drive him to a stand, as plainly seeing himself, destitute of true Grace, all his false hopes, and grounds now failing him: and so he lay for a long time, in an uncomfortable despairing way: And of all other things this was his heaviest burden, that he had wittingly withstood the means, and offers of Grace, and mercy which he found had been tendered to him; Thus he continued till it pleased God to let in a word of Faith into his Heart, and to cause him to look unto Christ for his healing, which word also was dispensed unto him by the same Doctor Sibs, which begat in him a singular, and constant love to the said Doctor, of whom he was also answerably beloved.

That which first made him famous in Cambridge, was his Funeral Oration for Doctor Some, Master of Peter House, which was so accurately performed in respect of Invention, Elegancy, Purity of Stile, Ornaments of Rhetorick, Elocution, and Oratorious beauty of the whole, as that he was thenceforth looked at as another Xenophon, or Musa Attica, throughout the University.

His Oratory.

Some space of time intervening, he was called to Preach at St. Maries, where he Preached a University Sermon, with high Applause from the Academical Wits, insomuch as the fame of his Learning grew greater, and greater. And afterwards being again called to Preach in the same place (as one Oration of Pericles left his hearers with an Appetite after another) so the memory of his former accurate Exercises, filled the Colledges, especially the young Students, with a fresh expectation of such Elegancies of Learning, as made as made them flock to the Sermon with an Athenian Itch after some new thing, as to the ornaments of Rhetorick, and abstruser notions of Philosophy. but his Spirit now favouring of the Cross of Christ more than of humane Literature, and being taught of God to distinguish between the Word of Wisdom, and the Wisdom of Words, his speech, and preaching, was not now with the enticing words of mans wisdom, but in the demonstration of the Spirit, and of power.

The disappointed expectation of the Auditory, soon appeared in their countenances, and the discouragement of their non-acceptance, returned him unto his Chamber, not without some sad thoughts of heart: Where yet he had not been long, but lo, Doctor Preston (then Master Preston) knocks at his Chamber door, and coming in, acquainted him with his spiritual condition, and tells him how it had pleased God to work effectually upon his heart by that Sermon: After which Doctor Preston ever highly prized him, and both fully, and strongly, closed with him: which real Seal of God unto his Ministry much comforted his soul, far above what the present less acceptance of the Auditory had dejected him, or their former acceptance had encouraged him.

He converted Doctor Preston.

His Concio ad Clerum, or Latine Sermon, which he preached when he proceeded Bachelor of Divinity (which was after he had been at Boston about half a year) was very much admired, and commended. His Text was, Mat. 5. 13. Vos estis sal terra: quod si sal insatuatus fuerit, quo salietur? Ye are the salt of the earth; but if the salt hath lost its flavour, wherewith shall it be salted? In handling of which Text, both the weight of the matter, the Elegancy of Phrase, Rhetorical strains, Grave, Sweet, and spiritual pronunciation, rendred him yet more famous. The like did his answering of the Divinity Act in the Schools, having a very acute Opponent [Master William Chappel] to dispute with him. So that in Cambridge the name of Master Cotton was much set by.

His great Learning.

Unto this earthen Vessel, thus filled with Heavenly Treasure, the Inhabitants of Boston in Lincolnshire, made their address, saying, Come and help us. And in that Candlestick the Father of Lights placed this burning, and shining Light: To whom he removed from Cambridge about the twenty eight year of his Age. At his first coming, he met with some obstructions from the Diocesan, then Bishop Barlo, who told him that he was a young man, and therefore unfit to be set over such a divided people: Master Cotton being ingenious, and undervaluing himself, thought so too, and purposed to return to the Colledge again: But some of his Boston Friends, understanding that one Simon Biby was to be spoken with, who was near to the Bishop, they presently charmed him, and so the business proceeded without any further trouble, and Master Cotton was admitted into the place after their manner in those days.

His call to Boston.

Two things are here not unworthy our observation, which Master Cotton would sometimes speak of to his Friends: First, That in the beginning of his Ministry, he was exercised with some inward troubles which much dejected him. And indeed, good spirits are much bettered by their conflicts with the worst of spirits: Spiritual Preachers are often trained up in the School of temptation. So true is that Theological maxime, Meditation, Prayer, and Temptation, make a Divine. This Dispensation of the All-wise God, he afterwards found, not only to be beneficiall unto him, in preparing his heart for his work: but also, that it became an effectual means of his more peaceable, and comfortable settlement in that place, where the people were divided amongst themselves, by reason of a potent man in the Town, who adhered to another Cambridge man, whom he would fain have brought in. But when he saw Master Cotton wholly taken up with his own exercises of spirit, he was free from all suspicion of his being Pragmatical, or addicted to siding with this or that party; and, so both he and his party began to close more fully with him.

His Temptations.

Secondly, Whereas there was an Arminian party in that Town, some of whom were witty, and troubled others with Disputes about those points; by Gods blessing upon his Labours in holding forth positively such truths, as undermined the foundations of Arminianism, those Disputes ceased, and the Tenets of Arminianism were no more pleaded for. Thus God disposeth of the hearts of hearers, as that generally they are all open, and loving to their Preachers at their first entrance.

His Troubles.

For three or four years he lived, and preached amongst them without opposition. They accounted themselves happy (as well they might) in the enjoyment of him, both the Town and Country thereabouts being much bettered, and reformed by his Labours. But after he was not able to bear the Ceremonies imposed, his Non-Conformity occasioned his trouble in the Bishops Court at Lincoln, from whence he was advised to appeal to an higher Court: and imploying Master Leveret (who afterwards was one of the Ruling Elders of the Church of Boston in New England) to deal in that business, and he (like Jacob) being a plain man, yet piously subtile to get such a spiritual blessing, so far insinuated himself into one of the Proctors of that high-Court, that Master Cotton was treated by them, as if he were a Comformable man, and so was restored unto Boston.

His La-
bours.

After this time he was blessed with a successfull Ministry unto the end of twenty years. In which space he on the Lords Dayes in the afternoons, went over the whole Body of Divinity in a Catechistical way thrice, and gave the heads of his Discourse to those that were young Scholars, and others in the Town, to answer his questions in publick in that Congregation: and after their Answers, he opened those heads of Divinity; and finally applied all to the edification of his people, and of such strangers as came to hear him. In the morning of the Lords Dayes, he preached over the first six Chapters of the Gospel of St. John: The whole book of Ecclesiastes; The Prophecie of Zachariah, and many other Scriptures; and when the Lords Supper was administered (which was usual every moneth) he preached upon, 1 Corinth. 11. & 2 Chron. 30. the whole Chapter, besides some other Scriptures concerning that Subject. On his Lecture days, he preached through the whole first, and second Epistles of John; The whole Book of Solomons Song; the Parables of our Saviour set forth in Matthews Gospel to the end of Chapter the 16th. comparing them with Mark and Luke: He took much pains in private, and read to sundry young Scholars that were in his House, and to some that came out of Germany, and had his house full of Auditors: Afterwards, seeing some inconvenience in the Peoples flocking to his House, besides his ordinary Lecture on the Thursdays, he preached thrice more in publick on the week days: viz. on Wednesdays, and Thursdays, early in the mornings, and on Saturdays at three a Clock in the Afternoon. Only these three last Lectures were performed by him but some few years before he had another famous Colleague.

His Indu-
stry.

He was frequent in Duties of Humiliation, and Thanksgiving: Sometimes he continued five or six hours in Prayer, and opening the Word: So indefatigable was he in the Lords Work: so willing to spend, and be spent therein. Besides, he answered many Letters that were sent him far and near, wherein were handled many difficult Cases of Conscience, and many doubts cleared to great satisfaction.

His holy Duties.

Gods Pro-
vidence.

He was a man exceedingly beloved, and admired of the best, and revered of the worst of his Hearers. He was in great favour with Doctor Williams, the then Bishop of Lincoln, who much esteemed him for his Learning and when he was Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, he went to King James, and speaking of Mr. Cottons great Learning and worth; the King was willing, notwithstanding his Non-conformity, to give way that he should have his Liberty in his Ministry without interruption: which was the more remarkable considering how that Kings Spirit was carried out against such ways. Also, the Earl of Dorchester, being at Old Boston, and and hearing Master Cotton preaching about Civil Government, he was so affected with the wisdom of his words, and spirit, and that he did ever after highly account of him, and put himself forth what he could in the time of Master Cottons troubles to deliver him out of them, that so his Boston might still enjoy him as formerly, but his desires were too strongly opposed to be accomplished.

About this time he married his second Wife, Mistriss Sara Story, then a Widow. He was blessed above many in his Marriages, both his Wives being pious Matrons, Grave, Sober, and faithfull. By the first he had no children: The last, God made a fruitfull Vine unto him: His first-born was brought forth far off upon the Sea, in his passage to New England: So that he being childless when he left Europe, arrived a joyfull Father in America: In memorial whereof he called his name Sea-born, To keep alive (said he) in me, and to teach my Son, if he live, a remembrance of Sea-mercies, from the hand of a gracious God: He is yet living, and entred into the Work of the Ministry. A Son of many Prayers, and of great expectation.

His Marriage.

The Corruption of the times being now such, that he could not continue in the exercise of his Ministry without sin; and the envy of his Maligners having now procured Letters Missive to convent him before the High Commission Court, which Letters a debauched Inhabitant of that Town undertook to serve upon him (who shortly after died of the Plague.) Master Cotton having intelligence thereof, and well knowing that nothing but scorns, and imprisonment were to be expected from them, according to the advice of many able heads, and upright Hearts (amongst whom that holy man of God, Master Dod, of blessed Memory, had a singular influence) he kept himself close for a time, in, and about London, as Luther sometime did at Wittenberg; and Pareus since at Anvilla: Yet was not that season of his recess unprofitable: For addresses during that time were made unto him privately by divers persons of worth, and piety, who received satisfaction from him in their Cases of Conscience of greatest concernment. And when he went into New England, it was not a flight from duty, but from evident danger, and unto duty: Not from the profession of the truth, but unto a more opportune place for the profession of it.

Histroubles

Gods judgement on a persecutor.

He flies in to New England.

When Master Cotton arrived at New England, his manner of entrance unto them was with much blessing. For at his first coming he found them not free from troubles about settling the matters both of Church and Commonwealth. At which time, being requested, he preached before the general Court: His Text was, Haggai 2. 4. Yet now be strong, O Zerubbabel, saith the Lord; Be strong, O Joshua the son of Josedek, the High Priest; and be strong all ye people of the Land, saith the Lord, and work: For I am with you saith the Lord of Hosts. And the Lord working mightily by this Sermon, all obstructions were presently removed, and the spirits of all sorts, as one man, were excited unanimously, and vigorously in the work of the Lord from that very day.

His arrivall in New England.

A speciall providence.

In order whereunto, the Court considering, that all the Members of that Republick, were also Church-Members, and therefore to be governed according to the Law of God, they desired Master Cotton to draw an abstract of of the Judicial Laws delivered from God to Moses, so far forth as they were of Moral, i. e. of perpetual, and universal equity; which according he did, advising them to persist in their purpose of establishing a Theocracy, i. e. Gods Government, over Gods people. From this time it was a usual thing for the Magistrates to consult with the Ministers in hard and difficult cases, especially about matters of Religion: yet so, as notwithstanding occasional conjunction, Religious care was had of avoiding confusion of Councils. After which time how usefull Master Cotton was to Old England, to New-England, to Magistrates, to Ministers, to People, in Publick, in Private, by Preaching, Magistrates and Ministers united.

ing, by Counsel, and resolving difficult questions, all know that knew him, and consequently saw the Grace of God evidently manifested in him.

His Labours

In the course of his Ministry in New Boston, by way of Exposition he went over the Old Testament to Isaiah the 30. The whole New Testament once through, and the second time to the middle of Hebrews the 7th. Upon the Lord Days, and Lecture Days, he preached through the Acts of the Apostles: The Prophecies of Haggai, Zechariah, Ezra, the Revelations, Ecclesiastes, Canticles: The second, and third Epistles of John, The Epistle to Titus; Both the Epistles to Timothy; The Epistle to the Romans, with other Scriptures. The presence of the Lord being with him, and Crowning his Labours with the Conversion of many Souls, and the edification of thousands. Besides these aforementioned Labors, he hath many pieces in Print, which being well known, need not be here enumerated.

The success of the Ministry.

His youth was unstained, whence he was so much the more capable of being an excellent Instrument in the Church in his elder days. He that will do good in the Church, must have a good report of them which are without, lest he fall into the reproach, and snare of the Devil, 1 Tim. 3. 7. St. Augustine tells us, that A good life is requisite in respect of our selves, but a good name is requisite in respect of others. We may be good men if we have a good Conscience, but we are not like to do much good, if we have not a good name.

His learning and studiousness.

He was a general Scholar, studious to know all things, the want whereof might in one of his Profession be denominated ignorance; and piously ignorant of those things, the Nescience whereof made him more Learned. Deservedly therefore is his praise great in all the Churches, that he not only gave himself to the acquiring of Learning, but exceeded many that had done virtuously therein. He excelled in the greater part of the Encyclopædia.

His piety.

Those which best knew his goings out, and his coming in, cannot but give a large testimony to his Piety. He was a Saint (above many of the Saints) manifestly declared in the Consciences of the Godly amongst whom he walked, to be the Epistle of Christ, known and read of all men. In his house he walked with a perfect heart. He was an example to the Flock; clothed with love, and humility, amongst his Brethren: One of a thousand in respect of his worth: But (as it is reported of Doctor Whitaker) as one of the multitude in respect of his facile, and companion-like behaviour. Both ability, and modesty in such a degree, are not ordinarily to be found in the same man. Others with much affection beheld the beauty of his face, whilst himself was as one who knew not that his face shined. He was a Father, Friend, and Brother to his fellow-Elders, and a shining Light before all men.

His humility.

His Family carriage.

He well knew that a Bishop ought not to be defective in the well government of his Family: He must be one that Rules well his own house: In conscience whereof, he himself rising betimes in the morning, as soon as he was ready, he called his Family together (which was also his practice in the evening) to the solemn worship of God, reading, and expounding, and occasionally also applying the Scriptures unto them, alwayes beginning, and ending with Prayer. In case of sin committed by child or Servant, he would call them aside privately (the matter so requiring) laying the Scriptures before them, and causing them to read that part which bore witness against such an offence: Seldome or never Correcting in anger, that the dispensation of godly Discipline might not be imputed, or become less effectually, through the intermixing of humane passion.

His Sabbath employment.

He began the Sabbath, on the Saturday evening: And therefore then performed Family duties after Supper, being larger then ordinary in Exposition, after which he Catechized his children, and Servants, and then returned into his Study. The morning following, Family-worship being ended, he retired tired into his Study untill the Bell called him away. Upon his return from the Congregation, he returned again into his Study (the place of his Labour, and Prayer) unto his private devotion; Where (having a small repast carried him up for his dinner) he continued till the tolling of the Bell. The publick service being ended, he withdrew for a space into his aforementioned Oratory, for his sacred addresses unto God, as in the forenoon: Then came down, and repeated the Sermon in his Family, prayed, and after Supper sang a Psalm, and, towards bed time, betaking himself again to his Study, he closed the day with Prayer. Thus he spent the Sabbath continually.

In his Study, he neither sate down unto, nor arose from his Meditations without Prayer: Whilest his eyes were upon his Book, his expectation was from God. He had learned to Study, because he had learned to Pray. An able Student is a Gospel Student, because unable to Study without Jesus Christ. The barrenness of his Meditation at some times, yea though his endeavour was most intense upon a good matter, convinced him: Whence it was, that his heart musing upon the same Subject at another time, his Tongue became as the Pen of a ready writer. As he was not (comparatively) wanting in parts, Learning, or Industry; So was he most carefull not to trust in them, but to fix his dependance wholly upon God. Herein he was not unlike to blessed Bradford who studied kneeling. Another Synesius, who was wont to divide his life between Prayer and his Book. Like unto Paul, Not sufficient of himself to think any thing as of himself, and professing all his sufficiency to be of God. But we will give our selves (say the Apostles) continually unto Prayer, and to the Ministry of the Word. Men of labour, they were, and men of Prayer.

His dependance on God.

As any weighty cause presented it self either in the Church, Commonwealth, or his Family, he used to set dayes apart to seek the face of God in secret: Such were the bowels of this spirituall Father, the Horsmen, and Chariots of this Israel. He might say with Paul, He was in fastings often. His conversation upon earth was a trading in Heaven. A demonstration of the praises of him who hath called him. A temperature of that holiness, sweetness, and love, which continually gained upon the hearts of many spectators. The habituall gracious scope of his heart in his whole Ministry, is not illegible in that usuall subscription of his at the end of all his Sermons, Tibi Domine. Unto thy Honour, O Lord. A tast of the divine Soliloquies between God and his soul, you may please to take notice of from these two transcribed Poems left behind him in his Study, written with his own hand.

His Fastings

A thankfull acknowledgement of Gods providence.

In Mothers womb thy fingers did me make,
And from the womb thou didst me safely take:
From breast thou hast me nurst my life throughout,
That I may say I never wanted ought.

In all my meales my Table thou hast spread,
In all my lodgings thou hast made my bed:
Thou hast me clad with changes of array,
And chang'd my house for better far away.

In youthfull wandrings thou didst stay my slide,
In all my journeys thou hast been my guide:
Thou hast me sav'd from many an unknown danger,
And shew'd me favour even where I was a stranger.

The Life and Death of

*In both my Callings thou hast heard my voice,
In both my matches thou hast made my choice:
Thou giv'st me sons, and daughters, them to peer!
And giv'st me hope thou'lt learn them thee to fear.*

*Oft have I seen thee look with mercies face,
And through thy Christ have felt thy saving grace:
This is the Heav'n on earth, if any be:
For this, and all, my soul doth worship thee.*

Another made by him (as it seems) upon his remove from Boston into that wilderness of New England.

*I now may expect some changes of miseries,
Since God hath made me sure,
That himself by them all will purge mine iniquities
As fire makes silver pure.*

*Then what though I find the deep deceitfulness
Of a distrustfull heart?
Yet I know with the Lord is abundant faithfulness,
He will not lose his part.*

*When I think of the sweet, and gracious company That at Boston once I had,
And of the long peace of a fruitfull Ministry
For twenty years enjoy'd.*

*The joy that I found in all that happiness
Doth still so much refresh me,
That the grief to be cast out into a wilderness
Doth not so much distress me.*

*For when God saw his people, his own at our Town,
That together they could not hit it,
But that they had learned the language of Askelon,
And one with another could chip it.*

*He then saw it time to send in a busie Elf,
A Foyner to take them asunder:
That so they might learn each one to deny himself
And so to piece together.*

*When the breach of their Bridges, and all their Banks aröw,
And of him that School teaches,
When the breach of the Plague, and of their Trade also Could not learn them to see their breaches.*

*Then God saw it time to break out on their Ministers,
By loss of health, and peace;
Yea withall, to break in upon their Magistrates,
That so their pride might cease.*

A Disputation is well called the Sieve of truth: So in his Polemical labors he was a seeker thereof in love: His scope was, the Glory of God, Unity of the Church, and the edification of men, not the ostentation of wit. It was his holy ambition, not to seem to be learned, but indeed to be bettered. A sincere seeker of light, not of victory. Witness his Brotherly acceptance of Doctor Twiss his Examination of Master Cottons Treatise of Predestination, from whom he acknowledged that he received light thereby, and was ready to attest the great abilities of the Doctor, that Star (if any in this age) of the first magnitude. It is true, Master Cottons mind was then exercised about the point of Reprobation. Touching the point of Election, it is sufficiently known that he was not only Orthodox, but also clear. As there were of old that pretended the Predestinarian Heresie to have had it's rise from St. Austin, and Grevinghovius of late blushed not to say of famous Doctor Ames, who was Arminianorum malleus; Amesius Pelagianizat. Doctor Ames playes the Pelagian: So, the wonder is less, if this sound, and judicious Divine hath not escaped the imputation of Arminianism from some, notwithstanding the redundant Testimony of his Doctrine, and generally of all that knew him, to the contrary; Yea, that occasionally he hath been heard to say, by Testimony yet alive, and above exception, That he looked at Arminianism as another Gospel, and directly contrary to the Covenant of Grace. What Melancthon sometimes said to Eccius, may be here truly applied to him: Master Cotton in his Disputations sought not his own Glory, but Gods Truth. So able an Opponent was rare, so candid an Opponent was more rare. He that fell into his hands, was likely to fall soft enough ordinarily (except through his own default) not likely to lose any thing save his error.

His Moderation.

A mans wisdom makes his face to shine: He had an happy, a quick comprehensive, and benign understanding, as having received the manifestation of the Spirit, for the service and profit of others. To discover the mind of God, and therewith the sentence of Judgment, in matters too hard for inferior Judges, was no small part, both of the worth, and usefulness of him that was to minister before the Lord. So it seemed good to the Father of Lights to make this happy Instrument, not only to excel his Brethren, but in many respects, upon this account, to excel himself: A Grace so far acknowledged in him, as that all sorts, both the Magistrates, and private Persons, whether learned, or unlearned, exercised with their respective Cases of conscience, waited under God, in a special manner upon his lips for knowledge, and sought the Law at his mouth. So equal a contention between learning and meekness, is seldom visible in any one person. The consciences of those that knew him being appealed to, he will be acknowledged amongst the meekest on Earth in his dayes.

His Wisdom.

So conspicuous was this Grace in him, that multitudes beheld it, without making extraordinary mention thereof. It is true, he had an advantage above many in his natural constitution, and it's influence from his education, heightened intellectuals, and moralities, was not inconsiderable; But that which gave the being of meekness, which sanctified, and perfected all, was the Grace of Christ. He was of an accurate apprehension, and therefore sensible of, but yet so little in his own sight, that he was not easily provoked by an injury. Sensibleness of dishonor done to God by sin, or of what the offender had done unto himself by sinning, left such impressions upon him, as that his taking notice of any injury done unto himself, was not usually taken notice of. He had well learned that lesson of Gregory: It is better many times to fly from an injury by silence, than to overcome it by replying. It was Grynæus his manner, to revenge wrongs by Christian taciturnity. If inferiors expostulated unnecessarily with him, he would patiently hear them, and give them a Brotherly account, pacifying their minds with a gentle Grave, and and respective answer. Take one instance in this kind instead of many; unto one of his hearers, then sick of singularities, and therefore the less able to bear sound Doctrine, following him home, after his publick labours in the Congregation, and instead of better encouragement, telling him that his Ministry was become either dark, or flat: He gently answered? Both, Brother; without further opening his mouth in his own defence, choosing rather to own the imputation, than to expostulate with the Imputer.

His Modesty.

Disputations are great trials of the spirits of Intelligent men. Hooper and Ridley were patient Martyrs, but somewhat impatient Disputers. The Synod held at Cambridge in New England, as matters were then Circumstanced; was unto this good man an hour of temptation, above what had ordinarily befallen him in his Pilgrimage: yet such was his eminent behaviour throughout, as argued in the Consciences of the Spectators singular patience, and left him a Mirrour for the temperament, mildness, and government of his Spirit. Pious meekness fits for Church Society. Yet though he was so gentle, meek, and flexible, that men might persuade him above what could be expected usually from a man of his worth, in the things of God he was steadfast, and unmovable. The Sanctuary cannot want the fire that is from Heaven; neither may it be touched with the fire that is from Hell. Gentleness of disposition, when actuated by Christ, makes us so much the more acceptable, and profitable unto man: But if the Spirit withdraweth his assistance, we fall short of reaching Gods ends, and the seasonable suppressing of exorbitancies. If this good man had alwayes had that voice sounding in his heart, which one wished that mild Lantgrave of Hessen might have heard from the Smiths forge: Duresce, duresce; Utinam & Lantgravius durescat: Happily there are that think some disorders, disturbances, and irregularities might, by Gods blessing, have been prevented.

But ordinarily, and in matters of greatest weight the Lord was with him. Though his forbearance was both observable, and very imitable in things that concerned himself; yet he could not forbear them whom he knew to be evil. An experience whereof he manifested when some Heterodox spirits, by their specious discourses about Free-Grace and subtle Concealings of their Principles, so far deceived him into a better opinion of them than there was cause, as that notwithstanding they fathered their Errors upon him in general, and abused his Doctrine, to the Countenancing of their denial of Inherent Grace in particular, yet was he slow to believe these things of them, and slower to bear witness against them. But so soon as the truth herein appeared to him, hear his own words taken out of his Letter to Master Davenport; The truth is (saith he) the body of the Island is bent to backsliding into Error, and Delusions; The Lord pitty, and pardon them, and me also, who have been so slow to see their windings and subtil Contrivances, and insinuations in all their transactions, whilst they propagated their opinions under my expressions diverted to their constructions. Yea such was his ingenuity, and piety, as that his soul was not satisfied, without often breaking forth into affectionate bewailing of his infirmity herein, in the publick Assemblies, sometimes in his Prayer, sometimes in his Sermon, and that with tears.

His Candor.

He was a man of an ingenuous and pious candour, rejoicing (as opportunity was offered) to take notice of, and to bear witness to the gifts of God in his Brethren, thereby drawing the Hearts of them to him, and of others to them, and that to the encouragement of them, and the edification of many. He did not think himself a loser by putting honour upon his Fellow-Labourers, but was willing that they should communicate with him in the love and esteem of the people. He was not only a son of Peace, enjoying continually the feast of a good conscience, with serenity and tranquility of affections at home; but also a peace-maker, qualified by the graces aforementioned, to be a choice Instrument, in the hand of the Prince of Peace amongst the Churches, where where if any difference arose, Mt. Cotton was ready (being called therunto) to afford his help for the composing of them; and had a singular faculty and ability therein, by reason of that excellent wisdom, and moderation of spirit which God in Christ had given him, whose blessing also did ordinarily Crown his endeavours with good success.

He was one, the reality of whose profession, gave many cause to bless God for the kindness of the Lord shewed unto all sorts by him. His portion in the things of this life, exempted him from being an object of envy in that behalf; yet behold Quantum ex quantillo, so much communicated out of so little; we may not here be altogether silent concerning the Grace of God bestowed upon him, whereby according to his power, yea above his power, he was beneficent unto others, but especially to those of the Household of Faith. The Gospel opened his heart, his lips, and the doors of his house. He well remembered that Scripture, There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty. As also, The liberal soul shall be made fat. Amongst others, his Fellow-Labourers in the Ministry were entertained with peculiar contentment. By one instance see his spirit in the rest, A certain Minister who had gotten into the fellowship of that eminent man Master Arthur Hilderham, and many other godly Preachers, being acquainted with their secrets, betrayed them into their Enemies hands. This man coming afterwards to Boston, and meeting with Master Cotton, this Gains had not the heart to speak to him, nor to invite him to his house, which (he said) he never neglected to his knowledge; to any stranger before, much less to any of his own order.

Some years since there was brought unto Boston a report of the necessity of the poor Saints at Sigataa, A little Church whereof the Reverend Master White was their faithfull Pastor, which suffered much extremity by reason of the persecution of their then prevailing Adversaries, forcing them from Bermudas into the Desert Continent. The sound of whose distress was no sooner heard of, but you might have heard the founding of his bowels, with many others, applying themselves to a speedy Collection, and sending it to them on purpose for their seasonable relief, the sum was about seven hundreds pounds, two hundred whereof he gathered in the Church of Boston, no man in the Contribution exceeding, and but one equalling his bounty. And it was remarkable that his Contribution arrived there the very day after those poor people were brought to a personal division of that little Meal then remaining in the Barrel, and not seeing (according to man) but that after the eating thereof they must dye a lingering death for want of food; and upon the same day their Pastor had preached unto them (it being the Lords day) upon that Text, Psal. 23. The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want. At such a time the good hand of the Lord brought this succour to them from afar.

A special Providence.

Whilst he was in Old England, his eminent piety, the success of his labours, and his interest in the hearts both of superiours, inferiours, equals, drew upon him much envy, and his Non-conformity added thereunto, so that he was delivered in a great measure to the will of his Adversaries, who gave him not over till they had bereaved him of much of his livelihood, his liberty, Country, and therewithall of the sweet Society of lovers, Friends, and many wayes endeared acquaintance, more precious to him than life itself.

His suffering from men.

Yet the measure of the afflictions of Christ, appointed to be suffered by him, was not so fulfilled; but lo, in the time of his exile, some Brethren, provoked by the censure of Authority, though justly, and not without tears inflicted upon them, singled out Master Cotton as the object of their displeasure, who (though above other men) declining irregular and unnecessary interesting himself in the actions of the Magistrate, and (while opportunity lasted endeavouring their healing, yet they requited him evil for good, and they (at least some of them) who were formerly companions with him in the tribulations of that Patmos, yea respecters of him, had taken sweet Counsel together, and they had walked in the house of God as friends. Hence was he with Tongue and pen, blasphemed by them, for whom he formerly intreated, and for whom, he both then, and afterwards wept, and put on sackcloth.

As touching any Tenet wherein he may seem singular, remember that he was a man, and therefore to be heard and read with judgement, and happily sometimes with favour. St. Hierom makes a difference between reading the writings of the Apostles, and of other men. They (saith he) alwayes speak the truth, these as men, sometimes erre. But no man did more placidly bear a Dissentient than he. It contributes much towards the fuller discovery of truth, when men of larger capacities, and greater industry than others, may be permitted to communicate their Notions; onely they should use this liberty by way of disquisition, not of Position, rather as searchers after Scripture-light, than as Dictators of private opinions.

But now this Western Sun hastens to his setting: Being called to preach at a neighbour Church, he took wet in his passage over the Ferry, and, not many hours after, he felt the effect of it, being seized upon, with an extream illness in his Sermon time. This sad providence, when others bewailed, he comforted himself in that he was found so doing. Decet Imperatorem stantem mori. It is the honour of a Commander to dye standing. St. Austins usual wish was, that when Christ came, he might find him, Aut precantem, aut pradicantem, either praying, or preaching. Calvin would not that when the Lord came, he should find him idle. After a short time he complained of the inflammation of his lungs, and thereupon found himself Asthmatical, and afterward Scorbutical (which both meeting in a complicated disease, put an end to his dayes) insomuch, that he was forced to give over those comforting drinks which his stomach could not want. If he still used them, the inflammation grew unsufferable, and threatened a more sharp, and speedy death. If he left them, his stomach forthwith ceased to perform its office, leaving him without hope of life.

His Sick-

By these Messengers he received the sentence of death, yet in the use of means he attended the pleasure of him in whose hands our times are; his labours continued whilst his strength failed: November the 18. he took in course for his Text the four last Verses of the Second Epistle to Timothy, Salute Prisca and Aquila, &c. Giving the reason why he spake of so many Verses together, because otherwise he said, he should not live to make an end of that Epistle. He chiefly insisted upon those words, Grace be with you all; so ending that Epistle, and his Lectures together. For upon the Lords day following, he preached his last Sermon upon Joh. 1. 14. And the Word was made Flesh, and dwelt among us (and we beheld his Glory, as of the onely begotten Son of the Father) full of Grace and Peace.

Now he gave himself wholly to prepare for his dissolution, making his Will, and setting his house in order: When he could no more be seen abroad, all sorts, Magistrates, Ministers, Neighbours, and Friends afar off, and those near at hand, especially his own people resorted to him daily, as to a publick Father. When the Neighbour Ministers visited him (in which duty they were frequent) he thanked them affectionately for their love, exhorting them also, as an Elder, and a witness of the sufferings of Christ, to feed the Flock, encouraging them, that when the chief Shepherd shall appear, they should receive a Crown of Glory that fadeth not away.

Finding himself to grow weak, according to that of James, he sent for the Elders of the Church of Boston, to pray over him; which last solemn duty was per-performed, not without much affection, and many tears: Then (as Polycarp a little before his death) said, That he had served Christ fourscore and six years, neither had he ever offended him in any thing) so he told them (through Grace, he had now served God forty years, it being so long since his Conversion) throughout which time he had ever found him faithful to him; and thereupon he took occasion to exhort them to the like effect, that Paul sometime did the Elders of Ephesus, a little before they were to see his Face no more, Take heed therefore to your selves, and to all the Flock, over which he hath made you overseers, to feed the Church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood. Particularly he lamented, that the love of many, yea, and of some of their own Congregation, was grown cold towards the publick Ordinances, calling upon them so much the more for their watchfulness in that respect; which done, he thanked them for their loving, and Brotherly assistance to him in their holy fellowship, and commended them to the blessing of God.

His pious Consort, and those Olive-Plants that sate lately about his Table, now gathered together about the Bed of a dying Husband, and departing Father. This was his last solemn transaction with man in this world: Silver and Gold (though he wanted not) he had not much to give them, but the blessing of a righteous Parent he left with them.

That Reverend and Godly man, Master Wilson (who excelleth in Love, as Master Cotton did in Light) the faithful Pastor of that Church, taking his last leave of him, and most ardently praying unto God that he would lift up the light of his countenance upon him, and shed his love into his soul, he presently answered, He hath done it already, Brother.

His work now finished with all men, perceiving his departure to be at hand, and having nothing else to do, but onely that great work of dying in the Lord, he wholly composed, and set himself for his dissolution, desiring that he might be permitted to improve that little remnant of his life without impediment to his private Devotions, and divine Soliloques between God, and his Soul; and for that end he caused the Curtains to be drawn, and a Gentleman, and Brother of that Congregation that was much with him, and Ministred to him in his sickness, he caused to promise him that the Chamber should be kept private. But a while after, hearing the whispering of some Brethren in the Room, he called to that Gentleman, saying, Why do you break your word with me?

Not long after (being mindfull no doubt of that great helpfulness which he received from that aforementioned Brother throughout his visitation) he left him with this farewell, The God that made you, and bought you with a great price, redeem your body and soul unto himself. These words were his last words, after which he was not heard to speak, but lying some hours speechless, he quietly breathed out his spirit into the hands of him that gave it, December 23. Anno Christi, 1652. being entred into the Sixty eighth year of his Age.

The Life and Death of Doctor Hill, who died Anno Christi, 1653.

His Paren-
tage.

His Education.

After Thomas Hill was born at Kingston in Worcestershire, of Godly Parents; and David accounted it his great honour, and blessing to be the Son of Gods Handmaid, Psal. 86. 16.

His Parents dedicated him unto God from his Child-hood, designing him to the work of the Ministry, and in order thereunto, they trained him up in School-learning in the Country; and being there well fitted, they sent him to Emanuel Colledge in Cambridge, where the Rose was not cankered in the bud, his youth not corrupted, nor debauched, as too many are: But this morning (like that 2 Sam 23. 4.) was without clouds, not sullied with any noted mis-carriage; but on the contrary, as it is said of Sampson when young, that the Spirit of the Lord began then to move him, Judg. 13. 25. So in his then sober, and studious behaviour, the Sun looked out betimes in that Summer-morning, and through Gods Grace (otherwise than it oft falls out in nature) he gave promising hopes of an after clearer day.

His Proficiency.

This being taken notice of by the Governours of the Colledge, they thereupon, after examination had, chose him Scholar of the House, he (as his Saviour) still growing in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and man. And then after some good time spent in his private studies in the Colledge, for his further perfecting, and the more happy seasoning of his Spirit, he went and sojourned with that man of God (now also with the Lord) Master Cotton at Boston in Lincolnshire, where, by Gods rich blessing upon his most godly directions, and example, and the society he had with him, and other eminent Christians in that place, he was much improved and furthered, as otherwise, so especially in Heavens-way, which happily went along with him to his journies end.

He is chosen Fellow
of Emanuel.

Upon his return from thence to the Colledge, it was not long before he was chosen Fellow with general approbation, though upon a most strict, and double examination, more (I think) than ever was in that Colledge before, or hath been since, though it still is, and ever hath been, according to the Statutes, very strict, and serious, and which hath been blessed to be a special means of holding up true worth, and learning in that happy Society.

A carefull
Tutor.

And now, through Gods good hand of providence, Leading and strengthening him, he proved a diligent, painful, and successful Tutor of very many Pupils, and divers of them persons of quality, who since have proved great blessings both to the Church and Common-wealth: And thus as he was before a pattern to young Schollars, so after he was a Tutor, no diligence was wanting whereby he might be instrumental to Gods Glory, and the good of those who were committed to his charge.

Bur

But this our wise Master-builder, satisfied not himself as a Tutor in polishing of buildiers, but as a faithful and painful Minister, he laboriously endeavoured to square other lively stones for Gods Temple, 1 Pet. 2. 5. and so as he read to Schollars in the Colledg, he also diligently and conscionable preached to a neighbour Congregation [St. Andrews] in the Town, so that many poor souls long after had cause to blefs God for him.

His labour in the Ministry.

Nor was he an Hireling to flye when the Wolf came, but when the Plague in this time of his ministry raged in the Town, he still continued with them in his ministerial employment; The better Shepherd he, who not only fed the sound, but also healed and bound up the torn and weak of the Flock.

This Alabafter Box of precious Oyntment thus powred out, filled the whole House with its Odour, and the sweet Fragrancy of it did spread abroad, so that now he came to be more taken notice of by many, both great, and good Men, and so by some of Eminent Worth, and Honour, he was called to the Pastoral Charge of Tichmersh in Northampton-shire where he laboured faithfully in Gods Hearvest; for the space of about eight or nine years, and partly by Preaching and Conversing up and down with others; but especially with his own Parochial Charge, He proved a great blessing, not only to that Town, but also to the whole Country, in every place where he came, spreading a good Saviour, and leaving it behind him.

His remove to Tich-mersh.

During the time of his being at Tichmersh, he sometimes repaired to Warwick Castle, to that Noble Robert Lord Brook, who highly esteemed him, and in whose Family he grew acquainted with Mrs. Mary Willford, at that time Governess to the Lady Francis Rich (a young Lady of rare parts) Daughter to the Right Honourable Robert Earl of Warwick, and mutual affections growing betwixt them, he was married to her, who since his death, was re-married to the Reverend, Learned, and Pious Dr. Tuckney, Master of St. Johns Colledge, and Regius Professor in Cambridge, my much honoured Friend, so that she hath been made happy in the enjoyment of two such Husbands, as few Women in our times have attained to.

His Marriage.

Whilst he was labouring (as aforesaid) in the Work of the Lord, for more publick Service, he was Chosen by the Parliament for one of that County to attend, and assist in the Assembly of Divines, called together by their Authority at Westminster; where being of very good use, he was often ordered by the Parliament to Preach before them at their publick Fast, and upon other their more solemn occasions. He was also Chosen by them to be one of their Morning week-days Preachers in the Abbey at Westminster, besides his constant Sabbath-days Labours in another great Congregation [St. Martins in the Fields] where he was a Blessing to many Thousands.

He is chosen to the Assembly.

From thence he was ordered to be Master of Emanuel Colledge in the University of Cambridge, which being not as spear large enough for his Activity, he was after a while removed to the Mastership of Trinity Colledge, where what great good he did, many that lived under him can give an ample Testimony; and that happy change proclaimed, from that confusion (by reason of those distracted times) in which he found it, to that orderly composure, and frame, in which, through Gods blessing, he left it. How solicitous he was for their best welfare, his frequent Preaching in their Chappel to them all, and his writing to their Seniors, speaks out fully; and many can bear witness how humble, and loving he was to them in his Carriage, how studious to keep up Colledge-Exercises, how Zealous to advance piety and Learning; and for that purpose, to countenance, and prefer such as he observed to be eminent in either.

Chosen to be Master
of Emanuel.
His remove to Trinity.

His Industry.

As he was a University-man, he was Zealously careful,

1. Of its Honour (which the Parliament can witness) in an unkindly contest about it; and also his care in collecting the decayed Antiquities of that University, whose paines in that Argument, it is pity but that they were communicated to the World.

His care of the University.

1. Of

2. Of its Privileges, as always, so especially in those two years together in which he was Vice-Chancellor, for which he suffered in some mens reputes unjustly.

3. Of its Profit and Emolument, being a special means of procuring to it from the Parliament, the Lambeth Library, which of Right (as it was judged) fell to that University; as also from a worthy Knight [Sir John Wollaston, Alderman of the City of London] a yearly stipend for a Mathematick Lecturer, and also large sums of money for the fitting of the Publick Library, that it might be of general use; for the accomplishment whereof, the University is more ways than one his Debtor.

& pacis
lib. 3 cap
11. Sec. 10.*

4. Lastly, Of the general good, and well-ordering of it. Surely it was his careful thought in private with himself, as appeared by his making it the subject of his Discourse with others; scarce was there a time wherein he met with his intimate, and judicious Friends, but he would be asking or proposing something that way. By this it appeared that his care was to keep up those Universities, which some in those times would have ruined; upon which occasion Grotius pronounceth many Christians to be worse than the Philistines; For they, 1 Sam. 10. 5. would let the company of Prophets alone, even where they kept a Garrison.

His found judgement.

As he was a Divine, he was found in the Faith, orthodox in his judgement, firmly adhearing to the good old Doctrine of the Church of England, even that which in the University was taught, and maintained by Famous Whitaker, Perkins, Davnant, Ward, and many others in their times; and in the other University amongst other great Names there, he was a great admirer of the Right Reverend and Judicious Dr. Robert Abbot, Bishop of Salisbury, and well were it, if there he had many more such Admirers. The Doctrine of Gods Sovereignty in his Decrees: Of his In-conditionate Free-Electing-Love: Of his Free-Grace against Free-Will, and the power of Nature in Spirituals: Of Justification by the imputed Righteousness of Christ, against the perfection of inherent Righteousness now attainable by us in this Life. Of perseverance in Grace, against the Apostacy of the Saints, and the like, were not with this pious, and learned man (as they are now called by some) Sects and Notions, matters only of Learning and Curiosity, and of the Presbyterian Faction; But of the Life-Blood of Faith, which at his Death (as he expressed to a Friend of his) he had singular comfort from, and in his Life firmly beleaved, constantly Preached, and by his Pen, endeavoured to maintain and defend, and that against the great daring Champion, of the contrary Errors, whom the abusive Wits in the University, with an impudent boldness could say, none there durst adventure upon, whose immodest scurrility, his learned Answer to that daring Adversary (which he had made so far a progress in) had shortly confuted, had not he by his more sudden Death been therein prevented.

His painful-
ness in the Ministry.

As a Minister of the Gospel: In his Preaching he was plain, powerful, spiritual, frequent, and laborious: For besides, what in that kind he did, as to the University in St. Maries, and in the Colledge Chappel, which was very happy in his often pains there; In the Town he set up one Lecture, every Sabbath Morning, in the Parish Church of St. Michael, performed only by himself, and cheerfully frequented by a great confluence both of Schollars and Townsmen; and another in the Church of All-Hollows every Lords-Day in the afternoon, in which he did bear at least the fourth part of the burden, and both of them Gratis, as there were many more such Lectures there performed, much about the same rate, weekly, by other pious learned men, and more indeed than are in any Town or City, upon those terms in all England, or are like to be there again; which is mentioned, that God may have the glory in the first place, and then for the honour of that Reformation, which so many do traduce, and spit at; as also of those more noble spirited Preachers, who so freely offered unto God that which did cost them so much, for which of men they received nothing.

But that place of Cambridge, did not bound the course of this our labourious Preachers Ministry, but (as it is said of our Saviour, Matth. 9. 35.) That he went about all Cities, & Villages teaching & preaching; and of St. Paul Rom. 15. 17. That from Jerusalem, and round about, and thas to Illyricum (which was in right line three Hundred and Thirty German miles, as Pareus upon the place computes it) he did fully Preach the Gospel; Imitating herein, as Ferom observes, his Lord and Master, that Sun of Righteousness, whose going forth is from the ends of the Heaven, and his circuit unto the ends of it, Psal. 19. 6. In these their blessed steps our Brother trod, and followed them in his painful Ministry, diligently Preaching when he had occasion to be abroad in remoter parts; but especially in many Towns and Villages nearer hand, round about the University, being a means to set up Lectures in many of them, and very often assisting in them; And as our Saviour is observed by some Divines, to have preached more frequently, the nearer he was to his departure; so this his faithful servant, as it were, presaging that his day would be but short, towards his evening, he made the more haste and speed in his journey towards his end, and yet more abounded in this work of the Lord, and now findes That his labour is not in vain in the Lord, 1 Cor. 15. 58. Thus of him as a Minister.

And lastly, as he was a Christian, he was active for God, as his Saviour, His Activity for God. Act. 10. 38. Going up and down, and doing good; and though otherwise modest, yet when the case required it, bold in a good cause. He was spiritual in communion, and a quickner of those with whom he conversed. Fruitful in discourse, by which the frame of his spirit might easily be discovered: Frequent in asking questions, which was both his humility, and Christian good husbandry, thereby to improve himself, his time, and company.

Affable he was to others, of much humility, and Low thoughts of himself, and of great integrity, and singleness of heart towards God, his Truth, Ordinances, wayes, and servants; of a very publick spirit, and much affected with the various conditions of the State, but especially of the Church and people of God. His Character.

He was a most loving Husband to his wife, and a dutifull son to his Parents, and in his life time very helpful to his other Relations. Many poor, His Charity both of the University, and Town, do now feel the want of his bounty, which they tasted of in his life time, and both they, and others had done more at his death (as appeared by his intentions of it in the draught of his Will) had not the suddenness of his change prevented it.

In a long continued Quartan, God had Knocked at his door, which in the interim of his recovery, awakened him to get all within ready against the coming of his Lord, which, though to his Friends was unexpected, yet found not him unprepared. In his short sickness, he expressed to an intimate Friend his great comfort, and joy in Gods discriminating Electing-love; and to a Reverend Doctor, about half an hour before his departure, who enquired of him about the setting of his outward estate, and inward peace, he readily, and without the least hesitancy, answered, that through the mercy of God in Christ, his peace was made, and that he quite rested in it, whereby it seems (as was said by one) he had his Faith at his fingers ends, and having before given all diligence to make his calling and Election sure, though he was somewhat suddenly called out of this life, yet had he an abundant entrance set open to him, into the everlasting Kingdome of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, departing His Death. quietly in the Lord, December, 18. 1653. As to himself he had lived a fruitful and gracious life, and therefore (as Clement Romanus speaks of some of the first, and best Bishops) he closed up all with a happy and blessed death, and as to others, he lived approved, and dyed desired, and very much lamented.

He was a great friend to the publication of the lives of godly and eminent Ministers, and Christians, and assisting to me in procuring information concerning the Lives of some of those Worthies whom I have formerly printed.

The Life and Death of Doctor Gouge, who dyed
Anno Christi, 1653.

His birth &
Parentage.

William Gouge was born in Stratford-Bow, in the County of Middlesex, November 1. Anno 1575. His Father, Master Thomas Gouge, was a godly Gentleman. His Mother, was the vertuous and pious Daughter of Master Nicholas Culverel, a Merchant in London, and she was sister to those two famous Preachers, Master Samuel, and Master Ezekiel Culverel; she had also two Sisters who were married to those two famous and learned Divines, Doctor Chaderton, the Master of Emanuel Colledge in Cambridge, and Doctor Whitaker the Regius Professor of Divinity in the same University; so that by the Mothers side he came of a stock of eminent Preachers.

His Education.

Our William Gouge in his younger years, was first trained up in Pauls School London, and was afterwards sent to a Free-School at Felsted in Essex, where he was trained up three years under the publick Ministry of his Uncle, Master Ezekiel Culverel, by whose labours he was much wrought upon, and if not first begotten, yet much built up in his holy Faith, as himself often expressed. From thence he was sent to Eaton, where he was educated other six years, during all which time he was more than ordinarily studious and industrious; For when other L'oyes upon play-days took liberty for their sports and and pastimes, he would be at his Book, wherein he took more delight than others could find in their Recreations, whereby he profited beyond many his equals.

At this time whilst he was a Schollar at Eaton, he was possessed with an holy fear of God, was conscionable in secret prayer, and in sanctifying the Sabbaths, and was much grieved at the ordinary profanation thereof by sports and pastimes which were then, and there, too much allowed, as he did oft-times in his life, with much thankfulness unto God, exprels.

His early
Piety.

From the School at Eaton he was chosen to Kings Colledge in Cambridge, whither he went Anno Christi 1595. and at the first entrance of his studies, he applied himself to Peter Ramus his Logick, and grew so expert therein, that in the publick Schools he maintained and defended him, insomuch as when on a time divers Sophisters set themselves to vilifie Ramus, for which end the Respondent had given this question. Nunquam erit magnus, cui Ramus est Magnus, which some of the Sophisters hearing, and knowing the said William Gouge to be an accute disputant, and a stiff defender of Ramus, they went to the Divinity Schools, where he was then hearing an Act, and told him how in the other Schools they were abusing Ramus, he thereupon went into the Sophisters Schooles, and upon the Moderators calling for another Opponent, he stepped up, and brought such an argument as stumbled the Respondent, whereupon the Moderator took upon him to answer it, but could not satisfie the doubt: This occasioned a Sophister that stood by to say with a cloud voice, Do you come to vilifie Ramus, and cannot answer the Argument of a Ramist? Whereupon the Moderator rose up, and gave him a box on the ear, then the School was all on an uproar, but the said William Gouge was safely conveyed out from amongst them.

He defended Ramus.

When he was Senior Sophister, he was chosen Moderator of the Sophisters Acts in the publick Schools, which was a place of great credit, and he began every Act with a solemn speech in Latine which was not usual in those dayes, and it added much grace to the Act.

His advancement.

The said William Gouge took his degrees in order, performing for every one of them, all those Exercises in the publick Schools, which by the Statutes of the University were required. And during his first three years, he kept the Colledge so close, that he lay not one night out of the walls thereof; and at the three years end he was admitted Fellow, and then went to visit his Friends.

He is Fellow.

He was a very hard Student, For as he was a lover of Learning, so was he very Laborious in his studies, sitting up late at night, and rising early in the morning.

His studiousness.

He continued in the Colledge for the space of nine years, and in all that time (except he went forth a Town to his Friends) he was never absent from morning Prayers in the Chappel, which used to be about half an hour after five a Clock in the morning; yea, he used to rise so long before he went to the Chappel, as that he gained time for his secret devotions, and for reading his Morning task of the Scriptures: For he tyed himself to read every day Fifteen Chapters in English out of the Bible, five in the morning, five after dinner before he fell upon his other studies, and five before he went to Bed; He hath been often heard to say, that when he could not sleep in the night time he used in his thoughts to run through divers Chapters of the Scripture in order, as if he had heard them read to him, and by this means he deceived the tediousness of his waking, and deprived himself also sometimes of the sweetness of his sleeping hours, though by that which administred to him better rest; and greater sweetness; for he preferred the meditation upon the word before his necessary food with Job, and before sleep with David.

He read 15
Chapters every day.

His meditation of the Word.

The like practice he used in the day time when he was alone, whether within doors, or abroad; for which end, as an help, he wrote in a little book which he alwayes carried about him, the distinct heads of every particular passage in every Chapter of the Bible, that so, when in any place he meditated on the word of God, and was at a loss, he presently found help by that little book. By this means he made himself so expert in the Text, that if he heard any phrase of Scripture, he could presently tell where it was to be found.

Besides, he had his set-times of study for the more difficult places of Scripture, that he might find out the true meaning of them, by which he attained to a great measure of exactness in the understanding of the Scripture.

He instructed others.

During his abode in the University he did not onely ply his own studies, but used also to send for others whom he observed to be ingenuous and willing, and instructed them in the Arts, whereby he was a great help to many, and brought them also to be better proficient.

He learned Hebrew.

While he was a Scholler in Kings Colledge, there came a Jew to Cambridge, who was entertained in sundry Colledges to teach them the Hebrew Tongue, and amongst the rest, in Kings Colledge, and Master Gouge took the opportunity of Learning of him, as many other of the Students also did: But most of them grew soon weary, and left him, onely the said Master Gouge kept close to him so long as he tarried. But when he was gone, those which before had lost their opportunity, now seeing their own folly, they came to Master Gouge, and entreated him to instruct them in the grounds of the said Language, which he accordingly did, and thereby himself became an excellent Hebrician.

A general Schollar.

And as he was expert in the Learned Languages, so was he likewise in the Arts, and all other necessary Literature, that he might have nothing of these to learn when he should come to make use of them.

His Diligence.

Being chosen a Lecturer both of Logick and Philosophy in the Colledge, he made conscience of observing all the times appointed by the Statute for reading, and never omitted any of them; and his readings were so exactly composed, that thereby he profited his Auditors exceedingly, and procured much credit, and applause from them; but withall, some envy from his successors, who by his example were now provoked to a more painful, and frequent reading of their Lectures, which in former times were performed seldomer, and in a more perfunctory manner. He was so cautious and strict in the whole course of his life, that thereby he got the name of an Arch-Puritan, which was the terme then given in scorn to those who were conscientious in their wayes.

In the first year of his Fellowship he began his Common-place book for Divinity, in which he made references of all which he read. He had also white paper bound betwixt every leaf of his Bible, wherein he wrote such short and pithy interpretations, and observations on the Text as could not well be referred to any head in his Common place Book.

He took such pleasure in, and was so addicted to a University life, that he was resolved to have spent many more years than he did, if not his whole life therein.

But his Father, after he had been two or three years Master of Arts, much against his minde, took him from the University, upon the occasion of a marriage which he prepared for him; and God by his providence turned this to the great good of his Church: For by this means, though it were somewhat late before he entred upon the Ministry, yet it is very probable that he entred upon, and exercised that sacred calling much sooner than he would have done, if he had been left to his own choice.

His wife was the daughter of Master Henry Caulton, a Citizen, and Mercer of London, but an Orphan when he married her.

Having thus changed his condition, and entred into a married estate, that he might not be distracted, nor impeded in his studies, by worldly business, he committed the whole care of his Family affairs to the management of his wife, and still applied himself wholly to his studies; and to the weighty businesses of his heavenly calling.

He lived with this his wife for the space of two and twenty years in much love, and peace, and had by her thirteen children, seven sons, and six daughters, whereof eight lived to mens, and womens estate, and were all of them carefully educated, and sufficiently provided for.

It was his earnest desire, and daily prayer to God for his sons, that they might all be preachers of the Gospel, so highly did he prize the function, that is so vilified and contemned by too many others; For he himself found such comfort, and content in that calling, that he thought no greater could be found in any other; And he often professed for his own part, that the greatest pleasure he took in the world was in the employments about the work of the Ministry, insomuch, as he was wont to say to divers Honourable persons of his acquaintance, and particularly to the Lord Coventry, Keeper of the Great Seal of England, that he envied not his great place, and employment.

His esteem
of the Ministry.

In the order and Government of his Family, he was very exemplary. His house was another Bethel, for he did not onely constantly, upon conscientious Principles, use morning and evening Prayer, and reading the sacred Scriptures in his Family; But also he catechized his Children, and servants, wherein God gave him a singular gift for their edification; For in teaching them he used not any set form, but so, as that he brought them whom he instructed, to express the Principles taught them in their own words; so that his Children (as Gregory Nazianzen saith of his Father) found him as well a spiritual as a natural Father. Yea never any servant came to his house, but gained a great deal of knowledge therein: So likewise did diverse others, who at the request of their Parents were instructed by him.

His Family
government.

He was in special manner a strict and conscionable sanctifier of the Lords-Day, and that not only in the exercise of publique Duties incumbent upon his Office, but also in the private sanctification of it in the Duties of Piety in, and with his Family, and secret in his Closet; and for this end, as he did forbear providing of Suppers the Eve before the Sabbath, that Servants might not be occasioned thereby to sit up late, so neither would he suffer any servant to stay at home for dressing any meat upon the Lords-Day for the entertainment of Friends, whether they were great or mean, few or many.

His sanctifying of the Sabbath.

On the Sabbath, after his publick Labours were ended, divers Neighbours (wanting helps in their own Families) came to his House, where he repeated his Sermons, after so familer a manner, that many have professed, that they were much more benefited by them in that his Repetition, than they were in the first hearing of them; For he did not use word by word, to read out of Notes what he had Preached, but would by Questions and Answers, draw from those of his own Household, such Points as were delivered; and this Exercise being ended, his constant course, was to visit such of his Parish as were sick, or by pain and weakness were disabled to go to the publick Ordinances, with each of whom, he would discourse of some spiritual and heavenly Subject suitable to their Condition, and after that, he prayed with them, wherein he had a more than ordinary gift, being able in apt words and expressions to commend their several cases unto God, and to put up Petitions suitable to their several needs.

His visiting the sick.

His usual course was, to pray eight times in the publick Congregation, on the Lords Days, for as he prayed before, and after each Sermon; so also before, and after his reading, and expounding the Scriptures, which he

His frequent Prayers.

performed, both in the forenoon and afternoon. And in his Family, his constant course vvas, to pray thrice every Lords Day, and that in a solemn manner, viz. in the morning, and evening, and after his repetition of the Sermons.

His Ordination.

He vvas ordained Minister in the two and thirtieth year of his age, and about a year after, vvvhich vvas in June, 1608. he vvas called to the exercise of his Ministry in the Parish of Black-Friars London, where he continued to his dying day, which was about five and forty years, and six months, never accepting of any other Ministerial employment, though he had the proffers of many great places: His manner of coming to Black-Friars, was thus.

His choice to Black-Friars.

That Parish being destitute of a preaching Minister, Master Hildersam, a famous, pious and powerful Preacher, being in company with some of the better sort of the Inhabitants of Black-Friars, who complained of their want, he told them that there was one living in Stratford-Bow, who was out of employment, whom he judged very fit for them. Hereupon divers of them went thither on the Lords day, where he frequently preached gratis, to help the Minister that then was there; and upon hearing of him they liked him so well, that making report thereof to their neighbours, he was by an unanimous consent (nemine contradicente) chosen to be their Minister, which election being made known to him, he accepted of it, and ever after shewed a great respect to the Inhabitants of that place.

Before Master Gouge came to them, they had not so much as a Church of their own to meet and hear the word of God in, nor any place wherein to bury their dead, but by such means as he used, the Church and Church-Porch, together with the Ministers house, and Church-yard (all which they enjoyed before but upon Curtesie) were bought in: so as now, they all, as their proper Inheritance, do belong to the Parish of Black-Friars. And five years after his coming thither, the old Church being found too little to entertain those multitudes that flocked thither from all parts of the City, to hear him, he was an instrument of purchasing in certain rooms adjoyning, whereby the Church was enlarged almost as big again as it was before. The sum of purchasing, new building, and beautifying of which Church amounted to above one thousand five hundred pounds, all which was procured, partly by Collections at his Lectures, and partly by the voluntary Contributions of his Parishoners, without any publick Collections in other places.

After this, there being divers rooms under the said Church belonging to several Land-Lords, he used such means as to purchase them also for the benefit of the Parish, which he did the rather to prevent all dangers that by wicked minded persons might have befalln Gods people in that Church, by any contrivance in the rooms under the same.

Thus they who had nothing of their own at his first coming, have now, through his procurement, the whole Church, the Church-porch, a Church-yard, a Vault to bury their dead in, a very fair Vestry with other adjacent rooms, besides the house wherein he himself dwelt so long as he lived, all which they hold as a perpetual Inheritance.

They have also a Lease of certain Tenements of a considerable value for three hundred years; all which were procured by his Prudence, Interest, and industry.

His self-denial.

Such was his love, and respect to this Parish, as though he was oft proffered places of far greater value, yet he refused them all, oft saying, That the height of his ambition was to go from Black-Friers to Heaven.

His industry

At his first coming to Black-Friers, being in the thirty third year of his age, he preached constantly, besides twice every Lords day, a weekly Lecture, viz. on the Wednesdaves in the forenoon, which for the space of about thirty five years was very much frequented, and that not only by his Parishoners, but but by divers City Ministers, and by sundry pious and judicious Gentlemen of the Innes of Court, besides many other well-disposed Citizens, who in multitudes flocked to hear his heavenly Doctrine, yea such was the fame of Doctor Gouge his Ministry, that when any Country Ministers, and godly Christians came to London about their affairs, they thought not their business fully ended, unless they had been at Black Friars Lecture.

And it pleased God to give such a blessing to his Ministry, that many of his Auditors, though living in other Parishes, upon Trial before sundry Elderships, have confessed, that the first seeds of Grace sown in their hearts, were by the blessing upon Doctor Gouges Ministry: And indeed herein God wonderfully honoured his Labours, by making him an aged Father in Christ to beget many Sons and Daughters unto God, and to nourish up others in the wayes of righteousness, Thousands having been converted, and built up by his Ministry.

His success in the Ministry.

He used also every month to preach a preparation Sermon before the Communion, on the Eve before each monthly Sacrament.

He was eminently laborious and faithful in the work of his Ministry even to his dying day, preaching so long as he was able to creep up into the Pulpit, As a tree planted in the House of the Lord, he was fruitful even in his old age Psal. 92. 13, 14. He often used to say in his latter dayes, that he could preach with more ease than he could get up into the Pulpit, the reason whereof doublese was this, because as the encrease of his Asthma dis-inabled him to go, so the encrease of his Intellectuals enabled him to preach with more ease than in his younger dayes.

His painful-
ness.

His preaching was alwaies very distinct: First, he opened his Text, giving the true and proper sense of it, then gave he the Logical Analysis of it, and then gathered such proper observations as naturally flowed from it, and properly and pertinently improved, and applied the same, by which method his Ministry proved very profitable to his Hearers. Many have acknowledged that in regard of the Logical resolution of his Text he went beyond all that ever they heard, as also in clearing difficult, and doubtful places of Scripture as they came in his way. And as his method was clear, so were his expressions plain, alwayes delivering the solid points of Divinity in a familiar stile to the capacity of the meanest.

His manner
of preaching.

As for his Life and Conversation, it was holy, and exemplary, himself practising what he preached unto others, and living over his own Sermons; his Doctrine, and his practice concurred, and went hand in hand together.

His holy
life.

Before these times of Examination of persons, before their admission to the Sacrament of the Lords Supper, he used to go to the Houses of the better sort in his Parish, where he appointed a time for them, and their whole Families to meet together, that he might examine how fit they were to be admitted to that Ordinance: yea he appointed sundry small Families to meet together on a certain day, that he might make trial of their fitness also, and then his manner was, not to admit any of the younger sort to the Sacrament, till in his judgement he found them fitted for it.

Though he addicted himself much to his studies, and carried himself peaceably, yet wanted he not those that did envy, and malign him, and that took all occasions to do him what mischief they could: As in the case of Serjeant Finch his Book about the Calling of the Jews, which Doctor Gouge only published, and the author himself owned it, yet for his publication of it he was committed to prison, and kept there for the space of nine weeks together.

He is envied

King James being informed that the Serjeant had in that Book declared, and endeavoured to prove, that the Jews should have a visible Kingdom, which should be above all other Kingdoms, which Doctrine he abhorred, he thereupon grew extream impatient: Bishop Neal also with others, provoked him against the publisher of the Book, which so incensed him, that he would admit of no Apology. Yet after a while,

Doctor

Doctor Gouge was moved distinctly to declare his judgement, and opinion about that point of the calling, and Conversion of the Jews, which he did in these ensuing Propositions.

His judgement about the Calling of the Jews.

All that I can gather out of the holy Scriptures about this point is :

1. That the Calling of the Jews, importeth more than a spiritual Calling to believe in Jesus Christ, and to embrace the Gospel.

2. This their spiritual Calling, may be called an outward glorious Calling, in regard of the visibility and generality of it; to put a difference betwixt the promised Calling of the Nation, and the continual Calling of some few persons. For in all ages since the rejection of the Jews, some few, here and there have been called. Thus the Calling of the Gentiles in the Apostles time, when Christians had no pompous Civil Government, was an outward glorious Calling, by reason of the visible famous Churches which they had.

3. It is probable that at, or after their Calling, they shall not be scattered as now they are, but shall be gathered together into Churches, and be freed from the bondage and slavery wherein they have been many years together.

4. To give them a Sovereignty over all the whole Church seemeth to me to be derogatory to that absolute Sovereignty which Christ, the head of his Church hath, in whom the promises of the perpetuity of Davids Scepter, of the extent of his Dominion, of the subjection of all Nations are accomplished.

5. To set down the distinct time, place, and other like Circumstances of their Calling, needeth more than an ordinary spirit, and implies too much curiosity.

6. The point of the Calling of the Jews being no fundamental point of Christian Religion, to be over stiff in holding one thing or other therein, to the disturbance of the peace of the Church, comes near to Schisme.

Upon which, being examined by Archbishop Abbot, and his answer approved, he was released from his imprisonment.

His Labours

Ordinarily in the Summer Vacation he was with his Family in the Country; but not so much for his own ease, as for the further service of Gods Church: for besides his preaching every Lords day in the place where he resided, he improved his time for the publication of those his Treatises which are now in Print, viz, The whole Armour of God; Domestical duties; An Explanation of the Lords Prayer; Gods three Arrows, of the Plague, Famine, and Sword, upon occasion of those Judgements then raging. The Saints Sacrifice of Thanksgiving, upon his recovery from a dangerous sickness. To which is now added his Commentary upon the whole Epistle to the Hebrews, which was the Subject of his Wednesdays Lectures for many years.

While he was settled at Black-Friers, he Commenced Bachelour of Divinity Anno Christi, 1611. which was the eighth year after he had taken the Degree of Master of Arts.

He commenced Dr.

Anno Christi 1628, he proceeded Doctor of Divinity, at which time eight London Ministers proceeded Doctors, upon which occasion, Doctor Collins, the then Regius Professor, put up Master Gouges Degree, and procured it to pass in the Regent-house, before he had any notice thereof, and without his consent, whereby he did in a manner force him to take his Degree; yet so as when he heard what was done, he readily went to Cambridge, and performed all his Acts, according to the Statutes of the University, as he had done at the taking of all his former Degrees.

His publick employments.

Such respect was generally shewed to him, as that in sundry publick Employments he was chosen a Trustee or Foffeee. As in the year 1626, he was chosen one of the Trustees for Master Whetenhalls three Lectures.

Also in the 1616. he was chosen one of the Trustees for buying in of Improvements, and for many other pious, and charitable uses, wherein indeed he

he alwayes approved himself a carefull, and faithfull Trustee, and in some cases, by his great pains and cost, he procured to be setled for ever such pious Donations, as would otherwise have been wrested away, and alienated from their intended use.

The business about the buying in of Impropriations was this.

There was a Scelekt Society of thirteen persons who joyned themselves together as Trustees, to stir up, and encourage such as were piously affected, to contribute towards the buying in of Impropriations, and giving them freely towards the maintenance of godly and able Ministers. And these were so faithful to their trust, as albeit they met very frequently, and spent much time and pains in consultation about that business, yet did they never spend one penny out of the publick stock, for the refreshing of themselves; yea though they had sundry Agents, and Messengers whom they imployed about that business, and that both far and near, yet did they never diminish that stock wherewithall they were intrusted to the value of a penny, but themselves, at least most of them, contributed out of their own purses for the discharge of all by-expences. And when they had the opportunity of buying in any great Impropriation, and wanted money in stock to go through with it, they did amongst themselves give, or lend so much as might effect it; and amongst others, our Doctor Gouge at one time lent 300 l. gratis for that use, besides the monthly Contribution which he gave. By this means, in a few years space, thirteen Impropriations were bought in, which cost betwixt five and six thousand pounds; into which their care was to put godly, able, and Orthodox Ministers; and their design was to plant a learned and powerful Ministry, especially in Cities, and Market Towns in several parts of the Kingdom where there was the greatest need, for the better propagation of the Gospel in those parts.

Buying in of Impro-priations.

Indeed this was it that raised up so much envy against them, and made Doctor Land, the then Bishop of London to consult with Master Noy, the Kings Attorney General, about dissolving this Society: and hereupon Master Noy brought them all into the Court of Exchequer, picking this quarrel against them, for that they had made themselves a body Incorporate, without any Grant from the King. When the Case had been debated by Learned Counsel on both sides, the result was, that the Court adjudged their proceedings to be illegal, that their Trust should be taken from them, and that what Impropriations they had thus purchased, should be made over to the King, and that the King should appoint such as he thought meet to dispose of those Impropriations which they had brought in.

The aforesaid Attorney, that strictly examined all their Receipts, and Disbursements, found that they had laid out of their own money, at the time when they were questioned, a thousand pounds more than they had received, and thereupon obtained an Order of the Court, that those debts should be first discharged out of the Revenues of the Impropriations, before they should be disposed to particular uses. Thus was their Trust quite wrested out of their hands, and that excellent work fell to the ground.

4 Anno Christi 1673, Doctor Gouge was, by the Authority of Parliament, called to be a member of the Assembly of Divines, wherein his attendance was assiduous, not being observed during the whole time of that Session to be one day absent; unless it were in case of more than ordinary weakness, ever preferring that publick employment before any private business whatsoever, and therein he was not one to make up the number onely, but a chief and useful member.

He is chosen to the Assembly of Divines.

For he was chosen, and sate as one of the Assessors, and very often filled the Chair in the Moderators absence; And such was his constant care, and conscientiousness in the expence of time, and improving it to the best advantage, that in case of intermission in the Assembly affairs, he used to apply himself to his private studies: For which end, it was his constant practice to to carry his Bible, and some other Books in his pocket, which upon every advantage he drew forth, and read in them, as was observed by many.

To the Ordination of Ministers.

Episcopacy also being voted down by both Houses of Parliament, and so no ordinary way being left for the Ordination of Ministers, the Parliament thought fit to set up an extraordinary way by Three and twenty Ministers, who for the space of a year, were to Ordain such as tendered themselves according to the Rules prescribed by them, with the humble advice of the Assembly, of which number Doctor Gouge was one, and acted with his Brethren therein; At which time I observed his strictness in keeping of Fasts: For on an Ordination day, which was always accompanied with Fasting and Prayer; in the afternoon one proffered him a peece of a candied Orange Pill, which (though he was then very ancient) he refused to accept of till the work of the day was finished.

To write Annotations on the bible

He was likewise chosen by a Committee of Parliament, amongst others, to write large Annotations upon the Bible, being well known to be a judicious Interpreter of Scripture, and how well he performed that Task, is, and may be evident to all that read his part, which was from the beginning of the first Book of the Kings to Job. In which the intelligent Reader may observe such skill in the Original, such acquaintance with the sacred Story, such judgement in giving the genuine sense of the Text, and such accuteness in raising pertinent Observations, that without the help of any other Commentators, a man may accommodate himself with the sense, Doctrines, and uses of most of those Scriptures that came under his hand, in those brief Annotations.

He refused to read the Book for Sports.

Before this, when the Book allowing Sports and Recreations on the Lords Days was by publick Authority injoynd to be read in all Churches throughout the Kingdome, he, as sundry others godly and faithful Ministers refused to read the same, resolving rather to suffer the uttermost, than to manifest the least approbation of so wicked, and licentious a practice, it being so contrary to the expresse letter of the Scripture.

His skill in Cases of Conscience.

By reason of his ability and dexterity in resolving Cases of Conscience, he was much sought unto for his judgement in doubtful cases, and scruples of Conscience, and that not only by ordinary Christians; but by divers Ministers also both in the City and Country, sometimes by word of mouth, and other sometimes by writing: And indeed he was accounted the Father of the London Divines, and the Oracle of his time.

He was likewise a sweet comforter of troubled Consciences, wherein he was exceeding skilful, and dextrous, as many Hundreds in the City have found from time to time, being sought unto far and near by such as groaned under afflictions and Tentations, many of whom, through Gods blessing upon his labours, were restored to joy and comforts out of unspeakable terrors and torments of Conscience.

His Meekness.

He was of a most sweet, and meek disposition; yea such was his meekness of spirit, that it seemeth not to be paralleld. For though he lived with his wife above twenty years, yet neither childe, nor servant, could ever say that they saw so much as an angry countenance, or heard so much as an angry word proceed from him towards her all her life long.

Some have observed, that towards his latter end in his visage he did much resemble the Picture that is usually made for Moses. Certainly he was the exact Effigies of Moses his spirit, and in this resembled him to the life, that he was one of the meekest men that this Generation hath known.

A Peace-maker.

He was, as a great peace-keeper, so a great peace-maker, having an excellent dexterity in composing of differences; he was far from doing wrong to others, and as far from revenging wrong done to him by others.

Notwithstanding

Notwithstanding which, he suffered much, both by the speeches, and also by the actions of evil, and envious persons; yet his manner was, rather to pray for them, than in any harsh manner to retaliate like for like. He alwayes judged that revilers, and injurious persons wronged themselves more than him.

Sundry scandalous, and false aspersions were cast upon him, yea by such persons as were guilty of those very crimes which they laid to his charge. For some who lived by the unwarrantable trade of Usury, to justify their own unlawful practices, have not stuck to charge the same upon him, though he was all wayes free from it, never putting out any money to use, either by himself, or any other for him, neither directly, nor indirectly, as he hath been often heard to affirm, both in his life time, and not long before his death. He is slandered.

Being chosen President of Sion Colledge, according to the custome, when he left his Office, he preached a learned, and polite Latine Sermon ad clerum, which he delivered by the strength of his memory, without the help of his notes, which shewed that though his body was decrepit, and feeble, yet his intellectuals were vivid, quick, and vigorous. His good Memory.

He was very charitable, especially to the godly poor, according to that direction of the Apostle, Gal. 6. 10. where he exhorts us to do good to all but especially to the household of Faith. He maintained some poor Schollars in the University wholly at his own charge, and contributed liberally towards the maintenance of others. Indeed he set apart a sacred stock as he called it, a portion for the poor, proportionable to his receipts, which he faithfully distributed. His Charity.

Yea he was of such a charitable, and bountiful a disposition, that though his Father left him a competent estate, yet such were his annual disbursements for his kindred, and others that stood in need of relief, that from the time of his Fathers death till his children came to be of years, and so to call for their portions, he laid up nothing of all his comings in; whereby it may appear, that they, who out of envy cry up his estate to be greater than it was, do consequently, cry up his bounty and charity: For that whatsoever his estate was, it was wholly laid out for the relief of such as stood in need (necessary expences for his Family only excepted) which as it doth appear by his Papers, so in his life time he professed it to some of his Children; and truly as in other things he excelled many others, so in this he excelled himself.

He was very conscientious in the expence of his time, from his youth to the very time of his death. His custome was to rise very early both in the Winter and Summer. In the Winter time he constantly rose so long before day, as that he alwayes performed all the exercises of his private devotions before daylight: And in the Summer time he rose about four a Clock in the morning; by which means he had done half his work before others began their studies. If he happened to hear any at their work before he began his studies, he would say (as Demosthenes spake concerning the Smith) that he was much troubled that any should be at the works of their Calling, before he was at his. His Study.

He was a man of much temperance and sobriety, both in his eating, drinking, and apparel: And for Recreations, howsoever many pious persons do spend time therein, and that lawfully in warrantable Recreations, yet he spent none of his so, whence it was that he was never expert in any kinde of sports: He hath been often heard to say, that he never took any journey meerly of pleasure in all his life-time. Study, and paines were alwayes, both in youth and age his chiefest pleasure and delight; yea it was his meat and drink to be doing the will of his heavenly Father, wherein he took as much pleasure and delight, as natural men do in their eating and drinking, or in their disports and pastimes. His Temperance.

ment.

Such was his deportment in his Conversation, that there was scarce a Lord, or Lady, or Citizen of quality, in, or about the City, that were piously affected, but they sought his acquaintance, and were ambitious to enjoy his company, wherein they took much content, and found much benefit to their souls thereby.

And whereas many persons of quality out of their great respect to him, came to visit him, he would so endeavour to order their conference as might tend most their edification; and if their visits were merely complemental, he soon grew weary, and accounted it a burden to him.

His Affabi-
lity.

He was alwayes of a very friendly, and courteous disposition, in so much as the meanest, not only of his own Parish, but of the City, found easie access to him, and he was as easie to be intreated, yea ready to do what good he could to all.

His Humility.

And amongst other Graces, his humility was very eminent, and exemplary: Though others knew not when his face did not shine, yet he knew not when it did. He that readily could observe the least glimpses or appearances of any worth in others, would not acknowledge them in himself: He was (as it was said of Nazianzen) high in employments, and abilities, but low in his disposition, and resentment of his own worth. He was not observed to be puffed up either with the multitudes that flocked unto his Ministry (which were many and great) nor with any applauses of men; but would still say, That he knew more by himself to abase him, than any could know to extol him; yea so eminent was his Humility, that he charged his Executor, to whom he committed the care of his Funeral, that there should no Green Staffe be laid upon his Herse, though this usual respect is given to those who in their life-time were Governours of the Hospital of Bridewell, one of which number this worthy Doctor was, yea and a Benefactor too to that House: As also that he should not affix any Escucheons to his Herse, though he was a Gentleman of an ancient Descent, as if he had thought that the poverty of Christ was his Patrimony, and Coat of Arms, and his interest in him, his greatest, and best achievement; or as if both living and dead he would be (as the Apostle speaks) cloathed with Humility.

His Fastings

He was much in Communion with God, and contented not himself only with his constant, daily, and ordinary holy duties, but was also frequent in extraordinary Exercises. In the Bishops times, when it was not permitted to keep Fasts in the publick Congregations, he was one of those Ministers who frequently help private Christians in their more retired Humiliations. In times of fears and dangers, he with divers others, had sometimes monthly, yea sometimes weekly Fasts, whereof many were kept in his own house, and others of them in his Vestry; which he was observed to perform with extraordinary Reverence and awfulness of spirit. His Confessions were accompanied with much sense of, and sorrow for sin, brokenness of heart, self-aborrancy, judging of the creature, and justifying of God: His petitions were pertinent, judicious, spiritual, seasonable, accompanied with faith and fervency; like a true son of Jacob, he wrestled with supplications, and tears, as resolving not to depart out of Gods presence without a blessing.

His Thankgivings.

But there was none like him in Thanksgiving, when a man would have thought that he had spent the last drop of his spirits and strength in Confession and Prayer; O! how would he recollect his spirits when he came to the work of Thanksgiving, wherein he would be so large, particular, warm, and vigorous, that in the end of the day when mens affections grew flat, he would so revive and quicken them, as if the work had been then but newly begun, and as if that had been the onely work of the day; and herein indeed he may be a pattern to all his surviving Brethren in the Ministry.

He was very inquisitive after the state, and condition of the Church of Christ, both at home, and abroad, that he might accordingly order his prayers in their behalf, of whom he was never unmindful in his addresses unto God. And when he heard that it went ill with the Church of God in any place, like another Nehemiah, he sate him down, and wept, and mourned, and fasted, and prayed unto the God of Heaven in their behalf.

His Sympathy.

His Faith.

His study was as great to advance Christ, as to debase himself. He used frequently to say, When I look upon my self, I see nothing but emptiness, and weakness; but when I look upon Christ, I see nothing but fulness and sufficiency. When the hand of his body was weak and shaking, that of his soul, his faith, was strong and steady. When he could not hold the Cup at the Sacrament, nor scarce carry it to his own mouth by reason of his Palsie-hand, yet then with a firme and fixed assistance did he lay hold upon Christ, and with a strong and eager appetite applied his blood to his soul, and his manner was sweetly to breath forth joyfull Thanksgivings for his refreshment by the Blood of Christ, when he was returned to his house after the Lords Supper; yea when he could hardly creep with his body to the place where it was celebrated, and was forced many times to make use of the help of others to support him in his passage thither, even then did his faith run swiftly, and was upon the wing to carry him to Christ. When worldly supports failed him, when health, and strength forsook him, he made Jesus Christ the staff of his old age, often professing, as his great misery and impotency without him, so his holy and humble recumbency upon him.

Great was his patience under the visiting hand of God, especially in his old age, when God exercised him with painful maladies. Though by reason of the sharpness, and bitterness of his pains occasioned by the stone, and acuteness of his urine, and that Lethalis arundo (as he oft called it) that deadly arrow in his side, which he knew could never be plucked out but by death, I mean his Asthma, which he got by an excessive cold in attending upon publick employments: Notwithstanding (I say) by reason of these he was often heard to groan, yet never did he once grumble against the dispensations of God. Never did he complain of God for his sufferings, though oft of himself for sinning: He never cryed out A great sufferer, but oft, A great sinner! and yet he would overtake that expression again, with the discouring of, and comforting himself in A great Saviour, and in the depth of his torments he would say, Well, yet in all these there is nothing of Hell, or of Gods wrath. His sufferings were never so deep, but he could see the bottome of them, and would say, Soul be silent: Soul be patient; It is thy God, and Father, that thus orderth thy estate; Thou art his clay, he may tread and trample on thee, as pleaseth him: Thou hast deserved much more: It is enough that thou art kept out of Hell: Though thy pain be grievous, yet it is tollerable: Thy God affords some intermissions, he will turn it to thy good, and at length put an end to all; none of these can be expected in Hell.

His Patience.

He used often to make mention of the extent of obedience, which he said was not onely to endeavour to do what God requieth, but also patiently to bear what Gods will is to lay upon his Creature, as Christ himself, though he were the Son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered. In his greatest pangs, he oft used this speech of holy Job, Shall we receive good from the hands of God, and not evil? He often commended his soul unto Christ, and used to say, I am perswaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed to him against that day. When any of his Friends went about to comfort him in those gifts which God had bestowed on him, and works which he had wrought by him, he would answer, I dare not think of any such thing for comfort; Jesus Christ, and what he hath done, and endured, is the only ground of my sure comfort. Many that came to visit him in his weakness, professed that they went away better than they came, by reason of those savoury and gracious speeches, and expressions that proceeded from him.

His excellent Speeches.

For

Though,

Though, towards his latter end, his fits of the stone were frequent and sharp, having sometimes four or five of them in an hour, yet such was his desire to finish that his so much desired Commentary upon the Epistle to the Hebrews, that so soon as the bitter pain of his fit was over, he still returned to his work, making some further progress therein. And thus he continued labouring in that employment through many pains till Tuesday the 6. December, Anno Christi, 1653. About which time, as his natural strength was exceedingly decayed, so now also his Intellectuals began to fail, and for the following three dayes, a drowsiness seized upon him, insomuch that he could not hold up his head to look into a Book, but slumbered away his time in a Chair; and upon Fry-day being the third day after he had given over his studies, enquiring what day it was, he cried out, Alas! I have lost three dayes. The day following being Saturday, he had no desire to arise out of his bed, neither indeed could he, in regard of his weakness, which was such, and he was so sensible of it, that he said, Now I have not long to live in this world, the time of my departure is at hand, I am going to my desired Haven; The apprehension whereof was no little joy unto him, for he had often said to such of his Friends as came to visit him in his sickness, I am willing to dye, having, I bless God, nothing to do but to dye. Indeed sometimes he seemed to be in the same strait with St. Paul between Life and Death, having a desire to depart that he might be with Christ, which was best of all. But yet very desirous he was to finish his Commentary upon the Epistle to the Hebrews, which he knew would be very useful to the Church of God, and in that respect he was willing to live; and God so far answered his desire in that particular, that he lived to finish it within half a Chapter. But when he perceived that his time in this world could not be long, O! how sweet, and joyfull was the apprehension of Death unto him, which he often termed, his best friend next to Jesus Christ. So that he came willingly; he was not plucked and dragged to Death: Death was his familiar acquaintance; it was his privilege as well as his task. When his good sister said to him in his sickness, Brother, I am afraid to leave you alone; Why Sister (said he) I shall, I am sure, be with Jesus Christ when I dye. The meditation of Death was not more frequent than sweet unto him. His soul was upon the wing, and was bent Heaven-ward; even whilst it was in the cage of his decrepit Body.

Upon Saturday, though he kept his bed through weakness, yet was he more wakefull, and his spirit more lively, and cheerful, than for several dayes before, which questionless was from his joyful apprehension of his approaching departure.

His speeches that day were more than ordinary Heavenly: He spake much in the admiration of Gods Free-grace, and riches of his Mercy in Jesus Christ.

As while he lived he led a heavenly life, so about the time of his death, by those comforts, and joyes that he found in his soul, he seemed to be in Heaven, even while he was upon the earth; and so he continued full of sweet, and divine comfort, and heavenly expressions to the last of his understanding and speech, which continued to Munday morning, when both of them failed him; from which time he lay breathing, yet shorter, and shorter, till eight of the Clock at night, about which time, in the presence of all his Children, and divers of his Friends, he quietly slept in the Lord, making an happy change from earth to Heaven, which was December, 12. Anno Christi 1653, being 79 years old, after he had served God faithfully and painfully in his Generation.

THE

The Life and Death of Master Thomas Gataker, who died Anno Christi, 1654.

His Paren-
tage.

After Thomas Gataker, or Gatacre (for so he wrote himself till of later years to prevent miscalling, occasioned frequently by the view of the Letters, he changed it into Gataker) was a branch of a very ancient Family, so firmly by Gods Providence planted in Shropshire, that the Stock hath continued in the same House, carrying the Name of its owner, and known by the Title of Gatacre-Hall, by an un-interrupted succession from the time of King Edward the Confessor.

His Father, Master Thomas Gatacre (being a younger Son of William Gatacre) was designed by his Parents to the study of the Law, in order whereunto he was admitted a Student in the Temple: And during his abode there, he, occasionally went to visit some of his Kindred, who were then high in place, and power, whereby he was often present at the examination of some Christian Confessors of the Gospel, in those bloody times wherein Satan armed all his Forces to suppress that dawning light which threatened ruine to his Kingdom of darkness.

The harshness and cruelty of those proceedings, together with the constancy of those weak, yet sincere Christians, who with the evidence of truth, and resolution of minde maintained faith and a good conscience, were very prevalent with him to facilitate his entertainment of that purer Doctrine of the Gospel which began to shine into his soul.

This being apprehended by his Parents, fearing his change in Religion, they sent him over to Louvaine in Flanders, and to win him to a compliance with them in Religion, they settled upon him an estate in a Lease of an hundred pounds per annum in old Rents: but like St. Paul, Phil. 3. 8. He counted all outward advantages as nothing in comparison of the knowledge of Jesus Christ.

His Father therefore perceiving how fixt and unmoveable he was in his choice of Religion, in which yet he had nothing to except against, but only the novelty of it, he recalled him into England, and in great displeasure revoked his former Grant of rool. per annum, which yet could not be affected without his Sons Consent: But this young Disciple had already learned the hard lesson of self-denial, and of forsaking all to follow Christ, and therefore to preserve his Conscience pure and intire, he gave up that which was intended as a baite to Apostacy. But the Lord, who hath promised to his faithfull followers reparation and satisfaction for all their losses for his sake, raised him up Friends, by whose assistance, and encouragement, he pursued his studies at Oxford, and in process of time, when, not onely the clouds of ignorance rance and superstition were dispelled, but also those bloody storms in the Marian dayes were blown over, he took upon him the publick Ministry of the Gospel, and he was household Chaplain to that great Favourite, Robert Earl of Lecester, and afterwards Pastor of St. Edmunds in Lumberd street, London: In which Parsonage house by his wife (who was of an honest Family of the Pigots in Hertfordshire) amongst other Children, he had this Thomas, who was His Birth born September the 4. Anno Christi 1574.

In his Childe-hood he was so addicted to those means which his Parents His Educa-applied him unto, for the implanting in him the seeds of good Litterature, that tion.
he rather needed a bridle, than a spur: For his love of learning (equal to that admirable capacity, wherewith the Father of Lights had furnished him) was so active in the acquiring of it, that his Father was fain often gently to chide him from his Book. Neither were his nimble wit, sharp judgement, and vast memory perverted to be the instruments of that debauchery wherewith the corruption of our Nature doth too often stain and deflowre our first dayes: For he had a lovely gravity in his young Conversation; so that what Gregory Nazianzen said of the great Basil, might be averted of him, That he held forth Learning beyond his age, and a fixedness of manners beyond his Learning.

Having happily finished his Tyrocinnia of first-exercises in the Grammar-Schools His remove (wherein he overcame by his strange industry) the difficulties which those times to Cam-(destitute of many helps which our present dayes do enjoy) conflicted withall, bridge.
and out-stripped many of his fellows which ran in the same course; so that before he had compleated sixteen years, viz. Anno Christi 1590, he was by his Father placed in St. Johns Colledge in Cambridge.

Not long after his settlement there, his Father (being called by God to receive the reward of his labours) left him, not wholly destitute, and yet not sufficiently provided for any long continuance of his studies in that place. But God who hath engaged his truth and mercy to the upright, and even to his seed also, Psal. 112. 1, 2. (especially when the Son doth not degenerate, nor thwart the Providence of God, by a forfeiture of his title to the Promises, provided Friends and means for him, who was by an hidden Counsel then designed to be an instrument of doing much service to the Church of Christ. Thus the fruit was not nipped in a promising bud, by the Frost of want. Gods Providence.

Now not from meer favour, but from merit (upon the proof of his Learning) he was chosen Scholler of that worthy Society, wherein he continued his studies with unwearied diligence, and happy success, till he, with abilities answerable to his Degree, commenced Master of Arts. For an instance of his industry, take this, viz. That he was a constant Auditor of that eminent Light of Learning, Master John Boys, who read a Greek Lecture in his bed to certain young Students that preferred their nightly studies before their rest and ease. The notes of those Lectures he kept as a treasure, and being visited by Master Boys many years after, he brought them forth to him, to the no small joy of the good old man, who professed that he was made some years younger by that grateful entertainment. His industry and preferment

About this time was contracted that streight friendship betwixt our Master Gataker, and that faithful servant of Iesus Christ Master Richard Stock, which continued to the death of this Reverend Minister, as appears by Master Gatakers testimony given unto him at his Funeral.

An evidence of that good esteem which Master Gataker had now acquired, His remove for his Learning and Piety, was this, That a Colledge being then to be erected to Sidney by the Munificence of the Countess of Suffex, the Trustees of that Foundress Colledge.
(being persons eminent for Prudence and Zeal) did choose him for one of that Society, and they transplanted him into that new Nursery of Arts and Religion, being confident that he would (as indeed he did by Christs assistance) prove very fruitfull both for the ornament and benefit of that Seminary.

Indeed

Indeed they laid hold of him before the House was fit for Inhabitants, fearing lest so fair and promising a Flower should be taken up by some other hand. But while the Colledge was in building (that he might not lose any opportunity of doing good) he retired himself to the house of Master William Aylofes in Essex, who had prevailed with him to instruct both himself in the Hebrew Language, and his eldest Son in that Literature which was proper to his age.

His abode
in Essex.

His imployment
there.

In this Family, partly by his own inclination, and partly by the encouragement of the Governours thereof, he performed Family Duties for the instruction and edification of the whole household, expounding to them a portion of Scripture every morning, that the Sun of Righteousness might as constantly arise in their hearts, as the day brake in upon them. In this Exercise, whereby he laboured to profit both himself and others, he went over the Epistles of the Apostles, the Prophecie of Isaiah, and a good part of the Book of Job, rendering the Text out of the Original Languages, and then delivering cleer Explanations, and also deducing usefull Observations.

Doctor Stern, the Suffragan of Colchester, on a time visiting the Mistress of the Family (to whom he was nearly related) happened to be present at one of these Exercises, at which time Master Gataker explicated the first Chapter of St. Pauls Epistle to the Ephesians, which is known to be most pregnant of Divine Mysteries: But this Portion of holy Writ he treated upon with such happy Elucidations, that the judicious Doctor was much satisfied with his pains therein, and admiring the endowments of Master Gataker, exhorted him instantly to be Ordained to the work of the Ministry, whereby those his gifts might be authoritatively exercised for the publick good, and improved for the building up of the Church, and withall, offered him his assistance in that business: But Master Gataker, well weighing the burden of that Calling, and judging modestly of his own abilities, which he conceived disproportionable for that Office (to the full discharge whereof the Apostle hath set, tis inav<sup>o</sup>. Who is sufficient?) thanked the Doctor for his kind offer, but deferred the matter to further consideration: But afterwards by the advice of the Reverend Master Henry Alvey, formerly his Tutor, and whom in this business he now took for his counsellour, upon his remonstrance of divers reasons, and the importunity of Doctor Stern afresh re-iterated, he assented to be Ordained by the said suffragan.

His Ordination.

His return
to Cambridge.

His diligence.

The Fabrick of Sidney-Sussex Colledge being now finished, he betook himself to the station, and employment whereunto he was before designed, and to the work depending thereon, wherein his pains in seasoning young Students with principles of Piety and Learning, were both great, and very successful: For some of them that watered their Gardens at his Spring, or kindled their Lamps at his Light, grew up to great eminency, as Master John Hoyl, and Master Thomas Pell, who were afterwards worthy Fellows of that Society.

About that time there were certain persons in the University, zealous of promoting the glory of God, and of gaining souls to Christ, that lay in a sad condition through the defect of Pastors able to teach, and lead the people in the wayes of truth, life, and peace, especially Master Abdias Ashton of St. Johns Colledge, and Master William Bedel of Emanuel, who set on foot, a design of preaching in places adjacent to Cambridge, even to a considerable distance. These men invited Master Gataker to be a partner in this good employment, who being drawn, and encouraged by them, preached every Lords day at Everton (a Village in the meeting-confines of Cambridge, Bedford, and Huntingtonshire) where a decrepid man (who was reported to be sixscore and ten years old) sustained the name of Vicar, Vix magni nominis umbra. Here a Family of the Burgoines, resident in that place deserveth this honou-

honourable remembrance, that Mr. Roger Burgoine during that time, used Master Gataker with great humanity, and respect, which by him was construed to be an effect of his Piety.

After he had thus religiously imployed himself for the space of half a year, manifesting his publick spirit therein, he had some causes that moved him to retire from the University at the motion of Master Ashton before mentioned, who had been his Tutor, whereupon he removed to Sir William Cooks Family, then resident in London. His remove to London.

This place and imployment occasioned a more publick discovery of his Ministerial Gifts, with the singular approbation of many persons of note, not onely for their outward estate, but also for their affection unto, and judgement in Religion. Hereupon the Lecturers place of Lincolns-Inne falling void, some principal persons of that Honourable Society (who had been his Auditors occasionally elsewhere) made addresses unto him, inviting him unto that place, offering their assistance, and alledging the facility of his Introduction by the Lord Chief Justice Pophams interressing himself in the business, whom they knew to have loved his Father Master Thomas Gataker (being once his intimate friend, and contemporary in the study of the Law) and to favour this his son very highly for his own worth and work in the Ministry: But he, according to his usual modesty, declined the undertaking of it, and resisted the importunities even of his Friend Master Stock; till Doctor Mountague, Master of Sidney-Colledge, repairing to London, and being made acquainted with the design in hand (though he had it in his thoughts to invite Master Gataker back to the Colledge, that he might read an Hebrew Lecture which had a Salary annexed to it by the Lord Harrington, yet) laying that aside, he pressed Mr. Gataker with Arguments, and Authority, encouraging him against his own diffidence, and so wrought him at last to an assent, that without any suit made by him, the Lord Popham should recommend him to that Society. His call to Lincolns-Inne.

Thus was he chosen Preacher at Lincolns-Inne, where he spent ten years to the great advancement of Piety amongst them, and with an happy Reformation of some abuses of the Lords day, as he himself testifies in his Apologetical Discourse against Lilly, p. 16, 17.

But notwithstanding that engagement, Master Gataker did not totally abandon the Family of Sir William Cook, to whose Lady he was near by blood, and dear to them both upon the account of his pious and profitable labours amongst them. Therefore in the Vacation-times being disingaged from his attendance at the Innes of Court, he resided in that Family, exercising his Ministry either in their Chappel, or in the Parish Church as occasion offered it self; and this he did with an Apostolical minde, not for filthy lucre, but freely, making the Gospel a burden onely to the Dispenser of it; yet such was the care and piety of that Religious pair, that they also would not serve God with that that cost them nothing: For afterwards, in consideration of those his pains freely taken amongst them, they settled upon Master Gataker an Annuity of 20 l. per annum, which also he received for some few years, but afterwards he saw reason to remit it to the Heire of that Family, forbearing to make use of his right he had to it, and forbidding his Executor to demand any Arrears of that Annuity.

This is mentioned the rather to shew the generous temper of this holy man of God, who aimed at the spiritual good of others, more than at his own temporal advantages, and how infinitely he was removed from the sordid acquisition of gain, or the prostitution of his sacred Function unto secular designs, which may stop the mouth of malice, and the impudent clamours of some, whose consciences being either gauled or cauterized; spared not to traduce him for coverousness: But his own pen wrote the best Apology, as indeed (according to that of Nazianzen) they that will give him a just Character, have need of his Eloquence. His self-denial.

Whilst he attended on that Flock at Lincolns-Inne, Sir William Sidley, a learned learned Mecenas, and pious Patron of the Church, proffered him a fair Benefice; and when Mr. Gataker declined the burden of a Pastoral charge, and pleaded an unwillingness to be removed from those worthy Gentlemen (of whose favour he had such good experience) he endeavoured to persuade him that by taking an assistant, all those inconveniences would be salved, and so he needed not to desert that Society, which in Term time only required his labours and attendance: But Master Gataker, who poised the burden in the balance of the Sanctuary, alwayes judged one cure of souls to be sufficient for one man, and therefore ventured the unkinde resentment of the Noble Gentleman upon his refusal, rather than the multiplying of preferments to himself.

His remove to Rother-
hithe.

After ten years labours profitably employed at Lincolns-Inne, not onely to the great benefit of the then living servants of God, but also for the behoof of posterity, especially by that his learned Tractate of Lots, there, and then conceived, and formed (wherein what satisfaction is given to conscience in many cases, let the judicious acknowledge.) Master Gataker thence removed to undertake the Rectory of Rotherhithe in Surry, of the grounds, motives, and manner whereof he himself hath largely given an account to the world in his Apologetick against Lilly, p. 44, 48. of which this is the sum;

The Rectory of Redrith in Surry (as it is commonly called) being void, and one of an infamous life, labouring hard to succeed in it (in order to which, before the former Incumbents death, he had set on foot a transaction with the mother of certain Orphans in whose hands the Patronage was supposed to rest) some of the Religious Inhabitants, valuing the means of Grace above all their other outward enjoyments, casts their eyes, and thoughts upon Master Gataker, to gain whom, to their own intreaties, they added the mediation of his good Friend Master Richard Stock, who, when he had by many reasons remonstrated unto him that God did give him a clear call to that place, whose honour, and Ordinances might suffer prejudice by the intrusion of an unworthy man if he should refuse the call, he at last suffered himself to be persuaded, and prevailed with to undertake that charge; which being represented to Sir Henry Hobart, the Kings Attorney General by Master Randolph Crew (afterwards Lord Chief Justice) Sir Henry that before favoured other pretensions to gratifie some Tenants of his in that Parish, yet now did readily imbrace the motion concerning the setting of Master Gataker there, according to his own contentment; and withall wrote a Letter to the Bishop for the removal of all obstructions that lay in the way, or that might hinder his acceptance of the presentation of Master Gataker, which, being signed with all the hands of the three brethren, who had right to that Advocation, was rendred on his behalf.

The report of this his removal was no welcome news to many of that Honourable Society, who would fain have retained him, and some of them offered an enlargement of his maintenance for an argument to keep him, and others of them represented the consistence of both employments by the help of an assistant: But he that made not his Ministry a meer trade of living here, as Gregory Nazianzene complained that some did in his time, and too many do in our times, would not multiply his burdens, when he deemed himself unfit for the least, and would not suffer himself to be wrought to any other resolution.

His indu-
stry.

Therefore Anno Christi 1611, commending his former charge to the Grace of God, he betook himself to the sole attendance of that Flock of which now the Holy Ghost had made him the Overseer; and his industry in the discharge of his duty there was both constant and great, notwithstanding that he was almost perpetually troubled with the head-ache, wherewith God had exercised him from his very youth, and for which he had only this poor comfort from his Physician, Doctor Goulston, his singular good friend (with whom whom he communicated his studies upon Galen, and to whom he contributed his assistance for the Edition of some parts of Galen who often told him, that the incurable disease of age would be the onely remedy of his distemper, because together with the abatement of natural heat, his indisposition would grow less vigorous and violent.

To the work of his Ministry in publick upon the Sabbaths, he added a Catechetical weekly Lecture on Frydays in the evening, which was designed by him, to lay the foundation of saving knowledge in the hearts of the children, of whom a certain number every Lecture day did give an account of their knowledge by set Answers to Questions delivered out to them aforehand for their instruction (this course of holding a form of sound words, agreeable to the Doctrine of the Gospel consigned in holy Writ, of what importance it is, we may gather from that ignorance, and those errors which have invaded the Church in these our times; which mischiefs can hardly be imputed to any thing so much as to the neglect of that usefull duty of Catechizing.) But that exercise was performed by him with such an accurate, and methodical explication of the whole Body of Divinity, that Christians of riper years, and of long standing in Christs School, did resort to be partakers of those discourses, wherein their well-exercised senses did find not only milk fit for babes, but also solid meat suitable to grown men in Christ.

This course he continued till he had compleated a perfect Summary of Divinity, and gave it over when he saw that the least part of his Auditory consisted of those for whose sakes he principally intended this work; his Parishoners being grown at least to a neglect of his free labours in that kind.

Master Gatakers constant retirement in his study caused him to make choise of an help meet for him that might oversee his Family, which was a necessary act of prudence; and therefore not long before he left Lincolns Inne, he married the widow of Master William Cupp, to whose two daughters he was so providently kinde in their education, that he disposed of them in marriage to two Divines of note in the Church, and continued such a fatherly love to them, and theirs, that the world mistook them for his own children. That wife dyed in child-bed of a son that did bear the Fathers name, who after that he had seen the most remote parts of the world, wherewith we keep commerce, returned home to his Father, and dyed in peace.

The same motive still being in force, he after a decent interval of widow-hood, chose for himself the daughter of a Reverend Minister, Master Charles Pinner, who was brought up in the worthy, and Religious Family of Master Ellis Crisp, brother to Mistris Pinner; and it pleased God to give him a Son by her, whom in process of time he Dedicated unto God in the work of the Ministry, but immediately to take away the mother, so that the mothers Funeral, and the childs Baptisme were celebrated together. Thus our wife and gracious Father tempers the cup for his children, lest they should surfer upon earthly enjoyments, as they might easily do if they were unmixed with occasions of sorrow.

Then did Master Gataker remain for many years in a disconsolate condition, till at last he adventured and married a Gentlewoman of a very considerable Family, being sister to Sir George, and Sir John Farwell, and of a good esteem for knowledge and piety. By her he had three children, whereof a son, and a daughter were carried to the ground before their mother, but the third yet lives to walk by the light of her Fathers life, and Doctrine. This his third wife being of a Contemplative mind, fell into a consumption, which so wasted her Body, that her soul took its flight from thence into Heaven.

Last of all, he took to wife a Citizens widow, whose comfortable conversation he enjoyed for the space of four and twenty years, but without any issue by her. His love to her was one motive that induced him to remove out of his Parsonage house into another Habitation of his own revenue. For, supposing that she might survive him, he would make a convenient provision for her, that she might not be subject to the curtesie of another for her removal; and that affection extended it self in his great liberality to many of her kindred that were in need of help and support from him, and that both in her life time, and since her decease.

He survived her two years within a few dayes, and because he numbred his dayes with wisdom, and thereupon presumed that the time was approaching wherein his soul should be married to the Lamb, he would not endure to listen to the motion of some, who would have advised him to a new entanglement in the world.

Having thus related his several Marriages in a continued Narrative, let us now step back to take notice of some passages in time that went before the last of them.

He views
the Low-
Countries.

Anno Christi 1620. having a justifiable curiosity to see our neighbour Churches in the United Provinces, and something of the Spanish Provinces in the Netherlands, he took advantage of the Truce between the King of Spain, and the Hollanders for a free passage between both Countries. Thereupon with his entire friend, Captain Joshua Downing, and an old acquaintance, Master Roger Hughes (his Mason, whose house he frequented at London) he took his voyage, taking also along with him a Nephew of his, who was a young Student, to be a partner with him in his Travels. His mother being then alive, had some fears, lest he being a known and noted Adversary to the Papish cause (which he had mortally wounded with many and sharp weapons) should suffer inconvenience from that generation of Vipers, whose violent, and virulent malice often prompts them to base courses of secret revenge; But God was his guide, his Sun, and his Shield, and so prospered his journey, that within a months space (for they took Boat July the 13, and returned safe August the 14,) he had viewed the most considerable places in the Low Countries. In this his travel he gave better satisfaction to the English Church in Middleburgh, where he gave way to the importunity of Friends, who were desirous to hear him, as well as glad to see him, than he did to the English Papists in Flanders, with whom he had divers debates, wherein he drove some to a confusion whom he could that draw to a conversion.

He is chosen to the Assembly.

Anno Christi 1642. A violent fit of the Colick assaulted him, and brought him to the very brink of the Grave; but it pleased God to bring him back again that he might do him further service. For the year ensuing, before he had well recovered his strength, he was called by the Parliament to sit as one of the Assembly which was summoned to be consulted with about Religion; where his endeavours for promoting truth, and suppressing error, were sincere and serious: And his study of peace with modesty was in this remarkable, that when his Reasons delivered concerning Christs obedience in order to our Justification (wherein he differed from his Brethren) could not obtain assent from the Major part, which determined the Question contrary to his sense, his great love of unity imposed upon him silence, and wrought likewise upon him resolutions, not to publish his discourses upon that subject from Rom 3. 28. that so he might not publickly discover dissent from the Votes of that Reverend Assembly. I wish there had been the like prudence and modesty in some others, who profess themselves to differ but in circumstances.

His Self-denial.

During his attendance upon the work of that Convention, the Earle of Manchester (being acquainted with his great worth, and fitness in regard of his Learning of all kindes for Academical transactions) offered him the Mastership of Trinity Colledge in Cambridge, which is the greatest preferment in that University. For that Noble Lord being intrusted by the Parliament with the Reformation of that Academy, was not passionately transported with a blinde partiality of mens persons upon any sinister respects, but desired to prefer them whom he judged most worthy, and most hopeful to do Christ service in that place, and therefore being perswaded that Master Gataker might (both in regard of his gravity, and vast Scholastical abilities) be a choise ornament to that University, and a fair copy for others to write by, he was very desirous to place him there. But this good man though often importuned by many Friends to accept of the motion, according to his accustomed modesty, with many thanks to the Noble Earle, refused to undertake that place, though of much honour, service, and outward advantage; Pleading, together with his unworthiness, the weakness of his body by reason of age, and thereupon his inability to take journies: and because he looked upon himself, as having one foot in the Grave, he humbly desired, that a younger man might be thought upon, more likely to be longer serviceable than himself, in a place of so great eminency and trust.

Reforma-

And indeed the sense of his own weakness was not a vain presage of his decayes; for not long after he was again surpris'd by the Colick, which before had shaken him, and made his crazie Body less able to endure new conflicts, and these were so sharp, that his recovery appeared desperate, not only to his other Friends, but even to his Physicians also. Yet it pleased God though he chastened him sore, not to give him over unto death. For his studies, which seemed to be his meat and drink in his health, were his Physick also when he was sick: For whilst he was confined to his chamber, he prepared for the Press his Dissertation de Tetragrammato, and a Grammatical discourse de Bivocalibus; and though this for the subject be not comparable to the other, yet it may be averred, that what he did by the by, and for the refreshment of his languishing Body, and minde, was of more worth than the main work of many Students.

His Dissenters.

After a long time that he had been a Prisoner in his own house, he, by Gods assistance recovered so much strength as that he was able to go to Gods House: and now he believed himself bound to imploy his Ministerial Gifts in Gods service, and therefore he again adventured into the Pulpit, where he spent himself so far that he strained a veyn in his lungs, for which (being then about Seventy three years old) he was let Blood, by which, and other good means, God was please d to carry him through that danger.

When he had recruited his veyns and sinews with fresh abilities, he, being unwilling to fall under that Woe, 1 Cor. 9. 16. for not preaching the Gospel, acted more according to the willingness of his Spirit, than was proportionable to the weakness of the flesh, whereupon he fell into a relapse of spitting Blood (for which he again permitted a veyn to be opened) which laid on him a necessity of forbearing the Pulpit; yet would he never forgoe the administration of the Sacraments, nor his usual short discourse at Funerals suitable to the present occasion (whensoever he was solicited thereunto) though even those shorter exercises of his lungs were painful to him, and wasted that oil, which, like a burning light, he spent for the enlightning of others.

The main of his time was now spent in his study, and that was not designed as a meer entertainment of himself in a quiet privacy, but to the publick benefit of the Church for the present, and for posterity, as appears amongst other works, by those exquisite Annotations upon the Prophecies of Isaiah, Jeremiah, and the Lamentations; and we should have gained more by his later industry, if the malicious slanders of the enemies of the truth had not diverted his time, and studies to some necessary Apologies.

Neither did he, when he was by the hand of God disabled to preach, betray his Flock into the hands of Wolves, that would make a prey of precious souls, nor desert it. For being troubled, left the foundation that he had laid laid (after the example of the wise Master-builder, St. Paul) should either not be built upon, or destroyed, he retained the title of Rector, with a charge beyond the Revenue (as it was sometimes proved) till provision might be made of a faithfull, and Orthodox Minister, to whom he might comfortably devolve both the burden and the benefit.

His family
ment.

To his care of feeding his Flock in publick, very agreeable was his diligence in instructing his Family in private; For on Fryday nights weekly after supper, he used to expound that short Catechisme which he had published for the use of his Parishioners; in which course he so laid forth the Nature and Attributes of God, the state of man, both intire and corrupt, the means of his Fall, and Recovery; the nature of Faith and Repentance, with the Doctrine of the Sacraments; that his Parlour was one of the best Schooles for a young Student to learn Divinity in; and indeed his house was a private Seminary for divers young Gentlemen of this Nation, and far more Forreigners, who did resort to, and sojourn with him, to receive from him direction, and advancement in their studies; and many who afterwards were eminent in the Churches, both here, and abroad, were brought up under his eye, at least, as Paul was at the feet of Gamaliel.

Persons bred under him English Persons of note that had been his assistants, were Master Young, Master Goodal, Master Symonds, (of whom yet in these latter times of Division, Master Gataker hath been heard to say, It was pity that our Church had lost him, intimating his turning aside to wayes of separation) Master Grayle, and others who are yet living labourers in Gods Vineyard.

Forreigners

Of Forreigners that sojourned with him, and were as ambitious of being entertained by him as if they had been admitted into a University; these were some, Master Thylein, who was afterwards a Reverend Pastor of the Dutch Church in London (whose son was brought by his Mother but a fort-night before Master Gatakers decease, intreating the same good office in the behalf of him, which the Father had with much comfort enjoyed) Master Peters, Master Andrew Demetrius, Master Hornbeck, Master Rich, Master Swerd, Master Wittefrangel, Master Severinus Benzon, Master Georg de Mey, Doctor Treschovius, &c.

His great memory.

The strength of Master Gatakers memory was extraordinary, as may appear by this, that though he used no Common-place Book, yet had he in readiness whatsoever he had read, as is manifested by his manifold Quotations in all his works.

His great Learning.

His Gifts for edification may be conjectured by his works which are ex-rant, in which he hath shewed himself like the ingenious and industrious Bee for his rare extraction of all manner of knowledge from almost all Authors, and the solid digestion of it first, and then storing it up the publick good. His Polite Literature was admired by the great Lights of Learning abroad, as the excellent Salmasius, and others with whom he held correspondence. And the exercise of it, with condescension to children, hath been enjoyed with wonder and pleasure at his Visitation at Tunbridge School with the Right Worshipful Company of Skinners, the worthy Patrons thereof; and that which made all his knowledge both usefull and grateful, was, that he was neither vain in ostentation, nor morose, or illiberal in reservation of it. But beyond all, he sacrificed his Talents to God, while he made Hagar serve Sarah, and contributed the Egyptian spoils, all his forreign learning, towards the building of the Tabernacle: For with a strange felicity, he made his Human Literature (both his Moral and Critical studies) to become subservient to Religion, and instrumental to the explication of heavenly Truths.

His Graces of sanctification were very eminent in every condition, to all purposes, and towards all his Relations. In the private course of his life, his Piety, Humility and Charity were very remarkable.

His

His Piety appeared, not only by his diligence in Preaching, but also by his own frequenting Gods Ordinances dispensed by others; in order whereunto he did once a week at least, repair to some Lecture in London, so long as he had liberty to look beyond the bounds of his own Parish: He manifested his Piety also by his strict, careful, and conscientious observation of the Lords dayes, which he wholly consecrated (except the seasons of repast) unto holy duties, and imployments; and besides, he was free in his Contributions upon divers occasions to the maintaining of the Lords house of Prayer: And because there is a Connexion between sacred persons and things, his love to godly and faithfull Ministers may be looked upon as an act of Piety, as well as of Charity.

His Piety.

Another evident instance of his Zeal for Gods Glory, was, his constant consideration of the state of Gods Churches abroad, with a diligent enquiry how it fared with them, and a tender sense of their affliction, which begat his Meditation on Amos 6, 6. entituled, Sorrow for Sion: As also his earnest desire of a Reformation of things amiss amongst our selves, was doubtless acceptable unto God, though this sinful Nation is yet unworthy to have it accomplished. One special effect and property of his Piety was, that holiness of life expressed in a Constant tenor of good duties, with the abridgement of his liberty in things indifferent especially of Recreations (for he understood no Recreations besides study, and made the pleasanter part of his study, the sawce to the more severe) that he might give no scandal to the good, nor encouragement to the bad; alledging often those two golden Rules of St Paul, All things are lawfull, but all things are not convenient or expedient; And all things are lawfull, but all things edifie not, 1 Cor. 9. 6. & 10. 23.

His Zeal.

His holy life

His Humility appeared,

1. In that low esteem he had of his own gifts, which yet all others that knew him admired: He was a true Moses, that took not any notice of that shining lustre of his own countenance. Like a fair ear of Corn loaden with grain, he bended his head down-wards: For he had nothing of the Pharisaical temper, either to advance himself, or to vilifie his Brethren of meaner gifts.

His Humi-
lity.

2. In his freedome from ambition of outward advantages. For he declined not only large means in the Country, but also both Ecclesiastical Dignities and Courtly preferments. For he studiously waved the counsel of some who had given notice of him to that hopeful Prince Henry (whom God only shewed to this Land, and then snatched him away to himself) and had it in their design to make way for his being admitted Chaplain to his Highness; and for the same reason he constantly declined publick appearances, inasmuch as he could not, without much reluctancy, be drawn by those who had most interest in him unto more solemn Assemblies.

3. In his meek conversation with, and condescension to the meanest Christians: For he refused not familiarity to converse with the poorest Christian that repaired to him for counsel or satisfaction in their doubts.

His Charity was large, though for the most part secret, both in giving, and forgiving to poor persons: For he would not permit it to blaze, only allowed it to shine when his example was requisite to lighten and lead others to glorify God, and gratifie men. In redemption of Captives, relief of poor Protestants, especially of the Ministry, to the repairs of publick and common losses, and general calamities, and to the setting forward of any good work he was strangely liberal, the fruit whereof the Lord returned into his own bosome, according to that promise, The liberal soul shall be made fat. Yet did he not so exhaust himself in his life, but that in his last Will and Testament he did also bequeath unto the poor of the Parish of Redditch 50*l.* To ten of his Brethren in the Ministry, whose wants and necessities, especially if occasioned by the iniquity of the times, he gave 50*l.* 4*l.* 6*d.* each of them 5*l.* and to eight Ministers

Ministers

Ministers Widows 5 l. apiece, in all 40 l. to them. Thus his good works both went before him, and followed him also unto Heaven, whereby also he hath left behinde him the perfume of a good name, for the imitation of them that survive.

His Justice. Justice is presupposed unto Charity: For God hates robbery for sacrifice, Isa 61. 8. And Master Gataker was exactly just in giving every man his due, though very frequently he remitted of his own right, so that he was, according to the Hebrew phrase, a just man, that is, a kinde, equitabler person, of a milde disposition, no severe exacter of his own, and a free dispenser of Gods gifts, so that his Righteousness endures for ever, both to his honour upon earth, and to his happiness in Heaven.

His Prudence, and Faith. In, and about his death, to which the course of his declining dayes leads us, his Patience and Faith were very eminent; The latter attended with a deep sense of his own sins, which he acknowledged unto God, and to himself was that Confession needful: For as to men, his Conversation was, as a Bishops ought to be, Irreproveable, 1 Tim. 3. 2.

His Sickness. The first step to his decease (for morbus est via ad mortem, sickness is the rode way to death) was a fainting fit that surprized him on Fryday night, July the 7, or rather on Saturday morning, July the 8, yet of this he made no great account (for he disturbed not the rest of a servant by calling for assistance) because he had at sundry times such faintings, wherein he gave Nature leave to work out her Victory over those Vapours, or Viscous humors that oppressed her. Yet thus far he made use of it, that he compared his infirmity to that of Seneca, which, according to his relation, the Physitians of that age called, meditationem mortis, and wished that it might prove to him a preparation to his dissolution. The indisposition, not ceasing with the fit, discovered it self within a short time to be a Tertian Ague, which how gentle soever, yet falling upon a person of his age, and Crazie temper (who had long supported a weak frame with a very regular course of dyet) made his condition doubtful to his Physitian, who was one of learning and worth, that employed his best care and skill about that Patient, whom he looked upon as a considerable person to the whole Church.

His preparation for death. July the 17, Having published his Will, and taken such order as he thought fit for the settlement of his outward estate, he composed himself to God; his Tertian growing too strong both for Nature and Art, resolved it self into an almost continued Feaver, the extream heat whereof was very painful unto him; yet during those conflicts he shewed a sweet calmness of minde, a heart weaned from the world, to which he had no affection, though his memory exactly served him for ordering his charity even to the last; and in one word, he represented a soul wholly submitting to Gods good pleasure.

He professed more than once, that no outward thing troubled him so much, as the condition of that Reverend Minister Master Saint-hill, who had but lately undertaken that charge at Redrith upon the uncertain Title of Master Gatakers life, which now failing so soon, besides the expectation of his Friends, that Minister he foresaw was like to be unsettled, and thereby to suffer some inconvenience.

Though Friends, and Physitians gave him encouraging words at their visits, yet he, being sensible of his inward decayes, could not be flattered into vain hopes of long continuance here, earnestly contending that he was not to expect Miracles. His expectation of Gods dismissing of him hence, was so fixed, that being consulted whether he would appoint any one person to perform the last office for him? He not startled at the Question, appointed that Mr. Ash should be intreated to do that work, because he had done the same at his last wifes Funerals; and one opportunity casually offered it self to set forward that design. For July the 18. Master Ash, out of his kinde respect to Master Gataker, sent him him two Funeral Sermons preached by him, one at Master Whitakers, the other at the interment of Doctor Spurstons only childe. This gave occasion to Master Gataker, in the return for that favour, to request the last that he could be capable of.

Upon the receipt of a Letter to that purpose, Master Ash on the Saturday following, visited his dear and dying Friend, who then told him, that he found him conflicting with his last Adversary; and that though he knew the sting was pulled out, yet nature would struggle. These, and other of his expressions, Master Ash presently wrote down, and related them at the end of his Sermon. His words to Master Ash.

That day in the afternoon being July the 22. he called for some Papers of Master Baxters which were sent to him by the Author, with a desire of his judgement concerning them. He wished some short Notes (for the perusal of them had been his last work) to be read over to him, in which he altered something: And having dictated a Letter to that his Learned and Reverend Friend, he appointed that that, with the Animadversions inclosed, should be sent to him. So vigorous was his minde in a Body drooping, and dropping into the dust. His return to Master Baxter.

He had now given over the use of Physick as to any prolongation of his life: For he said that he would struggle no more, because he found that what was prescribed for the refreshing of nature, did rather oppress it, and therefore he was resolved to wait the Lords leisure. An ancient servant that waited on him, desiring leave to rectifie the bed-cloaths, and saying withall, Sir, your head doth not lye right; he answered, It will lye right in my Coffin. He waits for Death.

July the 25. at one a clock in the morning, Death began to seize on his left foot, from which the spirits retiring, he felt the deadness of that part, and a very sharp pain in the part of the leg adjoining to it. Hereupon he called for his Son, and told him, He feared that he should have a difficult death. He then commanded two Surgeons to be sent for to look upon his leg, whom he required to tell him, whether or no his Foot were any whit discoloured. It seems he had conceived some fear of a Gangrene, but being satisfied by them that there could not be any ground for such an apprehension, he rested with patience. In the evening of that day being visited by Master Saunders, and lying in great anguish by reason of the violence of his heat, he prayed for pity and patience; support here, and a comfortable issue. Death seizeth on his Leg.

July. 26. Early in the morning, being full of pain, gasping, and panting, he cryed out, How long Lord, How long? Come speedily. But though Death had made an encroachment upon his outward perishing part, yet his inward man felt no decay. For with a full use of reason, he that morning ordered the continuance of a weekly relief to certain poor persons, as also of some small monethly Pensions to some widows for a season: He also caused his Physitian to be consulted with, about taking something that might procure rest, and was erected to a more cheerfull disposition: He also enquired after News, and discoursed freely, yet confessed himself to be in pain. The vigour of his natural Parts.

About three a clock that afternoon, feeling some great change after the putting forth of Nature, he called his Sister, Son, and Daughter, to receive his last charge, and when they were come, he thus spake unto them, My heart fails, and my strength fails, but God is my Fortress, and the strong Rock of my salvation: Into thy hands therefore I commend my soul, for thou hast redeemed me, O God of truth: Then turning his discourse to his Son, he said, Son, you have a great charge, look to it: Instruct your wife and family in the fear of God, and discharge your Ministry conscientiously. To his Sister (a Gentlewoman two years elder than himself) he said, Sister, I thought you might have gone before me, but God calls for me first, I hope we shall meet in Heaven, I pray God to bless you. His Daughter he admonished, to minde the world less, and God more, for that all things without Piety, and the true fear of God are nothing worth. He advised also that his Son Draper (being a man of means) His last charge to his Relations.

means) should entertain some godly Minister into his house to teach his children, and instruct his family. He exhorted them all to love and concord, which (he said) he hoped the rather, because he had clearly settled his estate, so as to prevent differences. He enlarged himself in each of these a little, wishing them all to lay to heart, the words of a dying man. After this he desired that all should withdraw, and leave him to his rest, which he hoped was at hand: But all his conflicts were not yet accomplished.

His Death.

July the 27, His voice began to be less intelligible, the putrid preternatural heat having furred up his mouth, as is usual in Feavers; yet both his understanding, and senses were very quick and active: About six of the clock in the evening he called for his Son to recommend his soul unto God by prayer, and endeavoured to express what he desired, but could not do it so clearly as to be well understood; yet by his gestures he gave assurance that he understood perfectly, and concurred fervently with the devotions used on his behalf. Within an hour after, Nature being quite spent, he gave up the Ghost, and was translated into that Rest which he so often and earnestly had desired to find in another World, because he could obtain none in this.

Thus after forty three years inspection of this pious and diligent Pastor of Redrith, he left his Flock, returning to the great, and chief Shepherd of our souls, from his gracious hands to receive an incorruptible Crown of glory, having almost compleated fourscore years.

His Character.

For his Person, the express whereof (though he was often importuned by dear Friends) he would never allow to be taken either by pencil, or sculpture. He was of a middle stature, of a thin body, and of a lively countenance, of a fresh complexion; that looked young when he came to preach at Lincolns Inne, and yet was grey betimes, which made him to be thought elder than he was, because he had long appeared ancient in the eyes of the world; of a choicely temperate dyet; of a free and cheerful conversation, addicted much to study, yet not secluding himself from fit company. He was of a quick apprehension, sharp reason, solid judgement, vast memory, which (through Gods mercy) continued fresh to the last of his dayes. He was Helluo librorum, one that did not vainly encrease his Librery for ostentation; but chose Books for use, which also he made of them so happily, that he had conquered a strong portion of learning, which he made to serve him upon all occasions. He was not so great a treasurer, as a free dispenser of those riches of the mind, which he did communicate readily, expeditely, and clearly. He was an ornament to the University; and of that Society designed for the study of the Law; A Light of the Church, the salt of the place where he abode; A loving Husband; A discreet Parent; A faithful Friend; A kinde Neighbour; A courteous entertainer of strangers; A candid encourager of Students; A stout Champion for the Truth, yet a lover of peace, preserving the unity of Charity even where there was a difference of judgement; An Adversary to novel fancies, as well as to antiquated superstitions in Religion; of a Christian Magnanimity in despising the world, and therefore resolute, through bad report, as well as good, to maintain a clear conscience. In brief, he was a faithful Shepherd, and a fit mirror for Pastors, as well as an exact pattern for people; who having almost compleated eighty years departed full of dayes; but being dead, yet speaks in his living Monuments of sound Learning.

A Pious Epigram of Master Gataker, being a just expression of the intimate frame of his Soul; which was made by him, not long before his Death.

*I thirst for thirstiness, I weep for Tears;
Well pleas'd I am, to be displeas'd thus:
The only thing I fear, is want of Fears;
Suspecting I am not Suspicious.
I cannot choose but Live, because I Die;
And, when I am not Dead, how glad am I!*

*Yet, when I am thus glad for sense of pain,
And carefull am lest I should careless be;
Then do I grieve for being glad again,
And fear lest carelessness take care from me.
Amidst these restless thoughts this rest I finde,
For those that rest not here, there's rest behind.*

Many Epitaphs were made for him after his Death: amongst Which I shall make choice only of one or two.

On the Death of that Reverend, and eminently-Learned Divine, Master Thomas Gataker.

*Who's this that lates thus breathless? Doleful sighs!
The worthy Gataker; That beauteous Light
Hath left our Hemisphere. Ah! He is gon,
Who was the Glory deem'd of Helicon.*

The Muses joy is fled; a Magazine
Of Learning's here blown-up. The Sisters nine, Could they but rate their loss (such hath it been)
Wish Tears, they'd make an other Hippocrene.
Poor House of Clay! Oh, how it empty lies!
The Furniture's remov'd to Paradise.
Angels have hence convuls'd the Jewel-minds
Nought but the Cabinet is left behind.
Adieu young Nestor; Seldom have we seen
A Head so gray, and Parts so fresh and green.
His speech to deck, such Flowers he could bring,
In Age's Winter, one would swear 'twere Spring:
But now for Florid Language, we may find Dumb Rhetorick with silence cries her mind,
Oh! mind your latter ends; Death's sometimes late;
But who could ere his Life perpetuate?
We thought his Preaching done, but here we have One Sermon more, and for his Text, The Grave:
Be faithfull, you, who Sions-Walls do keep,
Watch-men themselves must once be laid to sleep.

THE

The Life and Death of Master Jeremy Whitaker, who died Anno Christi, 1654.

His Birth.

Jeremy Whitaker was born at Wakefield in Yorkshire, Anno Christi 1599. In which place also he was trained up in the Grammar-School; and it seems that the Lord betimes did draw forth his love towards himself; For even whilst he was a School-boy, his affections did flow out towards those who were most religiously disposed, in whose company he used frequently to go

His early seeking God eight or ten miles to hear a wakening-soul-warming Sermon; He used also to joyn with them in Prayers, and other holy exercises and duties; And being able to take Sermon Notes, both understandingly, and largely, he was very helpful to those private Christians in repeating what they had publickly heard, being from his child-hood full of affections in whatsoever business he undertook. Thus this Plant of Gods own setting, did both blossom, and put forth fruit quickly, which Providence did afterwards make a very fruitful Tree.

His esteem of the Ministry.

Whilst he was at the Grammer-School, though his Father endeavoured often, and earnestly to divert his thoughts from the Office of the Ministry, yet was he unmoveable in his desires to be a Minister, and he never afterwards repented of this his choice; but would all his life long upon all occasions, magnifie that his Office, insomuch as he hath often been heard to utter this speech, I had much rather be a preacher of the Gospel, than an Emperour; and when a motion was once made to him to be the Head of a Colledge in the University, he readily returned this answer, My heart doth more desire to be a constant Preacher, than to be the Master of any Colledge in the world.

His remove to Cambridge.

When he was sixteen years old, being well grounded at the Grammer School, he was sent to the University of Cambridge, and admitted a Sizar in Sydney-Sussex-Colledge, where he soon discovered, and was taken notice of, and much valued for his pregnant parts and Scholarship.

His remove to Okeham.

At twenty years of age he Commenced Batchelor of Arts, and a while after he was sent to Okeham (the chiefest Town in Rutlandshire) there to teach the Free-School.

At that time there was one Master William Peachy, the Minister at Okeham, a godly man, and a painful Preacher of the Gospel, and Eminent for his skill in the sacred Languages, who dearly loved, and highly valued our Master Whitaker from his first acquaintance with him; which he manifested by proffering to him his Daughter in Marriage, as Master Whitaker hath since told some of his Friends; He was the rather inclined to accept of the motion, because she was the Daughter of a pious, painfull, and learned Minister of the Gospel; And occasionally hath told his Friends, that he was the better pleased with his choice, because of that Relation.

About

About four years after his coming to Okeham he married Chephizibah, the Daughter of the said Master Peachy, by whom God gave him four Sons, and three Daughters. All his Sons he designed for the Ministry, but it pleased God in his life time, to take one of them away whilst he was a Student in Cambridge; The other three survived, and he lived to see two of them Ordained, and set apart for the work of the Ministry; The third he appointed to be educated for the same work.

His Marriage and Children.

Having staid about seven years at Okeham, he was removed to a Pastoral charge at Stretton in the same County, where he continued about the space of thirteen years.

His removal to Stretton.

Whilst he continued School-master at Okeham, he undertook and preached a weekly Lecture there, besides many Sermons which he preached occasionally in neighbouring Congregations: And during his abode at Stretton, besides his Pastoral employment, wherein he preached twice every Lords day, he also constantly preached his weekly Lecture at Okeham, and was a principal prop to hold up some other Lectures in the Neighbourhood. His manner also was to set apart every Holy-day (if there were but one in the week) as a day of seeking God in reference to the necessities of the times, and no man was more free, and frequent in assisting in dayes of Humiliation in private, both in Rutlandshire, and in the adjacent Counties when-soever he was called, and invited thereunto.

His great Pains.

His frequent Fasting.

Such was his love to Christ, that his publick employments (though many and great) did not take him off from attending his Family duties, nor from more private exercises of communion with God; His ordinary course in his Family was, together with Prayers, to expound some part of the holy Scriptures, and that twice every day, besides other parts of Scripture which he daily read in secret; so that usually he read all the Epistles in the Greek Testament twice every fortnight; Yea, when by reason of extremity of pain, and weakness, he could not read himself, he herein employed others for his help. Hence it came to pass that he was a man mighty in the Scriptures, like unto Apollos, Act. 18. 24. as was observed by all that conversed with him, or that heard him Preach or Pray, and this course he earnestly commended to the practice of his dearly beloved eldest Son, as an excellent means to make him both a ready, and a profitable Preacher.

His Family duties.

Whilst he lived in Rutlandshire, came forth the Book allowing Sports on the Sabbath, which he refused to read, though it was with commands and threatening pressed upon him. And afterwards when he was called to give in his answer about a contribution amongst Ministers to maintain the War against the Scots, he openly told the Bishop, or his Chancellor, that his conscience would not permit him to do it. This his answer exposed him to the hazard of losing both his Living and Ministry, as the times then were; Whereupon one of his neighbours, through misguided love, (compassionating him and his Family) payed the money required, and subscribed Master Whitakers name without his knowledge. This was long concealed from him; but when he came to the knowledge of it, he expressed his dislike with many complaints, and much grief of heart.

His Zeal and Courage.

As he had early, so he had constant vigorous workings of Heart towards the calling and work of the Ministry, and that upon this ground, because he alwayes conceived, that therein a Christian might enjoy most fellowship with Christ, and have opportunities of doing him the best service, and he often considered Christs speech to Peter, If thou lovest me, feed my Sheep; feed my Lambs, Joh. 21. 15, 17.

His delight in the Ministry.

He was never so well pleased with any employment as when he was about the works of his Ministry: In the Pulpit he was (as it were) in his own Element, like a Fish in the water, or a Bird in the air. Though many times he went thither halting, and full of pain, yet did he not manifest any sense of distemper whilst he was in the Pulpit.

When

He is chosen to the Assembly.

He is chosen to Mary Magdalens Bermondsey.

His great Industry.

He was a Universal Scholar.

His Zeal and Courage.

When an Assembly of Divines was to be chosen to consult, and advise the Parliament about Ecclesiastical affairs, he was, for his Eminent piety and learning, nominated for one, and how usefull and advantageous he was to those affairs, is well known to all that were Members of that Assembly; And when Providence had thus brought him to London, he was (as Paul, 2 Cor. 11. 23.) In Labours more abundant, than many, yea than most others.

Not long after his coming to London, he was called, and chosen to the Pastoral charge of Mary Magdalens Bermondsey in Southwark, about which he consulted with many godly and judicious Ministers, and with their consent and approbation accepted of it, after which, for the most part, his task was to preach constantly four Sermons every week, two in his own Charge, one at Westminster, and one at Christ Church London; and after he had laid down his Christ-Church Lecture, at the importunity of the Inhabitants, he took up one at Stepney, besides his preaching two Lectures quarterly at Michaels Cornhill: Add to these his preaching monethly at the morning Exercises, or else he assisted on the Fast dayes in the conclusion of those Exercises; besides his many occasional Sermons, as for preparation to the Sacrament in his own Church, and at Funerals, both at home and abroad; yea, it is truly reported of him, that he would never deny any request for preaching and praying, if God gave him bodily ability, or other unavoidable occasions did not necessarily hinder him. Many week dayes he preached twice, even then when he attended the work of the Assembly of Divines, to wit, the morning Exercise, either at Westminster, or else where, and upon some other occasion in the afternoon of the same day. This may minde us of the commendation which St. Paul gave of Epaphroditus, Phil. 2. 30. For the work of the Lord he was nigh unto death, not regarding his life. So its well known to multitudes, that this might fitly be applied to painfull Master Whitaker; yea many conceived that his painfull diseases, which hastened his removal from us, were occasioned, and encreased by his many constant, and indefatigable labours in this kinde:

And though he Preached so often, yet were not his Sermons jejune, wordy, empty Sermons; but alwayes full of Scripture strength, savoury, and affectionate, as his Auditors can well testifie.

Neither is this to be wondred at, if we consider that he was a universal Scholar, both in the Arts, and Original Languages: By much study he had digested the whole body of Divinity; He was well acquainted both with the Fathers and School-men: An acute and solid Disputant, excellently versed in Cases of Conscience, and second unto none in his acquaintance with the sacred Scriptures.

Since our times of wofull desertion and Apostasie, both from Gospel-Truths and practices, he would undauntedly both in private Conferences; and in his publick Ministry express his dislike, yea his detestation thereof, to the faces of them, how great soever, who too much favoured Heresies, Errors, and Ranting courses, though he knew that thereby he did run the hazard of procuring many frowns to himself.

He refused to sign and subscribe the late Engagement, though thereby he was in danger of losing his Lecture at Westminster; and if his Sermons preached there upon Eph. 2. 2, 3. concerning mens walking according to the course of this world, &c. Fulfilling the lusts of the flesh, &c. could be collected, and published, it would thereby appear, that Master Whitaker, out of his zeal for Gods glory, and love to his Lord Christ, was of an undaunted courage, and full of Christian magnanimity. One further testimony whereof we have in this following Story:

Since these stormy times began, wherein the liberty and livelyhood of Ministers hath been so much maligned and struck at, as he was riding with one of his his intimate friends by Tiburn (which he had not seen, or not observed before) he asked what that was? and being answered, that it was Tiburn, where so many Malefactors had lost their lives; he stopped his Horse, and uttered these words with much affection, Oh what a shame is it that so many thousands should dye for the satisfaction of their lusts; and so few be found willing to lay down their lives for Christ! Why should not we in a good cause, and upon a good call, be ready to be hanged for Jesus Christ? It would be an everlasting honour, and it is a thousand times better to dye for Christ, to be hanged, or to be burnt for Christ, than to dye in our beds.

He did often, and zealously defend the Office of a Gospel-Ministry both in publick, and in private, and that especially amongst those persons; and in those places, where (as he conceived) there was most need. In one of his morning Lectures at Westminster, this passage came from him with much affection, Though (said he) I have read, and heard of some good men, who unadvisedly in their passion, have persecuted the persons of some godly Ministers (as Aha was angry with the Prophet, and cast him into prison) yet I never knew, I never read, nor heard of any godly person who durst oppose the Office and Calling of the Ministry. And whereas at the end of his Sermon, a Souldier (expressing himself to be dissatisfied with what he had spoken) came to him in private, and asked him, whether he meant this of the Ministry of England, as now Constituted? He returned him this answer, Although I will not justify the calling of every individual Minister in the Church of England (as you dare not justify the Saintsip of every member in your Independent - Congregations) yet I will be ready, when, and where you please, to maintain the Office and Calling of Englands Ministry at this day.

And that he continued unmoved, and unchanged in his judgement, and esteem of the Ministerial Calling to the last, may be manifested by this passage in his last Will and Testament, which is here set down in his own words, and written with his own hand, For my Son Jeremiah, my desire is, that he be bred a Scholar, and that the Lord would spiriually incline his heart, freely to give up himself to the Lord to serve him in the work of the Ministry, which Calling and Employment (though now despised) I do esteem above all others in the world, and do commend it to all mine, that if the Lord bless them with Sons, they would commend this Calling to their Posterity.

And truly this deserves seriously to be considered, whether there be not herein much to credit and encourage the Ministry of the Gospel, that a learned man, and so eminent for piety, who also had throughly studied the Controversie of the times, and had heard and read what could be said against the Ministry, should yet upon his Death-bed give such a Testimony unto it, when he daily expected to make up his account before God, and also give such great encouragement to his Posterity, to addict themselves to this calling now, even now, when such disgrace is cast upon it, and when the Ministers settled maintenance is threatened to be taken from them? And may not those men, who knew Master Whitakers worth, be hereby awed and moved to take heed how they oppose or slight that Calling of men, whom he, living and dying, judged to be so highly honoured by God himself? To this also adde, that it was an Ordained Ministry, which he thus valued, which appears by these two lively Testimonies; 1. In that he joyned with that Classis whereof he was a member in Ordaining of Ministers. 2. In that he had an hand in the Book not long since published by the Province of London in the defence of such a Ministry, not onely by his assent to it, but also by his assistance in drawing it up.

As Master Whitaker loved God dearly, so God loved him, which he manifested by those graces wherewithall he enriched him; and truly, love-tokens to him, are real Messengers of his love that sendeth them; and what surer signs can we have of Gods love, than when he bestows upon us the Graces of his Holy Spirit? Now of these the Lord had given him a more than ordinary measure; And besides what hath been said before, there were five Graces more which were very Orient, and shining in his Crown.

His tender-heartedness.

1. His tenderness of heart: Who ever knew a man of a more melting frame of heart before God, whether in Confessions, Petitions, or Thanksgivings? Is there any one living that can say, that I have at sometimes joyned with him in Prayer, and he shed no tears? How did his own sinfulness (though it was no more than the ordinary imperfections of the fairest Saint upon earth) the evils of the times, and the testimonies of Gods displeasure breaking out upon us, break his heart into pieces? We may truly believe that for the space of many years, he did never come off from the serious consideration of these things with dry eyes; and how many Thousands be there of Gods children, that would account it a sign of much love from Christ, if they could find such thawings in their frozen Breasts?

His Meek-
ness.

2. His meekness of spirit, with which precious Jewel he was richly adorned: Who ever saw him transported by passion, on a fire, through foolish anger, or disguised by discontent? Though his zeal would wax hot, and burn in him, for God and his Glory; yet he was a man of a cool spirit, and meek, like Moses, in all his own concerns; and this he hath often manifested in a remarkable manner, when disputing with men of dissenting Principles and opinions, yet his spirit was so even, that their unhandsome provocations could not discompose him, and drive him into passion.

His Patience

3. For his Patience, he may well be called a second Job. Many who saw him under those racking pains in his last sickness, so frequently reiterated, and so long continued, were confident that God did put him, and keep him in his Furnace to be a pattern of patience unto Posterity. It is confessed, that he did roar many times till his throat was dry; but who ever heard him speak any one word of murmuring or discontent, because of Gods afflicting Providence? He himself indeed would sometimes through tenderness of Conscience charge himself of impatience, because he made a noise in his extremity: but that expressed onely Natures sensibleness, not sinful frowardness; and when (accusing himself causelessly) he was minded of Christs roarings, yet free from all sin, he would be silent.

I confess indeed, that in his desires to be dissolved, he would take up Jobs complaint, Wherefore is light given to him that is in misery, and life unto the bitter in soul? which long for death, but it cometh not, and dig for it more than for hid treasures, &c. For my sighing cometh before I eat, and my roarings are poured out like waters, Job 3. 20, 24. But he alwayes concluded with submission to the good pleasure of God. When he had been asked how he did? This was frequently his answer, The Bush alwayes burning, but not consumed; and though my pains be above the strength of nature, yet they are not above the supports of Grace.

His spirit of prayer.

4. The Lord was pleased to vouchsafe him such a measure of the Spirit of Grace and Supplications, that his soul was never out of tune for that service. Most of his words when he was under torment, were holy complaints and prayers to God. It will not be impertinent or unprofitable, if I here set down some of them.

O my God, help! Father of mercies, pity! Do not contend for ever! Consider my frame, that I am but dust! My God that hath made Heaven and earth, help me! Oh, give me patience, and inflict what thou wilt! If my patience was more, my pain would be less. Dear Saviour, where are thy bowels? Why dost thou make me an astonishment to my self and others? Why dost thou cover thy self with a thick cloud, that our prayers cannot pass? Blessed is the man that endureth temptation. Lord this is, a sad temptation, stand by me, and say, It is enough! Am I not thy Servant? Consider Lord that I am thy servant. O these bitter waters of Marah! Lord drop sweet comfort into these bitter waters of Marah. O the blood of sprinkling, Lord, the blood of sprinkling, Lord! That blood which extinguisheth the fire of thine anger; O that it might allay my burning pains! I am in a fiery Furnace: Lord be with me as thou wast with the three Children, and bring me out refined from sin! when I have sailed through the Ocean of these pains, and look back, I see that none of them can be wanting. I flye unto thee, O God, hide me under the shadow of thy wings till these terrible storms be overpast.

5. God added Humility as a Crown to all his other Graces, which yet shone bright in the eyes of all that were acquainted with him: Indeed he was clothed with Humility: And hence it was that he would converse so familiarly with the poorest Christians, and with them who were of the lowest parts for knowledge, even with babes in Christ. This his ordinary expression of himself before God, did clearly demonstrate his great humility, Poor worm! Sinful wretch! O pardon my transgressions for they are very great. Hereupon he would weep much, when he was told how much he was prayed for, wondering at Gods goodness, that so sinful a wretch, and worthless a creature should have so much interest in the hearts, and prayers of the people of God. And his language in his Will speaks how little he was in his own eyes; The words are these, I desire that at my Funeral there may be no pomp; but that so poor a worthless wretch may be privately laid in the ground.

His Humility.

And as his Graces were many, so were his Comforts many, and great, which God vouchsafed as singular manifestations of his love to this his dear Servant, and Child. O what Kisses of Christs Mouth, and what imbraces from the Arms of his Love were bestowed upon this Saint of the most High: He enjoyed all along his afflicted condition, an uninterrupted assurance of Gods Fatherly love in Christ. In his addresses unto God, he constantly claimed propriety in God, calling him, my God, and my Father. His inward peace, and joy were the support of his heart under all his grievous, and grinding pains. He was confident of mercies mixtures with all his greatest distempers, not at all doubting of the sanctification of them to him through Grace. Thus he spake many times in his applications unto God, Consider, and save me, for I am thine. How long, how long Lord, shall I not be remembered, yea I am remembered blessed be thy Name. This is a fiery Chariot, but it will carry me to Heaven: Blessed be God that hath supported me hitherto; and he that hath delivered, will yet deliver. Thou Lord never forgettest them that put their trust in thee. Alwayes when the extremity of pain was over, he would with smiles speak of Gods mercies. Though trembling took hold upon him when his violent pains began, yet would he with confidence say, Now in the strength of the mighty God, I will undergo these pains: O my God put under thine everlasting Arms, and strengthen me. Many times he told a bosome friend of his, that notwithstanding all his rentings and roarings (from which he expected no deliverance but by death) he would not for a thousand worlds change estates with the greatest man on earth, whom he looked upon as in a way of sin, and enthralled thereto. And this much he speaks Gods Fatherly indulgence towards him, that Satan could never shake his confidence, nor assault his hopes all the time of his Irsome, Irsome distemper. And this was further very remarkable, that he counted all these inward cheerings, the fruits of Prayers that were made for him, though God saw cause to deny that ease, and recovery to his Body which was so much begged; and withall, he valued those spiritual cordials, and refreshings, far beyond deliverance from the Gout, and the Stone, yea and Death it self.

His Comforts Faith and Joy.

These things are the rather mentioned, to prevent that discouragement, or offence which some may be too apt to take at the violence, and continuance of his wasting and tormenting pains, notwithstanding his own godliness, and the uncessant prayers, both ordinary and extraordinary, which were made unto God in his behalf; For he found the sweet fruits of them in his own bosome, even when he felt the continuance, and increase of his Bodily grief.

His love to the Saints.

Another thing very remarkable in holy Master Whitaker, was his love to his fellow Christians; he was a man made up (as it were) of love. His delight was in the Saints upon earth, whom he esteemed most excellent, and their society was a constant cordial to his spirit. His frequent visits of them that were in trouble, and his stirring up of others to the like practice, were testimonies of this his cordial love; which indeed was not verbal, but real. He was also abundant in works of charity, few men of his estate did equalize him therein. He would often say, It is a brave thing when a man, together with a full estate, hath a charitable heart. Sometimes upon special occasions he hath given away all the money that he had in the House. It was not unusual with him to give twenty shillings to a poor Saint, and he had many Experiences of Gods gracious returns in such cases. By his last Will he gave twenty pounds to the godly poor of his own Parish.

His Sympathy.

There were two Cases wherein his loves were most enlarged to the people of God, whereof you may take these two Instances; The one when the sufferings were publick. He often told an intimate Friend of his, that Englands late breach with Scotland, and the Blood that was shed, together with other sad consequences thereof, had taken such impression upon his heart, that the sorrow would never be removed till his death; and the sufferings both in Holland and in England, in our late Sea-fights, were an heavy burden upon his spirit. The other Case was in respect to the inward perplexity of such as were afflicted in minde; having moved a special Friend of his the week before his death, to bestow a visit upon one in that condition, the very morning before his death (when speech was grievous to him in respect of his great weakness) he asked him, whether he had remembered the party that was troubled in spirit? which was a remarkable evidence of his strong love to such. And besides what hath already been mentioned, I might here set down his many wrestlings with God to prevent the flood of troubles which he apprehended the Protestant Churches were now in danger to be overflowed withall; as also his compassionate respect to Congregations in the Country, which were like sheep wandring upon the barren mountains without a Shepherd.

He was much beloved.

And as his love flowed forth to the Saints, so was theirs no less towards him: Nor to speak of the many frequent, and friendly visits of godly men and women in the Neighbour-hood round about him; there was scarce ever heard of any man that was so much prayed for both in publick and in private; both upon ordinary and extraordinary occasions, as he was. There was no particular case so frequently, so affectionately spread before God in most of the Congregations about London as his. Three dayes were set apart by Ministers, and many other praying Friends to seek God in his behalf, one in private, and two in publick, which also were observed much better than such dayes usually have been of late; yea, in remote Countries, besides the ordinary Prayers made for him, there were some Fasts kept also with special reference to his afflictions. The multitude of people, that came to his Funeral, with the many weeping eyes, did clearly shew how much he was beloved. Here might also be remembered the readiness of the London Ministers to supply his place at home, and his Lectures else-where, as also the willingness of his Fellow-lecturers at Westminster to preach for him there, when he himself by reason of weakness could not possibly do his own work, but its needless; for still every where, upon the naming of Master Whitaker, love is some way discovered by such as had any knowledge of him.

Whilst he was able, he never neglected his Ministerial service; He hath often often gone upon Crutches unto the Congregation of his own people, to fulfil his Ministry; Yea, once at least he adventured to Preach at Michaels Corn-hil, when he was scarce able to get into the Pulpit, and his Friends with much difficulty help him out of the Church home-wards; And at other times when his legs would not serve him, he used to ride to Church. And when he was by extremity of pains taken off from his Ministry, he would sometimes profess to some special Friends, that the pain felt was not so grievous to his spirit, as his inability, by reason thereof, to mannage his wonted work: Indeed it was his meat and drink, to be doing the will of his Heavenly Father. Many times these were his words, If I could but preach, I should be much better; And he would rejoyce with cheerfulness and thankfulness, when in the times of his weakness he found not himself more distempered by his preaching, and would mention such experiences, as arguments to move; and induce his Friends to yeeld to his preaching when they dissuaded him from it as prejudicial to his health.

His delight
in Preaching

Anno Christi 1654, about the beginning of November, the violent pain of the Stone, did in such a manner arrest him, that from that time he continued Gods prisoner, confined to his Bed or chamber, till he was set free by a long expected, and much desired death. Most Physicians in the City were consulted with, and were from time to time very ready to serve him with their advice, who did unanimously conclude, that his sharp pains proceeded Originally from an Ulcer in the Kidnies, but immediately from an Ulcer in the neck of the Bladder, caused by a continual flux of Ulcerous matter dropping down upon that part; and by reason of the acuteness and quickness of the sense there, his pains were almost continually in that place, though the fountain of them was from the Kidnies.

His sickness

About two moneths before his Death, his pains grew more extreame, yet Divine indulgence vouchsafed at some times some mitigation of them, and intermission both in the night and day: But notwithstanding the long continuance and extremity of them neither his Faith nor Patience did abate; yea, they much encreased, and grew higher; and as he grew nearer his end, so his longings for death were much increased, yet accompanied with holy submission to the good pleasure of his gracious Father.

These were some of his expressions, O my God, break open the Prison door, and set my poor captive soul free! But enable me willingly to wait thy time! I desire to be dissolved: never did any man more desire life, than I do Death! When will that time come, that I shall neither sin more, nor sorrow more? When shall mortality put on immortality? When shall this earthly Tabernacle be dissolved, that I may be clothed upon with that House which is from Heaven? Blessed are the dead which dye in the Lord; for they rest from their labours, and follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth.

His holy Speeches.

So great was his love to his God and Saviour, that he maintained and expressed high estimations, and honourable thoughts of his Majesty, when he was under the most tormenting providences: He feared nothing more, than lest he should do or speak any thing that should redound to the dishonour of his Name. These were some breathings of his large love, when through pain he was as in the fire, or upon the rack: Good Lord keep me from dishonouring of thy Name by impatience! Oh, who would not even in burnings have honourable thoughts of God! who that knows thee, would not fear thee, O Lord, love thee, and honour thee? Lord, thou givest me no occasion to have any hard thoughts of thee! Blessed be God, there is nothing of Hell in all this! Blessed be his Name for Jesus Christ, and the Revelation of the everlasting Gospel! Who knows the power of thy wrath? If it be so heavy upon thy servant here, how heavy shall it be to all those who shall endure it without mixture? Blessed be God for the peace of mine inward man, when my outward man is full of trouble! This is a bitter Cup, but it is of my Fathers mixture, and shall I not drink it?

yea

yea Lord, through thy strength I will: This is my burthen, and I will bear it.

Upon any abatements of his excruciating pains, he was constantly much in blessing God, using these, and such like expressions: O! what a mercy is it that there is any mitigation, any intermission! Lord make me thankfull. And turning himself towards those that stood by, he would bespeak them thus; O help me to be thankfull! O list up a Prayer for me that I may be thankful! O what a Mercy is this! How much worse might this affliction have been! I might have been distracted, or laid roaring under disquietness of spirit: By these, and many such like expressions, and workings of his spirit, who perceiveth not the sparklings of his love to God? And to a dear friend he often said, Brother, through mercy, I have not one repining thought against God.

The Sabbath seven night before God released him, though his pains were very sharp, yet he bestowed most part of the time of publick Ordinances, in prayer, together with those that were about him, and his Petitions were most in the behalf of Ministers, that God would cloath his Ordinances with his own power, and enable his Ministers to speak to the souls of his people. Then did he also with many tears bewail his detainment from the Sanctuary, and Sabbath-opportunities of doing, and receiving good, which had been his delight: Professing also, that his being taken off from service, was a greater affliction to him than all his bodily pains. And because this apprehension (to wit, of his present unserviceableness) did much afflict him; this therefore was often suggested to him (which the Lord pleased to make a relief to his spirit) viz. that now by the practice of Faith, Patience, Contentment, and spiritualness (which he had formerly preached to, and pressed upon others) he was very profitable unto them who visited him, and might also prove very advantagious unto others who might be acquainted therewith, through Gods grace by Christ.

His tormenting Pains.

So great was his tender respect to his Friends, that when his pains were coming with violence, he would intreat them to withdraw from him, that they might not be grieved with his roarings; and he used often to bless God, that his compassionate Friends were not necessitated to abide within the reach of his dolefull lamentation.

As his death drew more nigh, so his fits of pain were more frequent, either every half hour, or many times every quarter, yea two or three in a quarter of an hour, which did exceedingly abate his strength.

The night before God took him out of this vale of tears, Master Ash hearing that he was not likely to live another day, went early in the morning to take his leave of him, whom his soul loved, at which time he found his bodily strength much decayed; and perceiving that he could not speak without much difficulty, Master Ash spake the more unto him in reference to the approach of his happy hoped for change, and his discourse (through Gods mercy) was very refreshing to his spirit. He told him also that many of his Friends intended to set apart that day in seeking the Lord for him, and asked him, in what things especially he desired to be remembered before the Throne of Grace? His answer was, Do not complain, but bless God for me, and intreat him to open the Prison door. Then Master Ash, laying his hand upon his cold hand, covered with a clammy sweat, took his farewell of him with an aking heart; and upon his departure from him, the last words which Master Whitaker spake to him were these; Brother, I thank you, I pray God bless you, and I bless God for you.

That day was spent in addresses to God for him at Peters Cornhill, where Master Newcomen quickned and guided our prayers in his Sermon upon Joh. 11. 4. Lord, Behold he whom thou lovest is sick, and Master Fenkin endeavoured to moderate, and regulate our sorrows from Luke 23. 38. Weep not for me.

His Death. Thus his friends having by prayers and praises (on his behalf) given him to God and having prepared their hearts for the loss of him, the Lord was pleased that evening to take him to himself, June 1654. being above Fifty five years old.

After his death, Master Holiard opened his Body in the presence of Dr. Cox, Doctor Micklethwaite, and Doctor Bevoir; (some other more ancient Doctors would have been there, if, either their being out of Town, or present urgent occasions had not hindered) being opened, they found both his Kidnies full of Ulcers, and one of them was swelled to an extraordinary bigness through the abundance of purulent matter in it. Upon the neck of his Bladder, they found a stone, (which was about an inch and an half long, and one inch broad, weighing about two ounces when it was first taken out) and withall, they found an Ulcer which was gangrenized, and this was judged to be the cause of his Death. All other parts of his body were found firm and sound.

He was so humble, that he feared lest Gods people praying for him, should speak too well of him before the Lord.

He was a self-denying man, never daring to look after great matters in this world; whereby he condemned many whose self seeking in earthly advantages, renders them very offensive and unfavoury in the Church of Christ.

"Master Calamy speaking of him, saith; If I should enter upon his Commendations, I might truly say what Nazanien doth of his Sister Gorgonia; "that I have more cause to fear, lest I should speak below, than above the truth: For he was a burning and a shining light in this our Israel: A Messenger, and an Interpreter one amongst a Thousand: A Bazaleel in Gods Tabernacle: A true Nathaniel, that by his Integrity, Humility, Constancy, Charity, Publickness, and Peaceableness of Spirit, and by his Diligence, and Faithfulness in Preaching the Gospel, made his life both amiable and desirable. I will say of him, as it was said of Athanasius, that he was "Adversus omnes Martyres, an Adamant, and a Loadstone. To all that conversed with him, he was as a Loadstone to draw their hearts to love him: But in the cause of God, and in reference to the truths of Christ, he was "as an unconquerable Adamant. He was a Jeremy, both in mourning for, and in witnessing against the sins of the times. He was a second Whitaker, though not so eminent in Learning, as to be (what is said of him) Mundi miraculum, Academia Oraculum, The miracle of the world, and the Oracle of the University; Yet he was (which is also said of him) found in the Faith; one that had no private opinion, that did not in veteri via novam semitam quarere, seek out new paths of his own, but kept the old way, and the old path. That had a great Wit without any Mixture of Mad-ness.

"He preached no less by the heavenliness of his Doctrine, than by the holiness of his Life; Yea he Preached as effectually by his Death, as by his Life or Doctrine; For so great was the patience which God measured out to him, that though in his extremity of torments he groaned, yet he never grumbled. Though he often mourned, yet he never murmured; Nay, though he often roared by reason of the greatness of his pain, yet he always justified and magnified God therein; And this he did so constantly, and in such a measure, that, as it is said of Job, so it will be said by the Saints that succeed us, for their mutual consolation, and encouragement, Ye have heard of the Patience of Whitaker: He had indeed an ulcerated flesh, but a sound and whole Spirit, and that enabled him to bear his infirmity: He had a stone in the Bladder, but a very soft and tender heart: He had a gangrene in his Body, but a sound soul, unstained by sin. I heard him often say with thankfulness, that under all his bodily sufferings, he had a blessed calmness, and quietness in his Spirit, that God spake peace unto him, That though he roared for pain, yet the Devil was chained up from roaring upon him.

On the Death of my dear Friend,
Mr. Jeremiah Whitaker

IF Death be but a servant, sent to call
 The souls of Saints to their Originall:
 Dear Saint! thine was a Noble soul, to whom
 Three Messengers were sent to call thee home!
 A Stone, an Ulcer, and a Gangrene too,
 Three Deaths to hasten that which one should do!
 'Twas not because thy soul was deeper set
 Than ours, within its house of clay; nor yet
 Because thou wert unwilling to depart
 Thither, where long before had been thine heart:
 They were not sent to hale by violence,
 A soul that lingred when 'twas called hence.
 God shew'd how welcome one Death was to thee;
 Who didst so meekly entertain all Three.
 Thus many Deaths Gods Israel did inclose,
 The Sea before, behinde a Sea of Foes;
 On either side the jaws of Mountains high,
 No way from Death, but unto Death to flye.
 Not to destroy them, but to let them see
 The power of love, which then would set them free.
 Thus Jobs four Messengers which did relate
 The doleful story of his ruin'd state:
 And his three Friends which acted Satans part
 (He on his flesh, and these upon his heart)
 Who by disputing him unto a curse,
 Would make his spirits torments far the worse,
 Were by Gods wise disposal sent to show
 The strength he on his Champion would bestow.
 Thus Painters put dark grounds where they intend
 To overlay with finest gold, and lend
 By deeper shadows lustre to that face,
 On which they mean their choisest skill to place.
 Thus workmen season much with Sun and wind
 Those greatest beams which must the building binde, Whilst smaller pieces haply are put in
 When they come bleeding from the wood, and green.
 Oft where is greatest grace, God's pleas'd to send Great conflicts those great Graces to commend.

As the six fingred Giants sword did bring
 The more renown to little Davids sling.
 The vanquish'd Lion, and the conquered Bear
 Prepar'd that Holy Head a Crown to wear.
 The Angel wrestled first, and then did bless
 And made the greater servant to the less.
 Pain was too great for thee, Gods grace for pain,
 And made the greater serve the less again.
 Thy pains serv'd thee for glory, and did fit
 The Head on which a Crown of life must sit.
 This is Gods method to fetch joy from grief,
 To turn our sorrows unto our relief,
 To save by killing, and to bring to shore
 By the ships planks which was quite broke before.
 And thus a barren womb first took the seed
 Which did six hundred thousand people breed.
 That seed too, must from knife and Altar rise,
 And be before a fire a Sacrifice.
 Great Preacher of thy Heavenly Fathers will,
 Thy tongue did many years with Manna fill.
 Thy life out preach'd thy tongue, O blessed strife!
 Thy sickness the best Sermon of thy life.
 Before each Doctrine must be prov'd a new,
 Thine end was one great proof that all was true.
 Before thou preach'd by weeks, but now by hours,
 Each minute taught thy mourning Auditors,
 Each patient groan, and each believing eye
 Was a new Sermon in Brachygraphy.
 When Nature roars without repining words;
 Grace in the mouth when in the Bowels swords,
 In midst of torments to triumph o're Hell,
 To feel Gods Arrows, yet his Praises tell.
 Through thickest clouds to see the brightest light
 In blackest darkness to have clearest sight,
 And with our Lord to cry, My God, My God,
 Upon a Cross under the sharpest Rod.
 This is indeed to preach; this is to show
 Faiths triumph over Natures greatest woe.
 Then welcome fiery Serpents, scorching sting,
 Which did thee thus to th' Brazen Serpent bring.
 Then welcome Whale, which though his first devour, Renders at last the Prophet to the shore.
 Well might'st thou bear the stone which Death did throw,
 Who had'st the White Stone, the Nevv Name to show:
 Well might'st thou be with such an Ulcer calm
 Whose soul was heal'd before with Heavens Balm.
 When spirits wounds are cur'd though Nature groan;
 An heart of Flesh can heal a back of stone:
 Let Conscience have her feast, and let flesh roar,
 This pain shall make the others joy the more,
 As many times those Flowers most fragrant smell
 Which nearest to some noysome weeds do well.
 Thus have you seen the Forge most clearly glow,
 On which the Smith doth drops of water throw.
 Keen Frosts make fire the hotter, and deep night
 Causeth Celestial Lamps to shine more bright.

*And by a dear Antiperistasis,
 The Childs distress sweetens the Fathers kiss.
 A wounded body yeelds to a sound soul,
 The joyes of this do th'others pains controule.
 As in the day that the Sun beams appear
 All other lesser Stars do disappear.
 When Heaven shines, and Divine love doth reign,
 The soul is not at leasure to complain.
 Internal joyes his heart so well composes,
 That they have judg'd their flames a bed of Roses.*

Master Gataker, Master Whitaker.

*But what shall England do, from whence are lopt,
 Two of her richest Acres to Heaven dropt?
 By loss of these two Acres she's more poor,
 Then if sh'had lost an hundred Lordships more.
 'Twere a good purchase to gain these agen,
 By giving to the Sea all Lincoln Fen.
 Two little Mines of Gold do far surpass
 Huge Mannors, where th'whole vesture is but grass.
 Learn we by them, what all men will once say,
 One Pearch of Heaven, 's worth the whole Globe of clay.*

DR. JAMES USHER
 The Life and Death of James Usher, Doctor of Divinity, Arch-Bishop of Armagh, Primate and Metropolitan of all Ireland, who died Anno Christi 1655.

Alexander the Great commanded that no man should draw his Picture but Apelles, the most exquisite Painter in the world; and that his Statue should not be made in brass by any one but Lysippus, the most excellent Work-man in that kinde: So truly, the Life and Death of this great and good man is fit to be written only by the ablest Pen that can be found.

Reverend, and Learned Doctor Bernard, who was of my ancient acquaintance above forty years ago in Emanuel Colledge in Cambridge, hath written his Life and Death excellent well. Yet as there can never too much be spoken, or written of him, whom all the Christian world did admire for his Religion and Learning, so give me leave out of him, with some other help to set him forth, though not to the life in his native colours as he deserveth, yet according to my ability, that his Name may be enrolled amongst those many other Worthies both ancient and Modern, men famous in their Generations, burning and shining Lights in the Church, and very instrumental to Gods glory, which I have formerly, and now also collected and published.

His Birth and Paren-
tage.

James Usher, was born in Dublin, the Metropolis of Ireland, in the Parish of Saint Nicholas, January the 4. Anno Christi 1580. His Father Master Arnald Usher, was a student in the Law, one of the Clerks of the Chancery in that Nation, and a person of excellent parts and endowments. His Mother was Mrs. Margaret Staniburst, who in her later time was seduced by some of the Papish Priests to the Roman Religion, they taking their opportunity, whilst this her Son was upon some occasion in England; And they, by their subtilty, had engaged her in such vows, that when her Son came back he could not possibly reclaim her, which they have often boasted of in Print; yet her Sons hope was, at least upon her Death bed, to have prevailed for the reducing of her to the Truth: But it pleased God, that she dyed suddenly at Drogheda, when he was absent at Dublin, whereby, to his no small grief, those his hopes were frustrated and disappointed.

His Grandfather by his Mothers side was James Staniburst (whose Christian name he bore) who was chosen three times Speaker of the House of Commons in the Irish Parliaments, in the last whereof he made the first motion for the founding and erecting of a Colledge, and University in the City of Dublin. He was also Recorder of that City, one of the Masters of the Chancery, and a man of great wisdom, and integrity.

His Uncle was Richard Staniburst, a man Famous in France, and other Nations for his great learning, which he manifested in several Books published by him, one of them, when he was eighteen years old, between whom, and this Reverend person there passed many learned Letters.

The Col-ledg at Dublin founded.

His Uncle, by his Fathers side, was Henry Usher, who was trained up at Cambridge, and proved a prudent and learned man: He was afterwards Arch-Deacon of Dublin, at which time he was first sent over into England to Queen Elizabeth, and the Council, with a Petition for preserving the Cathedral of St. Patricks Dublin, from being dissolved, wherein he prevailed, the fruits whereof this his Nephew reaped afterwards, being made Chancellor of it, and receiving his subsistence from it for many years. The second time he was sent over by the Council of Ireland to Queen Elizabeth to procure her Patent for the founding of a Colledge, and University in Dublin, wherein he prevailed also: So that the Colledge (of which this worthy person was the first fruits) had it's being from his Grandfathers motion, and his Uncles industry.

He had a brother named Ambrose Usher, who, though he dyed young, yet was a man of excellent parts, very skilful in the Oriental Languages, who had translated the Old Testament from the beginning, to the Book of Job, out of the Hebrew into English, which is still preserved under his own hand; but upon the coming forth of the New Translation in King James his time, he desisted from making any further progress therein.

His Educa-
tion.

Our James was taught first to read by two of his Aunts, vvho vv ere blind from their Cradles, and so never saw letters, yet vv ere they admirably vv er- sed in the sacred Scriptures, being able suddenly to have given a good account of any part of the Bible. At eight years old he was sent to the Grammar School, vv here he had the happiness to meet vv ith two excellent Schoolmasters, Sir James Fullerton, afterwards Leger Ambassador in France, and Sir James Hamilton (afterwards, Lord Viscount Clandeboise) vv ho vv as Usher of the School. These two learned men vv ere sent over by King James out of Scotland upon an other design, though they vv ere disguised in this im- ployment: And indeed they came very opportunely by the good hand of Gods Providence, for this youths founding in learning, at such a time vv hen there vv as a great defect of learned Schoolmasters, which he often ac- knowledged as a special mercy of God to him therein.

At ten years old, was the first time that he could remember to have found in himself, any evidences of his saving conversion unto God, which was instrumentally wrought by a Sermon which he heard preached upon Rom. 12. 1. I beseech you, Brethren, by the mercies of God, &c. About the same time also meeting with some notes taken from famous Master Perkins his Works, (being not then printed) concerning the sanctification of the Lords day, proved, through Gods blessing, so effectual with him, that ever after he was the more strict in the observing of it. About the same time also he read over Saint Augustines Meditations, which so affected him, that he wept often in the reading of them.

His timely
Conversion

This young, yet hopeful plant, thus inuring, and accustoming himself to secret duties in his tender years, the Devil, that grand enemy of our salvation thinking to nip him in the bud, assaulted him with divers terrours and affrightments, both sleeping and waking, hoping thereby to discourage, and take him off from the same: But he (with Saint Paul) betook himself to prayer, with earnestness to be delivered from these Satanical delusions, and assaults, and at last was heard in that which he feared, by being freed from them, and strengthened against them with more than ordinary courage, and comfort; which made such an impression in him, as that he could not forget it to his old age.

Satans Malice.

Prayer Po-
werfull.

The Devil now finding, that he could not be affrighted out of his course of godliness, made use of another engine, which was to allure him with the bait of pleasure, some of his friends teaching him to play at Cards, where-with he was so much delighted, that it began to prevail over his love to his Book; yea it came in competition with his love to God, and care to serve him, which being seasonably by Gods Spirit discovered to him, he presently gave it over, and never played afterwards.

Satans Sub-
tily.

Gods mercy.

At twelve years old he was so affected with the study of Chronology and Antiquity, that, reading over Sleidans Book of the four Empires, and some other Authors, he drew forth an exact Series of the times wherein each eminent person lived; and during the time of his abode at School, which was five years, he was thoroughly instructed in Grammar, Rhetorick, and Poetry, wherein he so excelled, and with which he was so delighted, that he was fain to take himself off, lest it should have hindred him from more serious studies.

At thirteen years of age he was admitted into the Colledge of Dublin, being the first Student that was initiated into it; and as it seems, it was so ordered upon design by the Governours thereof, upon their observation of his pregnancy, and rare parts, that it might be a future honour to the Colledge to have his name recorded in the Frontispiece of their Admission Book, and so accordingly he was the first Graduate, the first Fellow, the first Proctor, &c.

His admission into the Colledge.

At the same time Sir James Hamilton, hitherto Usher of the School, was chosen Fellow of the Colledge, and thereby became his Tutor, who oft-times admired his accuteness and proficiency, whereby in a short time he equalized his Instructors. Here he first began to study the Greek and Hebrew Languages, in both which he afterwards excelled, and made himself in a little time, Master of the Arts, most of which he modelled in a method of his own, especially that of Musick.

His great Proficiency.

At this time the education, and helps which that Colledge afforded, were very eminent: For though at first there were but four Fellows, yet the Tongues and Arts were very exactly taught to all the Students who were divided into several Classes. Each Tutor read Aristotles Text in Greek to his Pupils, yea, each Fellow read three Lectures a day, at each of which there was a Disputation maintained either upon the present, or the precedent Lecture.

Lecture, and sometimes they were ordered to Dispute More Socratico.

On Saturdays in the afternoon, each Tutor read a Divinity Lecture in Latin to his Pupils, dictating it (as they did all other their Lectures) so deliberately, that they might easily write after them, to their great benefit and advantage.

His admission to the Sacrament.

His preparation thereto.

At fourteen years old he was judged fit, and admitted to the Sacrament of the Lords Supper; and his usual Custom was, the afternoon before, to retire himself in private, and to spend it in a strict self-Examination, and deep Humiliation for all his sins; wherein he had such Enlargements of Heart, that a stream of Tears flowed from his Eyes, which afterwards he oft recalled to mind, both as a provocation, and Censure of himself: When he was of elder years, there was a certain place, by a waterside whether he oft resorted, sorrowfully to survey his Sins, and with Floods of Tears to confess, and bewail them; wherein he found so much sweetness and Communion with God, that he thirsted for such comfortable opportunities, and it was his usual Custom to spend Saturdays in the afternoon in these Duties. Amongst other sins he much bewayled his too much Love to humane Learning, which made him as glad when Munday come, that he might renew his Studies, as he was when Sabbath Day came, wherein he was to apply himself to the Service of God; and it cost him many Tears, that he could not be more heavenly-minded at that Age.

His skill in Chronology

At fifteen years old, he had made such a Progress in the Study of Chronology, that he drew up in Latin, an exact Chronicle of the Bible as far as to the Books of the Kings, which did not much differ from that of his late Annals, excepting his enlargements by some exquisite Observations, and the Syncronismes of Heathen Story. About this time also he was much afflicted with a strong Temptation, which moved him to question Gods love to him, because he was so free from Afflictions, which was occasioned by some inconsiderate passages, which he met with in some Authors, and long was he under some trouble before he could get rid of it.

His study of the Fathers

Before he was Bachelor of Arts, he read Stapletons Fortrefs of the Faith, and therein finding how confidently he asserted Antiquity for the Popish Tenets, withal, branding our Church and Religion, with Novelty, in what we dissented from them, he was much troubled at it, not knowing but that his Quotations might be right; and he was convinced that the Ancientest must needs be best, as the nearer the Fountain the sweeter and clearer are the Streams; yet withal, he suspected that Stapleton might mis-report the Fathers, or wrest them to his own sense; and therefore he took up a settled Resolution, that in due time, if God prolonged his life and health, he would trust only his own Eyes, by Reading over all the Fathers, for his Satisfaction herein; which work he afterward began at Twenty Years old, and finished that vast Labour at Thirty eight, strictly tying himself to a certain Portion every day, what occasions soever intervened.

Whilst he was Batchelor of Arts, he read divers of the Works of the Fathers, and most Authors which had written the Body of Divinity both Positively and Polemically in confuting the Popish Errors, and had Read many of their Authors also, by which means he was so well acquainted with the state of those Controversies, that he was able to Dispute with any of the Popish Priests, as he often did with the Principal of them.

He is designed to the study of the Law.

Anno Christi 1598. The Earl of Essex newly coming over Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and being Chosen Chancellor of the University of Dublin, there was a solemn Act appointed for his Entertainment, and Mr. Usher being then Batchelor of Arts, answered the Philosophy Act with great Applause and Approbation.

About this time, his Fathers intention was to send him over into England to the Innes of Court, for the study of the Common Law, which was a great great Trouble to him, yet in Obedience to his Fathers Will he assented, and resolved upon it; But it pleased God that his Father shortly after Dyed, viz. August the 12. Anno Christi 1608. so that then he being at liberty to make Choice of his Studies, Devoted, and applied himself wholly to Divinity, and therupon was Chosen Fellow of the Colledge, being before incapable of taking the Oath which was required of all Fellows at their Admission, viz. that the present intent of their Studies should be for the Profession of Divinity, unless God should afterwards, otherwise dispose their minds. His study of Divinity

And here again, was another occasion of Disturbance to his mind, ministered to him. For his Father left him a good Estate in Land; but finding that he must have involved himself in many Suits of Law, before he could attain to the quiet enjoyment of it, to the interrupting of his other Studies, he gave up the benefit of it to his Brothers, and Sisters, suffering his Uncle, to take Letters of Administration for that end, resolving to cast himself upon the good Providence of God, to whose Service in the Work of the Ministry, he had wholly Devoted himself, not doubting but he would provide for him; yet that he might not be judged weak, or inconsiderate in that Act, he drew up a note under his hand, of the state of all things that concerned it, and directions what to do about it. His contempt of the World.

When he was nineteen years old, he disputed with Henry Fitz-Simonds, a Jesuit, in the Castle of Dublin, as himself acknowledgeth in his preface to his Book, called Britanno-mochia Ministrorum; The occasion of which Dispute was this; The Jesuit, by way of challenge, as it was interpreted, gave forth these words, That he being a Prisoner was like a Bear tyed to a stake, but wanted some to bait him: Whereupon this eminent man (for so he was, though very young) was thought fit, and able to encounter him, though at their first meeting he despised his youth, as Goliath did Davids. Mr. Usher proffered to Dispute with him about all Bellarmines Controversies, for which a meeting was appointed once every week, and it fell out that the first Subject proposed was De Antichristo, about which they had two or three solempne Disputations, and Mr. Usher was ready to have proceeded further; But the Jesuit was weary of it, yet gives him a tolerable Commendation, and much admired his abilities in such young years: Concerning which he saith, There came once to me a Youth of about eighteen Years of Age, one of a too-soon ripe Wit, scarce you would think that he could have gone through his course of Philosophy, or that he was got out of his Child-hood, yet was he ready to Dispute upon the most abstruse Points of Divinity. And afterwards the same Jesuit living to understand more of him, saith, that he was A-catholicorum doctissimus, the most learned of such as were not Catholics; being (as it seems) unwilling, or ashamed to call him Heretick. His Disputes with a Jesuit.

Anno Christi 1600. when he was about twenty years old, He commenced Master of Arts, and answered the Philosophy Act, and was Chosen Catechist of the Colledge; in which Office, he went through a great part of the Body of Divinity in the Chappel by way of Common place; and Ministers being scarce at that time, there were three young men of the Colledge chosen out, and appointed to Preach in Christ Church before the State: One was Mr. Richardson, afterwards Bishop of Ardagh, who was appointed to Preach an expository Lecture upon the Prophecie of Isaiah, every Friday. Another was Mr. Welch, afterwards Doctor of Divinity, who was designed to handle the Body of Divinity, on Sabbaths, in the forenoon; The third was our Learned Usher, who was to handle the Controversies, for the satisfaction of the Papists, on the Lords days, in the afternoons; which he did fully and clearly, always concluding with some emphatical Exhortation, that it tended much to the Edification and confirmation of the Protestants in their Principles, as many of them in their elder years have acknowledged. He is Master of Arts, and Catechist.

Having

Having thus Preached, for a while as a Probationer, he refused to continue it any longer, having not as yet received Ordination: He also scrupled to be as yet Ordained by reason of his defect of years, the Canons requiring twenty four, and he being yet but twenty one: But by some Grave and Learned men he was told, that the Lord had need of his Labours; and so upon their perswasions and importunity, his Age being dispensed with, according to some former Presidents, he was Ordained at the usual time, the

His Ordination.

Sabbath before Christmas day, Anno, 1601. by his Uncle Henry Usher, Archbishop of Armagh, with the assistance of some other Ministers.

His first Sermon after it

The first Text, that he preached publicly upon before the State, after his Ordination, was Rev. 3. 1. Thou hast a name that thou livest, and art Dead, which fell out to be the same day, upon which was fought the Battel of Kinsale, which being a day specially set apart, by prayer to seek unto God for his blessing and assistance in that engagement, and being his first fruits after his entrance into the Office of the Ministry, God might in a more than ordinary manner make his labours efficacious and prevailing; The rest of that Epistle to the Church of Sardis he finished afterwards.

Tentation resisted.

It was well known that if the Spaniards had gotten the better that day, the Irish Papists had designed to murder the English Protestants both in Dublin and other places, but especially the Ministers. Hence (said he) arose a Tentation in me to have deferred my Ordination till the event of the Battel had been known, that so I might the better have escaped their fury; but I repelled that suggestion, and resolved the rather upon it, that dying a Minister, and in that Quarrel, I might at least be the next door to a Martyr.

The Spaniards being (as was said before) overthrown at Kinsale, and the hopes of the Irish, as to that design, being frustrated, they began generally to subject themselves to the Statute, which was now put in Execution, in their coming to Church; and that it might tend the more to their profit, the Lord Lieutenant, and his Council, desired the Ministers at Dublin, so to divide themselves, that (in imitation of what he had already begun at Christ Church) there might be a Sermon on the the Lords days in the afternoon at every Church upon those Controversies. St. Katherines (a convenient Church) was assigned for Master Usher, who removed accordingly, and duly observed it; and his custom was, that what he had delivered in one Sermon, he drew it up into Questions and Answers, and the next Lords day, several persons of Note, voluntary offered themselves to Repeat those Answers, before the whole Congregation, which made them more clear and perspicuous to the Papist Party.

A great Reformation.

It pleased God by his, and the Labours of others of his Brethren in the Ministry, not only in Dublin, but in other parts of the Kingdome, that the Papists came so diligently to Church, that if they had any occasion to absent themselves; they used to send in their excuses to the Church-Wardens, and there were great hopes in a short time to have reduced the whole Nation to Protestantisme: But on a sudden, the execution of the Statute was suspended, and the Power of the High Commission Court (then erected, and used onely against the Papists) was taken away; whereupon the Papists presently withdrew themselves from the publick Assemblies, the Ministry was discouraged, all good mens hearts were grieved, and Popery from that time forward encreased, till like a great Deluge, it had overflowed the whole Nation.

Popery encreaseth.

His Zeal.

Upon this, the Spirit of this Holy Man (like Pauls at Athens) was exceedingly stirred in him, insomuch as preaching before the State, at Christ Church upon a special Solemnity, he did with as much Prudence, Courage, and Boldness, as became his young years, give them his Opinion of that abominable Toleration of Idolatry; making a full and clear appplication of that passage in Ezekiels Vision, Chap. 4. 6. where the Prophet, by lying on his side, was was to bear the iniquity of Judah for forty days. I have appointed thee (saith the Lord) each day for a year. This (said he) by the consent of Interpreters, signifies the time of forty years to the destruction of Jerusalem, and of that Nation for their Idolatry; and so (said he) will I reckon from this year the sin of Ireland, and at the end of the time, those whom you now imbrace, shall be your Ruine, and you shall bear this Iniquity; wherein he proved a Prophet: For this was delivered by him, Anno Christi 1601. and Anno 1641. was the Irish Rebellion, and Massacre; and what a continued expectation he had of a great judgment upon that his Native Country, I, saith Doctor Bernard, can witness from the year 1624. at which time I had the happiness, first to be known to him; and the nearer the time approached, the more confident he was of the event, though as yet nothing that tended towards it was visible to other men.

A Prediction.

The Body of Divinity, which is printed in his Name, is highly commended by Master Downam, who set it forth, and so it is by a stranger, Ludovicus Crocius, who much desired that some English man would turn it into Latine for the benefit of Forreign Churches, but it was not intended by him for the Press. It was begun by him in publick, but finished some years after in private in his Family, constantly instructing them twice a week, unto which Persons of Quality and Learning Resorted, and divers of them took Notes, whereby several Copies were dispersed abroad, some imperfect and mistaken, and many passages are in it which were not his, neither is the whole so polished as his other Pieces, which were published by himself; and indeed, he was displeased that it came forth without his knowledge, yet understanding how much good it had done, he connived at it.

His Body of Divinity.

Shortly after the aforementioned defeat given to the Spaniards at Kinsale, the Officers of our English Army, gave 1800 pounds to buy Books for the Colledge Library at Dublin (then Souldiers were Advancers of Learning) the ordering of which, was committed to Doctor Challoner, and this Lord Primate, who made a journey into England on purpose to buy Books with it. He then met with Sir Thomas Bodly, who was buying Books for his Library at Oxford, and they were very helpful each to other, in procuring the rarest Pieces. In his journey, he visited Master Christopher Goodman, who had been Professor of Divinity in Oxford, in King Edward the sixth dayes, then lying on his Death-Bed at Chester, and he would often repeat some Grave, and wise Speeches that he heard from him.

Souldiers favourers of Learning.

After this he constantly came over into England once in three years, spending one moneth at Oxford, another at Cambridge, in searching the Books, especially the Manuscripts, in each University (amongst which, those of Corpus Christi Colledge in Cambridge, he most esteemed) the third moneth he spent at London, intending chiefly Sir Robert Cottons Library, and conversing with Learned men, amongst whom, even in those his younger years he was in great esteem. In his after years he was acquainted with the Rarities in other Nations: There was scarce a choice Book in any eminent persons Library in France, Italy, Germany, or Rome it self, but he had his way to procure it, or what he desired, transcribed out of it; so that he was better acquainted with the Popes Vatican than some that daily visited it. The Puteani fratres, two learned Men in Paris, help him much with many Transcripts out of Thuthanus, and others, between whom and him, many Letters passed. Now, though the reading of the Fathers all over was a vast work, yet the pains he took out of the common road of Learning in searching of Records, and all the Manuscripts he could get throughout Christendom, together with the knotty Study of Chronology and Antiquity, was equal with, if it did not exceed the other. Many Volumes he also Read only to attain to the Knowledge of the use of Words in several Ages, as Galen, Hipocrates, &c. and most of the Records in the Tower of London: Besides, there was scarce

His great Diligence.

His Correspondents.

the meanest Book in his own Library, but he remembered it, even to Admiration, and had in his Head readily whatsoever he had Read.

His first preferment.

The first Church-preferment which he had, was given him by Archbishop Loftus, a little before his death, which was the Chancellorship of St. Patricks Dublin, unto which he took no other Benfice. In that place Master Camden found him when he was writing his Britannia, Anno Christi 1607. and in his observations concerning Dublin, faith of him, Most of these I acknowledge to owe to the diligence, and labours of James Usher, Chancellor of the Church of St. Patricks, who in Various learning, and judgement, far exceeds his years. In this preferment, though the Law required not his preaching, but onely in his course before the State, yet would he not omit it in the place from whence he received his profits, and though he endowed it with a Vicaridge, yet went he thither in person, viz. to Finglas a mile from Dublin, and preached there every Lords day, unless he were detained upon some extraordinary occasions; and the remembrance that he had been a constant Preacher, was a greater comfort to him in his oldage, than all his other labours and writings.

His constant preaching.

His prevalence in Prayer.

His experiments in Prayer were many, and very observable, God often answering his desires in kinde, and that immediately, when he was in some distresses; and Gods Providence in taking care, and providing for him in his younger years, as he often spake of it, so it wrought in him a firm resolution to depend upon God in his latter dayes, what ever extremity he might be brought into.

He is Bachelor in Divinity, and Professor.

Anno Christi 1607. when he was twenty seven years old he commenced batchelor of Divinity, and immediately after he was chosen Professor of Divinity in the University of Dublin: At first he read twice a week, and afterwards once a week without intermission throughout the year, going through a great part of Bel-larmines Controversies. In this employment he continued thirteen or fourteen years, and was a great Ornament to his place. Three Volumes of those his Lectures written with his own hand he hath left behind him, and it would be a great honour to that University where they were read, and benefit to many others, if they were published.

His strong Memory.

When he performed his Acts for his degree, Latine Sermon, Lectures, Position, and answered the Divinity Act, he wrote nothing but only the heads of the severall Subjects, putting all upon the strength of his Memory, and present expressions, as also he did his English Sermons. His readines in the Latine Tongue was inferiour to none in these latter times, which (after seventeen years dis-use, from the time that he left his Professors place) appeared when he moderated the Divinity Act, and Created Doctors to all mens admiration.

His Self-Denyal.

The Provostship of the Colledge of Dublin falling void, he was unanimously elected thereto by all the Fellows, he being then about thirty years of age, but foreseeing, that upon the settlement of Lands belonging to it, and the establishing of other matters, he should be much impeded and distracted in his studies, he refused it, and so another was sent out of England to fill it. The revenues of it were very considerable, whereby we may see how mean, and little the things of the world seemed in his eyes even in those his younger years.

Episcopal subtilty.

About this time the Irish Prelates, especially Doctor Hampton, his predecessor in the See of Armagh, had obtained King James his grant for reducing Ireland to the same Ecclesiastical Government of the Church of England; the principal occasion whereof was this, The English Prelates a little before had used a great deal of severity against the Non-conformists, their High Commission, and other Courts, and Canons, had driven many worthy and learned men into other Countries, and some of them went into Ireland; the Irish Bishops being weary of this resort, are desirous to advance their power to the same height with the English Hierachy, combined together, and obtained King James his Commission to Sir Arthur Chichester, Earle of Belfast, a famous Souldier and prudent Governour, who was at thistime Lord Deputy, and bore the Sword there Eleven years together with very much honour, and esteem in that Nation. For the effecting of this, a great Assembly of the whole Nation was convened. In the Commission the King required them to consult with Master Usher, whose learning, judgement, and esteem would much conduce to the promoting of that work: But if he approved it not, the King required that they should proceed no further, for that he would not be the author of any Innovation amongst them.

This reserve troubled the Prelates exceedingly, and therefore they resolved to carry it closely; The Kings Letters to them, they transmitted from one to another, but acquainted not Master Usher with them, intending to surprize him when the Assembly was met; they should come prepared and fortified, he would be taken on the sudden. Howbeit God, that intended him for so great a good at that time in crossing their design, that many faithful labourers in his Vineyard might not by this their power be displaced, by a special Providence gave him some light (though but very little) into the matter; and the manner was thus.

Master Usher going to visit one of them, found him, perusing the Kings Letter; but upon his coming, he laid it down in his window, closed at both ends, onely there was an open place in the middle, and as they were discoursing together, Master Usher glancing his eye upon it, espied his own name, and some other words about himself, of which he could not pick out the meaning; but yet he judged them to be of importance, as Discipline, Ireland, England, &c. Master Usher thought it not prudence for him to take notice of those hints, neither could he handsomely fish out the business from the Bishop, wherefore he went another way to work; and indeed the surest way, by seeking counsel from God, communicating the matter to Dean Hill a very godly man, whom he requested, that with some others, they would seek unto God for his assistance; for he believed that something was in brewing that he might not know of. Herein imitating the practise of wise Daniel, Chap. 2. 17, 18.

A special Providence.

A holy Practice.

This done, he studied the Rights of the Irish Church, some fruits whereof we have in that Learned Piece of his, called, The Religion professed by the ancient Irish and Britains. Yet he heard nothing till the Assembly was summoned, and himself the next day was to be present at it; then went he to the Lord Deputy to know the occasion of their meeting. The Lord Deputy would not believe at first that he could be a stranger to it; but afterwards, when Master Usher had assured him that he had no information from the Bishops about it, he was much displeased, and told him, that without him all the rest were but Cyphers, for that the King had referred the whole business to his judgement, whether the power of the Hierachy should be established there as it was in England.

The next day the Kings Commission and Letters were read in the Assembly, and Speeches were made concerning the excellency of the Kings intention to reduce that Kingdome to one uniformity with England in Ecclesiastical Government; they also told him what honour the King had put upon him, whose esteem, Learning and judgement the King so much depended upon for the promoting so great and good a work. Master Usher replied, that he believed, that in a business of so great Concernment wherein he was so far interested, the Kings intentions were, that he should have convenient time to consider of it before he delivered his opinion, which he also humbly desired.

The Bishops answered, that his judgement was sufficiently known by his practise, and that they expected no more from him but his consent, and concurrence currence with them. He replied, that the matter concerned more than himself, For (said he) if I had all mens Consciences in my keeping, I could in these disputable Cases give Laws unto them, as well as unto my self, but its one thing what I can do, and another thing what all other men must do.

His Speech
in the Assembly.

Then they asked of him, if he had any thing to say why they should not satisfy the Kings desire? He, after a short pause, wherein he lifted up his heart unto God for direction, told them, that if they would grant him no longer time, he would as well as he was able, give them his judgement, if that Honourable Assembly would grant him three Requests, 1. A free hearing without interruption. 2. Liberty for him to answer any man that should be unsatisfied. 3. That there might be a final determination of the business at that meeting. These being all granted, Master Usher undertook to prove, that such a Jurisdiction could not be introduced into that Kingdome, neither by the Laws of God, nor by the Civil, or Ecclesiastical Constitutions of that Kingdome, nor yet without the violation of the Kings Prerogative in that Nation: All which he performed to admiration. But before he descended to particulars, he shewed the difference between Conformity, as it was set up in England, and as it would be, if it were set up in Ireland.

The Kings (saith he) and Queen of England imposed those Ceremonies, that thereby they might decline the charge of Schismatics, wherewith the Church of Rome laboured to brand them, seeing it did appear hereby, that they left them only in such Doctrinal Points, wherein they left the Truth. Again, hereby they would testify how far they would willingly stoop, to win and gain them, by yeelding to meet them as far as they might in their own way: But (saith he) the experience of many years hath shewed, that this Condescension hath rather hardened them in their errors, than brought them to a liking of our Religion: This being their usual saying, If our Flesh be not good, why doe you drink of our Broth.

As for Ireland, wherein the English Canons were never yet received, and the generality of the Inhabitants were Popish Recusants, and even in Popish Kings times, there was no reception of the Popes Ecclesiasticall Constitutions, because he encroached upon their temporals, if such Laws now should be set up under so Religious a Protestant King, this would be to set the Pope on Horse-back amongst them, which needed not.

The success
of his Speech

The Lord Deputy, when he had finished his Speech, and answered what was objected against it, told him, that he was much affected with every part of his learned speech, but that he was more especially concerned in that which touched upon the Kings Prerogative part; wherein he had discovered such hidden flowers of the Crown, as he thought the King himself knew not; and therefore (he said) as he would endeavour to preserve his Majesties right therein, whilst he was his Deputy, so he would present them to the King, and take care, that it should be very hard for any that came after him to rob him of them.

By this we may easily see, that he was then so far from a Prelatical spirit, that on the contrary he was an Advocate for, and Patrone of godly and conscientious Non-Conformists.

He is Dr. of Divinity.

Anno Christi 1612. he proceeded Doctor of Divinity, being created by Arch-bishop Hampton, his Predecessor; one of his Lectures for his Degree, was upon the seventy weeks to the slaying of the Messias, mentioned Dan. 9. 24. the other out of Rev. 20. 4. concerning the meaning of the Prophecie, that the Saints should reign with Christ a thousand years, which in these times would be very seasonable; but its lost.

Doctor Hoyle (who died Professor of Divinity in Oxford, after he had many years been the like in Dublin) said, that when he went out Doctor of Divinity, he thought Tully himself could not have excelled him in Eloquence (had (had he been alive) not only in his composed speeches, but in those which occasionally fell from him upon the by.

Anno Christi 1613. He published his Book, De Ecclesiarum Christianarum Successione, & statu, magnified so much by Causaban and Sculetus, in their Greek, and Latine verses before it. It was solemnly presented by Archbishop Abbot to King James, as the eminent first-fruits of that Colledge at Dublin. Indeed its imperfect, for about three hundred years from Gregory the 11. to Leo the 10. viz. from the year 1371. to 1513. and from thence to this last Century, which he intended (after the finishing of a Book, which he was now about) to have completed: But the Lord prevented him.

Anno Christi 1615. there was a Parliament in Dublin, and Consequently a Convocation of the Clergy, at which time those learned Articles of Ireland were composed and published, and Doctor Usher being a member of that Synod, was appointed to draw them up; they were highly approved of the most Orthodox Divines. They determine according to St. Austin against the Doctrine of the Pelagians: Prove the Man of sin, spoken of 1 Thess. 2. to be the Bishop of Rome; and for the Morality of the Sabbath; of both which this most learned Doctor was very confident, and oft wished that some of our learned men of late had spared their pains when they went about to prove the Contrary. In defence of the last of these, he wrote a most excellent and learned Letter to Doctor Twiss, who had desired his judgement about it.

The Articles of Ireland.

He wanted not enemies, who sought to scandalize him to King James under the Title of a Puritan, which was very odious to the King in those dayes, seeking hereby to prevent his further promotion; but God so ordered it, that it proved an occasion of his advancement; for King James being jealous of him upon that score, by reason of the eminency of his Learning, fell into serious discourse with him, and therein received such abundance of satisfaction, both of the soundness of his judgement and piety, that notwithstanding the opposition made by some great ones, without his seeking, he made him Bishop of Meath in Ireland, which just then fell void whilst he was in England, and the King often boasted that he was a Bishop of his own making.

His enemies

Whilst he was thus Bishop Elect, he was chosen to preach before the House of Commons, February, 18. 1620. in Margarets Westminster: The Sermon by order of the House was printed, and it is a most learned one.

He is made Bishop by the King.

He preaches to the Parliament.

Upon his return into Ireland, he was Consecrated Bishop of Meath at Drogheda by Archbishop Hampton, with the assistance of two Suffragan Bishops, according to the custome; at which time there was given him an Anagram of his Name, as he was then to write himself, which was this, James Meath, I am the same; and he made it good ever afterwards. His preferment did not cause him to grow slack in his constancy of preaching, as it did too many, who having caught the Fish, laid aside the Net: But as Possidinius saith of St. Austin, he was still the same; which he bound himself the rather unto by the Motto of his Episcopal Seal, Ve mihi si non Evangelizavero, Woe is me if I preach not the Gospel, which he continued in the Seal of his Primacy also.

His constant Preaching.

He had many Papists in his Diocese, whom he endeavoured to reclaim by private Conferences, and at length they were willing to hear him preach, so it were not in a Church, which he condescended to, and preached in the Sessions-house, and his Sermon wrought so much upon some of them, that their Priests forbade them hearing him in any place ever after.

His success in his Ministry.

Anno Christi 1622, there were some Papists Censured in the Star-chamber for refusing to take the Oath of Supremacy, at which time he was called thither to inform inform them of it before the sentence passed, which occasioned that learned Speech of his upon that subject, since printed with his English works.

His answer to a Jesuit.

While he was Bishop of Meath, he answered a challenge sent him by the Jesuite Malone; and his going over into England to Print it, occasioned another learned Tractate of the Universality of the Church of Christ, and the Unity of the Catholick Faith, in a Sermon preached before King James on Eph. 4. 13. Till we all come in the unity of the Faith, &c. And Gods providence so ordered it, that whilst he was thus busied in England, Archbishop Hampton dying, he was made his successour, Primate of Ireland, Anno Christi 1624. and he was the hundredth Bishop of that See.

He is made Primate of Ireland.

Being thus promoted to the highest preferment his Profession was capable of in his Native Country, he was so far from being puffed up with Pride, that he was more humble, and frequent in preaching, and it so fell out, that for some weeks together, overtoying himself in the work of the Ministry to the overwasting of his spirits, which he did at the request of some Essex Ministers, who importuned him to preach on the week dayes, because they could not come to hear him on the Sabbaths, he fell into a Quartane Ague, which held him three quarters of a year.

His disputa-tion with a Jesuit.

After his recovery, the Lord Mordant (afterwards Earl of Peterborough) being a Papist, and desirous to draw his Lady to the same Religion, he was willing that there should be a meeting of two eminent persons of each party to dispute what might be in controversie between them. The Lady made choice of our Lord Primate, and prevailed with him, though newly recovered from the aforesaid long sickness, and scarce able to take such a journey. The Jesuite chosen by the Earl, went under the name of Beaumont, but his true name was Rookwood (brother to Ambrose Rookwood, one of the Gunpowder Traytors.) The place of meeting was at Drayton in Northamptonshire, where there was a great Library, so that no Books of the ancient Fathers were wanting upon occasion for their view. The points to be disputed on, were Concerning Transubstantiation, Invocation of Saints, worshipping of Images, and the Visibility of the Church. Three dayes they were in this Disputation, three hours in the forenoon, and two hours in the afternoon each day; and the Conclusion was this, After the third day of meeting, the Lord Primate having been hitherto opponent, now the Tables were to be turned, and the Jesuit according to his desire, was to oppose, and the Lord Primate to answer: But when the time came, and the Jesuit was expected, instead of coming, he sent his excuse to the Lord Mordant, which was, that all the Arguments which he had framed in his head, and premeditated, so that he thought he had them as perfect as his Pater Noster, were now slipped from him, and he could not possibly recover them again; and that he believed it was a just judgement of God upon him, for undertaking of himself to dispute with a man of that eminency and learning without a licence from his Superiour. The Lord Mordant seeing his tergiversation, upon some further discourse with the Lord Primate, was converted, and became a Protestant, and so continued to his death. One Challoner, a Secular Priest, afterwards writing a book against this Beaumont by way of scorn, bids him beware of coming any more to Drayton, lest he meet with another Usher, to foil him again, to the dishonour of his profession, and himself.

The Lord
Mordant
converted.

The Lord having made his labours so successful, the Countess of Peterborough had him alwayes in great respect, and upon his losses in Ireland, and other distresses here, she took him home to her own house, with whom he lived about nine or ten years, and then died there.

Anno Christi 1626, in August, he went back into Ireland, where he was entertained with all the expressions of love and joy that could be.

The discourses which daily fell from him at his Table in clearing difficulties in the Scripture, and other Subjects (especially when learned men came to visit him) tended exceedingly to the edification of the Hearers, so that it might well be said of him, as the Queen of Sheba said to Solomon, Happy are these thy servants that stand continually about thee, and hear thy wisdom. And such was his humility withall, as that he would, in practical Subjects, apply himself to the capacity of the poorest, and weakest Christian that came to him for information, and satisfaction of their doubts. Nay some times, he was more propense to Communicate himself to such, than to others that were more learned; which strangers have wondred at, as the Disciples marvelled at our Saviours talking with the poor woman of Samaria, Joh. 4. 27. and answering her questions, rather than taking notice of them. Indeed he was a Mirror of Humility: For though he was higher than any other from the shoulders upward, yet might many of his inferiours learn humility of him, as may appear in these few amongst many other examples.

His fruitful
conference.

His Humility.

1. In his publick preaching, no man more denied himself to preach Christ, inasmuch as some that affected that frothy way of preaching by strong lines (as they call them) were much ashamed after they had heard him preach in Oxford, wherein he reprov'd, and decried the Corinthian vanity in this kinde. Also in one passage of his at the Court before the King, he taught the Bishops, and Doctors that then heard him, thus; Great Schollars (said he) possibly may think that it stands not with their credit, and Reputation to stoop so low, &c. But let the Learnedest of us all try it when we will, and we shall finde, that to lay this ground work right, that is, to apply our selves to the Capacities of a common Auditory, and to make an ignorant man to understand these Mysteries in some good measure, will put us to the trial of our skill, and will trouble us a great deal more, than if we were to discuss a Controversie, or handle a subtle point of Learning in the Schools. He was indeed another Paul, who determined to know nothing but Christ, and him crucified. Neither was his speech or preaching with the enticing words of mans wisdom, but in the demonstration of the Spirit, and of power, 1 Cor. 2. 2, 4.

Examples of
it.

2. In his private Conversation he framed himself to the capacity of the meanest that conversed with him. He had an excellent gift of expressing himself both in Latine and English, and as he could soar with the Eagle in Polemick Discourses when he met with Giants, so he would stoop to the lowest Pigmies in practical Subjects, and would apply himself to the poorest and weakest Christians. He was no Dictator, nor would impose upon other mens judgments or Consciences, but was as ready to receive from others, as to impart to them, and would much incline to vulgar Christians, rather than unto others that were more learned.

3. In his demeanour and behaviour he had high thoughts of others, and as low of himself, and that in every condition of his Life, both in prosperity and adversity. Godly persons of what rank soever, had great power with him, he would put them in his Bosome, Visit them in their Sicknes, Supply their Wants, Beg their Prayers, and Countenance their Cause and Persons. In his passage for Ireland, he sometimes lay at Nesson for wind, where sundry times he Preached to a plain Country Auditory: And whereas there were in that part of the Country (where I lived about five years when I first began my ministry) divers plain Christians, which were never called but by their Christian names, yet indeed were such as had not a bare form, but the Life and Power of godliness in them, so that I was never acquainted with more Knowing Christians, for men and women of their Rank; these he grew into familiar Acquaintance with, would entertain them in his Chamber, Discourse with them, Answer their Questions, and satisfy their Doubts: And when he was made Archbishop, some of them told him, that now they must know their distance, and durst not be so familiar with with him as formerly: To whom he answered, That he was the same man still, and they should be as welcome to him as formerly, and accordingly used the same familiarity with them as he had wont to do: And when he lay at Chester, he would as soon Preach at the request of Master Ashbrook, and Mistress Kirkman (a godly Woman of the meaner ranck, whom I well knew) as at the intreaties of the Mayor and Aldermen of that City, whereby he Demonstrated, that his Delight was in the Saints, and that he was a Companion of all them that feared God; and this indeed was one Reason that he Rose so High; He Honoured God, and therefore God Honoured Him, 1 Sam. 2. 30.

Whilst I lived in Warwickshire, not much before the long Parliament begun, my self with two other Neighbour Ministers, made a journey to Oxford (where he then was) on purpose to desire his judgment in some Cases where-in we could not so well satisfy our selves; we found him at his Lodgings in Christ Church, where, before he would admit any speech with us, he caused us to put on our Hats, to sit down by him, and then to speak our Mindes; when I told him that we were come to request his judgment in some Difficulties, he presently stopped me, saying, Master Clarke, I shall freely tell you my judgment in any thing but about the Et cetera Oath, concerning which I did speak occasionally, declaring my mind about it: and I have newly received a Letter from two Doctors (whose Names I forbear to insert out of Respect to them) who take me up as if I was a School-boy, (and withal he pulled the Letter out of his pocket) adding, that in that regard he would say no more about that matter, &c. I replied, that we were sufficiently satisfied about that Oath, but the Questions we had to propound were of another Nature, wherein he gave us very full and clear Satisfaction.

His frequent Prayers.

His Custome was to Pray four times a day, in, and with his Family; in the Morning at six a clock, in the Evening at eight, and before dinner and supper in his Chappel, at each of which he was always present. On Friday in the afternoons, there was constantly an hour spent in his Chappel, in Catechizing upon the Principles of Religion, for the instructing of his Family; and on Sabbaths in the Evening, the Sermon which he had Preached in the forenoon, was Repeated in his Chappel by one of his Chaplains.

His Industry.

In the Winter Evenings, his constant manner was to spend two hours in comparing of old Manuscripts of the Bible, in Greek and Latine; in which work, five or six assisted him, and the varie lectiones of each were taken by himself with his one Hand.

A Toleartion of Popery desired.

Anno Christi 1626. in Michaelmas Term, there were some Proposals made, and offered to be assented to by the Irish Papists, upon condition of a more full Toleration of their Religion, for the raising and maintaining of five hundred Horse, and five thousand Foot; wherein the Protestants also must have borne some share: To consider hereof, a great Assembly of Papists and Protestants of the whole Nation was appointed in the Lord Deputy Faulklands time. The place of their meeting, was in the Hall of the Castle in Dublin. At which time the Bishops, by our Lord Primates invitation, met at his House, where he, and they, drew up, and unanimously Subscribed a Protestation against the Toleration of Popery; A Copy whereof, because it deserves perpetual Remembrance, is here inserted.

The Judgment of the Archbishops, and Bishops of Ireland, concerning the Toleration of Popery, which is applicable also against the Toleration of other Heresies.

"The Religion of the Papists is Superstitious and Idolatrous, their Faith and Doctrine erroneous, and Heretical, their Church in respect of both Apostatical. To give them therefore a Toleration, or to consent that they may freely exercise their Religion, and profess their Faith and Doctrine, is a grievous sin, and that in two respects; For,

The Bishops judgements against it.

"1. It is to make our selves accessary, not only to their Superstitions, Idolatries, Heresies, and in a Word, to all the abominations of Popery, but also (which is a consequent of the former) to the perdition of the seduced People, which perish in the Deluge of the Catholic Apostacy.

"2. To grant them a Toleration, in respect of any money to be given, or contribution to be made by them, is to set Religion to sale, and with it, the souls of the People, whom Christ our Saviour hath redeemed with his most precious Blood. And as it is a great sin, so also a matter of most dangerous consequence, the Consideration whereof we commend to the Wise and Judicious; Beseeching the Zealous God of Truth, to make them who are in Authority, Zealous of Gods Glory, and of the advancement of true Religion; Zealous, Resolute, and Courageous against all Popery, Superstition and Idolatry, Amen.

"This Judgment of the Bishops, Doctor George Downham, Bishop of Derry, at the next meeting of the Assembly, which was April the 23. 1627. published at Christ Church before the Lord Deputy, and Council in the midst of his Sermon, with this Preamble, viz.

"Are not many amongst us for gain, and outward Respects, willing, and ready to consent to a Toleration of false Religions, thereby making themselves guilty of a great Offence, in putting to Sale not only their own Souls, but also the Souls of others: But what is to be thought of Toleration of Religion, I will not deliver my own private Opinion, but the judgments of the Archbishops, and Bishops of this Kingdome, which I think good to publish unto you, that whatsoever shall happen, the World may know that we were far from Consenting to those Favours which the Papists expect.

After he had published it, the people gave their Votes with a general Acclamation, crying Amen. The judgements of the Bishops prevailed so much with the Protestants, that now the Proposals drove on very heavily, and after much Debate of things, the Lord Deputy finding the Discontents of both Parties encreasing, desired our Lord Primate, as the fittest Person, both in regard of his esteem in the Assembly, and being a member of the Council, and therefore concerned in promoting of the Kings business, to sum up the state of things, and to move them to an absolute grant of some competency that might comply with the Kings Necessities, without any such Conditions; with which, upon their Answer, he would cease moving any further; which (upon very little warning) he did with much Prudence, according to his double Capacity of a Privy Councillour, and a Bishop: A Copy of which Speech desired of him by the Lord Deputy, was immediately transmitted into England: But it not being prevalent with the Assembly, to induce them to supply the Kings wants, it was dissolved.

Lord Faulklands esteem
of him.

Not long after, the Lord Deputy Falkland being called back into England, when he was to take Boat at the Water side, he reserved our Lord Primate as the last Person to take his leave of, and fell upon his Knees on the Sands, and begged his Blessing, which Reverend respect shewed to him, gained a greater Reputation to himself, both in Ireland and England; and indeed from his younger years, the several Lord Deputies had always a great esteem of him.

His Incessant
pains.

It was no small labour to him to answer those many Letters, which came to him from foreign Parts, and our own Nations upon several Occasions, some for resolution of difficulties in Divinity, others about Cases of Conscience, and practical Subjects. Twelve of the most Eminent Divines in London (who at his being here, were wont to apply themselves to him as to a Father, as Doctor Sibbs, Doctor Preston, &c. between whom, and him there were most entire Affections) wrote to him for his directions about a Body of practical Divinity, which he returned them accordingly.

His care of the Ministry

He much endeavoured the augmentation of the maintenance of the Ministry in Ireland, and for that end he had obtained a Patent for Impropriations to be passed in his Name, for their use as they should fall, but it was too much neglected by themselves, whereby his Desires were frustrated.

His constant Preaching,
and Catechizing.

He preached every Lords day in the forenoon, never failing unless he was disabled, by sickness, in which he spent himself very much: In the afternoons his directions to Doctor Bernard, his assistant, were, that before publick Prayers he should Catechize the youth, and that after the first, and second Lesson, he should spend half an hour in a brief and plain opening the Principles of Religion in the publick Catechisme; and therein he directed him to go, first through the Creed at once, giving but the sum of each Article, the next time, to go through it at thrice, and afterwards to take each time one Article, as they might be more able to bear it; and to observe the like proportionably in the Ten Commandments, the Lords Prayer, and the Doctrine of the Sacraments: The good Fruit of which was apparent in the common people upon their coming to the Communion, at which time, by order, the Receivers were to send in their Names, and some account was constantly taken of their fitness for it. His order throughout his Diocese to the Ministers, was, that they should go through the Body of Divinity once a year, which he had accordingly drawn out into fifty Heads. When any publick Fast was enjoined, he kept it very strictly, Preaching always first himself, and therein continuing at least two hours, in a more than ordinary manner enlarging himself in Prayer; The like was done by those that assisted him in the Duty.

His expences in Books and Manuscripts.

His expences for Books was very great, especially whilst he enjoyed the Revenues of his Archbishoprick, a certain part whereof he laid aside yearly for that end, but especially for the purchasing of Manuscripts and other Rarities, as well from remote parts of the World, as near at hand. He was the first that procured the Samaritan Bible (which is onely the Pentateuch) to the view of these Western parts of the World. It was sent him from Syria by the way of Aleppo, Anno Christi 1625. He had four of them sent him by a Factor whom he employed to search for things of that nature; and these were thought to be all that could there be had. One of these he gave to the Library of Oxford: A second to Leyden (for which Ludovicus de Dieu returns him publick thanks in a Book that he Dedicated to him:) A third he gave to Sir Robert Cottons Library: And the fourth, after he had compared it with the other, he kept himself. The Old Testament in Syriack, another Rarity also, was sent him from those Parts not long after.

A Prediction.

It might happily seem incredible unto some, to relate how many years ago, he confidently foretold the changes which since are come to pass both in Ireland land and England, both in Church and State, and of the poverty which himself should fall into, which he oft spake of in his greatest plenty.

In his Book called Ecclesiarum Britannicarum Antiquitates, p. 556. he hath this remarkable passage, after he had largely related the manner of the utter destruction of the British Church, and State by the Saxons about the year 550. as he found it in Gildas, he gives two reasons why he was so prolix in setting it down, 1. That the Divine Justice might the rather from thence appear to us, the sins of persons of all sorts and degrees being then come to the height, which occasioned, not onely shaking of the foundations of the British Church and State; but the very destruction, and almost utterly overturning of them. 2. That even we now might be in the greater fear that our turn also is coming, and may be minded of that of the Apostle, Rom. 11. 22. Behold the goodness and severity of God: On them which fell, severity, but towards thee goodness, if thou continue in his goodness: Otherwise thou also shalt be cut off.

He often acknowledged that sometimes in his Sermons he hath resolved to forbear speaking of some things, but it proved like Jeremiahs fire shut up in his bones, that when he came to it, he could not forbear unless he would have stood mute, and proceeded no further. He was very bold and free in the exercise of his Ministry, sparing sin in none, yea even before Kings he was not ashamed to do it. He often (to his utmost) stood in the gap to oppose Errors and false Doctrines; he withstood to the face any Toleration of Popery and Superstition, by whomsoever attempted: He was so fervent in his preaching, that that of the Psalmist might be applied to him, The zeal of thy house hath eaten me up.

Jer. 2. 9.

His Zeal against Popery.

Anno Christi 1624, he spake before many witnesses, and often repeated it afterwards, that he was perswaded that the greatest stroke to the Reformed Churches was yet to come, and that the time of the utter ruine of the Roman Antichrist should be, when he thought himself most secure, according to that Text, Revel. 18. 7. When she shall say, I sit as a Queen, and shall see no sorrow, &c. His farewell Sermon, in, or very near the place where he had lived in England, was then much observed upon Jam. 1. 25. Sin when it is finished brings forth death; wherein he spake of the fulness of the sins of this Nation, which certainly would bring great destruction: Adding, that the Harvest of the earth was ripe, and the Angel was putting in his sickle, Rev. 14. 18. applying also that of the Epha in the Vision, Zach. 5. when it was filled with wickedness; and that of the Amorites, who when their iniquities were come to the full, were destroyed. He often also hinted the same in his private discourses, and many that heard them, laid these his sayings up in their hearts, and by what hath already fallen out, do measure their expectations for the future.

Predictions.

At the last time of his being in London, he much lamented, with great thoughts of heart, the wofull dis-unions, and the deadly hatred which he saw kindled in the hearts of Christians one against another, by reason of their several opinions in matters of Religion; & observing how some opposed the Ministry, both to Office and maintenance: Others contemned the Sacraments: Others raised, and spread abroad Damnable Doctrines, Heresies, and Blasphemies: Upon which considerations he was confident, that the enemies which had sown these up and down the Nation, were Priests, Friars, and Jesuits, and such like Popish Agents, sent out of their Seminaries from beyond the Seas in sundry disguises, who increasing in number here in London, and elsewhere, do expect a great harvest of their labours, and he was perswaded, that if they were not timely prevented, by a severe suppressing of them, the issue would be either an inundation of Popery, or a Massacre, or both; adding verball, how willing he was, if the Lord so pleased, to be taken away from that evil so come, which he Confidently expected, Unless there were some speedy Reformation of these things.

He lamented our Divisions.

His Humi-
lity.

Anno Christi 1634. A little before the Parliament began in Ireland, there was a Letter sent over from the late King to the Lord Deputy, and Council; for determining the question of the precedency between the Primate and Archbishop of Dublin; the question was nothing as to their persons, but in Relation to their Sees. This good man out of his great humility, was hardly drawn to speak to that Argument; but being commanded, he shewed in it a great deal of Learning, and rare observations in matters of Antiquity, so that the business was determined on his side, who afterwards by another Letter (procured without his seeking) had the precedency given him of the Lord Chancellor. These things took little with him, but were rather burdens to him who was not in the least elated, or puffed up thereby. At that Parliament, he preached the first day of it before the Lord Deputy, and the Lords and Commons, in St. Patricks Dublin. His Text was, Gen. 49. 10. The Scepter shall not depart from Judah, nor a Law giver from between his feet till Shiloh come, and to him shall the gathering of the people be.

At the beginning also of the Parliament Anno Christi 1639. he preached before the same Auditory on Deut. 33. 4, 5. And Moses commanded us a Law, even the Inheritance of the Congregation of Jacob, and he was a King in Jerusalem, when the heads of the people, and the Tribes of Israel were gathered together. Both which Texts as they were pertinent, so were they handled with rare Judgement and eminent Learning.

His Labours
successful.

The Lord was pleased to make his Labours very successful, some few instances whereof, I shall here set down; some of which I had from my Reverend Friend Master Stanly Gower, the last from my own knowledge.

His Prudence.

A Lords eldest son, who from his cradle had been trained up in Popery, but was of excellent parts, and learning, was at last prevailed with by his Father, to sojourn for a while with this learned Prelate in Drogheda; The prudent Prelate studied nothing more than how he might take him by craft (as the Apostle did the Corinthians, 2 Cor. 12. 16.) and therefore did not presently fall into discourse with him about his Religion, but recreated himself for a time in discoursing with him about some Philosophical questions, and School-points, in which studies he perceived the Gentleman was well versed, and took much delight in them: This he continued, till at last he gained so far upon his affections, that of his own accord he moved some discourse about matters of Religion; and then finding him studious, he did not presently go about to instruct him in the Truth, but sought to puzzle him with doubts about his own Religion; By this means the Gentlemans Conscience began to be awakened; nor were his scruples removed, though he had recourse to a Monastery hard by, where they were debated; so that at last he came with tears to the Learned Primate for satisfaction, and he promised to deal faithfully with him; But (saith he) those whom you trust do not so, for they will not suffer you to see with your own eyes, nor to understand the Scripture, but according to their Churches Commentaries. Then did he advise him to go amongst them, and to ask them, whether he that understood the Originals might examine their Interpretations, and to bring him word what they said. Accordingly he did so, and brought him word, that they were divided in their judgements.

Then did the learned Prelate wish him no longer to trust to their implicit Faith, and he would demonstrate to him how much they perverted the sense of the Scriptures, and abused the writings of the Ancient Fathers, whilst they sought to make the world believe that the Fathers and Councils were wholly for them, and against us: And if (saith he) you distrust your own learning and reading, and will make choice of any other, who you think can say more, I will make this good which I have said before the best of them all.

This

This was an introduction to much confidence which the Gentleman had in him; and it pleased God after much temptation which he had to the contrary (as he confessed) to direct him to betake himself to prayer; after which time, he acknowledged that he understood more of the way of truth, both when he conferred with the Primate, and when he meditated apart, than ever he could attain to before; and the issue was, that he came into the Church unlooked for of the Primate, and after Sermon, made a confession of his Faith, offering to Seal the truth of it (if they pleased to admit him) by receiving the Sacrament of the Lords Supper, which was then to be administered.

Prayer
powerful

The Papists, especially the Priests were so enraged hereat, for losing such an one of whom they conceived so great hopes, that they made much disturbance, inasmuch as the Gentleman, for safety, was sent over into England to Oxford, that he might decline their fury; and the forces of the City were raised to prevent the present danger: and the Lord Deputy hearing of it, sent a Troop of Horse, and (as it was said) thereupon dissolved one of their Monasteries. Another was this,

The Lady Falkland, about the time of the late Queens coming out of France to be married to King Charles, turned Recusant, and on a time was gotten into the company of Father Fisher, Father Sweet, and Father Sweetnam in Drury Lane, and by some means or other, Doctor Feathly, and Master Gataker were procured to meet them there; the Lord Savil, Brother to this Lady, as he also was going that way, accidentally met with Doctor Usher, and intreated him to go along with him to this meeting; The Bishop consented, and by the way requested the Lord Savil at their first entrance privately to give notice to his Sister, the Lady Falkland, that she should take no notice of him, and saith he, I will do the like to the Ministers, and as for the Jesuits, I believe, they know me not at all.

At their first entrance, they found them engaged about Image-Worship; the Jesuits denied that they gave them Divine worship; the Ministers were proving that they were no fit Mediums to worship God by. After they had ragged at it, and were wearied, and ready to give over that Question, Bishop Usher said, But Gentlemen, pray you tell me, do not you give them Divine worship? they answered, no: How then (saith he) will you be tried? they answered, By the Council of Trent. Indeed (said the Bishop) that Council doth require the giving of worship to them, but who shall expound what that bonour, and worship is, and assure us that it is not Divine? Will you be determined by Thomas Aquinas? they said, Yes. Then was the Book sent for, and he turned presently to the place where he concludes, that the same reverence is to be given to the Image of Christ, as to Christ himself, and by consequence, seeing Christ is adored with the worship of Latria, his Image also is to be adored with the same worship. Now (said the Bishop) have you any higher worship than the Latria that you give to God? Upon this one of the Jesuits whispered to the Lady Falkland to know his name that thus disputed: she answered, that he was a Country Minister. No (quoth the Jesuit) there is more in him than in both the other. Try him (said she) further.

His Disputations with three Jesuits.

That Question being laid aside, that of Free-will was taken up; the Bishop sat silent as before, whilst the state of the Question was Convulsed between the Ministers and Jesuits, and much ado there was about it, so that they had like to have broken off, without coming to any issue; the Bishop seeing that, said, Gentlemen, if you will give me leave, I will bring you in the point in difference presently by this similitude. If you make Free-will to be the Horse, I will make Grace to be his Rider. Now true it is, my Horse can go of himself, but he knows not whether I intend to go: Besides, he is dull, and tired, and I spur him on; my spur doth not properly go, but it makes my Horse to go. You may easily

Another

easily apply it: But the Jesuits had enough, and listd not to encounter him any farther, pretending a necessity to be gone, and so left the place; So mightily it pleased God by him to convince them.

Another was this: A Protestant Knight in Ireland, had prevailed so far with his Lady, who was then a Papist, as to admit of a Parley about their Religion, and she made choice of one for her, that was called amongst them, the Rock of Learning. The Knight made choice of this our Primate to encounter him, and upon the day appointed many persons of note were there assembled; the learned, and prudent Primate before the Disputation began, spake thus to the Lady, Madam (said he) let us know the end of our meeting. Is it that this Gentleman, and I should try our Strength before you? If so, then it is like that we can speak Languages, and quote Authors which you do not understand; how then will you know who gets the better? Therefore this is not our end: If this Gentleman desires to shew his learning and reading that way, if he please to come to the Colledge of Dublin, where there are men that will understand us both, and can judge between us, I shall willingly deal with him at those weapons: but now our business is something else: It is supposed that we two, whom your Husband and you have chosen, can speak more for the defence of our Religion than you that chose us, and your desire is to know, by hearing our discourse in your own Language, how to rectifie your judgements. Now therefore I will give you a rule, which if you please to remember, you shall be able to discern which of us two have the truth on our side, and it is this:

The Points we will discourse of shall be such, without some knowledge whereof no man in an ordinary way attain to the end of his Faith, the salvation of his soul. In these you may easily lose your selves, not onely by Heresie, which is a flat denying of them, but by Ignorance also, by a bare not knowing of them. The word of truth contained in the Scriptures, is the rule both of Faith and Life, common to small and great, concerning these things: Now whilst we keep to the true sense of the Scriptures in these points, you may understand us both; but when we shall fly to suble distinctions to evade plain Texts, or flye from the Scriptures to take sanctuary in Authors which you know not, assure your selves that we are at a loss, and seek Victory rather than truth. Keep this Rule Madam, in your minde, for this Gentleman dares not deny it to be a true one, and then you will be the better for our meeting. And now Sir (said he to the Jesuit, her Champion) I am ready to engage with you in any such points.

The Dispute was began, and after a short encounter, the Jesuit was driven to those shifts; whereupon the Primate said, Madam, do you understand my Argument that I propounded to this Gentleman? She answered, Yes, and do you (said he) understand this Gentlemans answer? She answered, No indeed, It is too high for me: But (said the Primate) I do, and can answer him in his own way, but then you would not understand me neither: Therefore Sir (said he to the Jesuit) I pray you help the Lady to understand your answer as she doth my Argument, then I will further reply. But it pleased God within a while, so to disable the Jesuit from proceeding, that he left the place with

A special providence. shame; and the Lady by this, and some further Endeavours, became not only a good Protestant, but a very gracious woman.

The last Instance I shall give of the successfulness of his Labours, is this, About twelve or thirteen years ago, we had an Ordination of Ministers in our seventh Classis; at which time (according to our custome) we called in the young Men that were to be Ordained one after another, and examining them about the Work of Gods Grace in their hearts, three of them acknowledged that they were Converted by Gods blessing upon the Labours of this our Lord Primate, whilst he preached at Oxford, where they then were Students about the beginning of the Parliament. Anno

The success
of his Ministry.

Anno Christi 1640. He came out of Ireland into England, being invited thereto by some eminent Persons, wherein the special Providence of God did Manifest it self for his Preservation, it being the year before the Rebellion brake out in Ireland; as if (according to the Angels speech to Lot) nothing could be done there till he was come hither, and escaped to this his Zoar.

A special providence.

His Library (which was very great) in the first year of the Rebellion, viz. 1641. was in Drogheda, which place was besieged four moneths by the Irish Rebels, and they made no question of taking it, and some of their Priests and Friars talked much what a Prize they should gain by that Library; but the Barbarous multitude spake of burning it: But it pleased God to hear the Fastings, and Prayers of his People within, and in a wonderful manner to deliver them, and so all his Books and Manuscripts were sent him that Summer to Chester, and from thence, were brought very safe to London.

The sufferings he now lay under were many and great. All his personal Estate was lost, and that which belonged to his Primacy in Ireland was destroyed, only for the present he was Preacher in Covent Garden.

His sufferings.

Anno Christi 1641. The great business of the Earle of Strafford came in agitation, upon which a Scandal was raised of him, by a rash, if not a malicious Pen in his Vocal Forrest, as if he had made use of a pretended distinction of a personal and Political Conscience, to satisfy our Gracious King that he might Consent to the beheading of the said Earle, telling him, that though the first resisted, yet he might do it by the second; but to clear him of this, a person of quality affirmed under his hand, that some years agoe a rumour being spread of the death of this Reverend Prelate (whose loss was much lamented at Oxford) when this Concerning the Earle was then by one objected against him, the King answered that person in very great passion, and with an oath Protested his innocency therein. Besides, he left under his own hand a Relation of that whole business, a true Copy whereof followeth.

A Scandal cleared.

"That Sunday Morning wherein the King Consulted with the four Bishops; viz. of London, Durham, Lincoln, and Carlisle) the Archbishop of Armagh was not present, being then preaching, as he then accustomed to do every Sabbath in the Church of Covent Garden, where a Message coming to him from his Majesty, he descended from the Pulpit, and told the Messenger, that he was then, as he saw, employed in Gods business, which as soon as he had done, he would attend upon the King to understand his pleasure: But the King spending the whole afternoon in the serious debate of the Lord Straffords Case with the Lords of his Council, and the Judges of the Land, he could not before evening be admitted to the Kings presence.

"There the Question was again agitated, Whether the King in justice might pass the Bill of Attainder against the Earle of Strafford. For, that he might shew mercy to him was no Question at all, no man doubting, but that the King without any scruple of Conscience might have granted him a pardon, if other reasons of State (in which the Bishops were made neither Judges nor Advisers) did not hinder him. The whole result therefore of the Bishops determination, was to this effect; That herein, the matter of Fact, and the matter of Law were to be distinguished; that of the matter of Fact, he himself might make a Judgement, having been present at all the proceedings against the said Lord; where, if upon hearing all the allegations, on either side, he did not conceive him guilty of the Crimes wherewith he was charged, he could not in justice condemn him. But for the matter in Law, what was Treason, and what was not, he was to rest in the opinion of the Judges, whose Office it was to declare the Law, and who were sworn therein to carry themselves indifferently betwixt him and his Subjects, &c.

Upon

Offers made to him from abroad.

Upon his losses in Ireland, and the straits he was brought into here, two Offers were made unto him from Foreign Nations; the One from Cardinal Richlieu, onely in Relation to his eminent learning, with a promise of large maintenance, and liberty to live where he pleased in France amongst the Protestants. The other from the States of Holland, who proffered him the place of being Honorarius Professor at Leiden, which had an ample stipend belonging to it; but he refused both.

And now by reason of the disturbance of the times, he was perpetually removing, having with St. Paul, no certain dwelling place, and some of those evidences mentioned by that great Doctor of the Gentiles to prove himself to be the Minister of Christ, were applicable to him, 2 Cor. 6. 3. &c. In much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses, in tumults, or tossings to and fro; in labours, in watchings, and fastings. By honour and dishonour: by evil report, and good report: as deceivers, and yet true: as unknown, and yet well known: as dying, and behold we live: as chastened and not killed: as sorrowful, and yet always rejoicing: as poor, yet making many rich: as having nothing, and yet possessing all things, &c.

He goes to Oxford.

Anno Christi 1642. He obtained leave of both Houses of Parliament, to go to Oxford for his study in that Library. Anno Christi 1644, the late King coming thither, he preached before him on the fifth of November. His Text was Nehem. 4. 11. And our Adversaries said, they shall not know, neither see, till we come in the midst amongst them, and slay them, and cause their work to cease. In his Sermon he advised his Hearers to put no repose in the Papists, who (saith he) upon the first opportunity will serve us here, as they have done the Poor Protestants in Ireland, which much offended some that were there present.

And into Wales.

He is abused by Souldiers.

In March following he went from thence into Wales to Cardiff in Glamorganshire, where for a time, he abode with his Daughter: But September, 16. Anno Christi 1645, he removed from thence to St. Donnets, (the Lady Stradlings) and by the way meeting with some Souldiers, they used him Barbarously, plucked him off his horse, and brake open two of his Trunks full of Books, taking them all away: amongst these he lost two Manuscripts of the History of the Waldenses, most of his Books he recovered again; but these Manuscripts, though the meanliest clad, he could never hear of, which gave suspicion that some Priest or Jesuit had lighted upon them. The loss of them grieved him much, they being of use to him for the finishing of that Book, De Ecclesiarum Christianarum successione, & statu.

His Sick-
ness.

Not long after he fell into a painful sickness, wherein he bled four dayes together, so that he swooned, and all hope of life was past, and a rumour was spread abroad that he was dead, which occasioned grief to many; and it was so far believed at Court, that a Letter came over for a successor in his Primacy in Ireland: But it pleased God that he recovered, and June 11, Anno Christi 1646, he came to London, where the Countess of Peterborough gladly received him.

He is chosen to Lincolns
Inn.

After a while, he was chosen to be preacher to the Honourable Society of Lincolns Inn, where he continued divers years with great honour, and respect from them, till at the last, losing his sight, so that he could not read his Text, and his strength decaying, he was advised by his Friends to forbear; and to reserve himself, and the remainder of his strength for the writing of Books, which were yet expected from him. No spectacles could help his sight, onely when the Sun shone he could see at a window, which he hourly followed from Room to Room in the house of his abode: In Winter the casement was often set open for him to write at. This Summer he Conceived would be the last, wherein he should make use of his eyes; the Winter following he intended to have an Amanuensis to write for him, and a Competent Salary was intended for him whom he should choose to that Work: But the Lord was pleased to prevent it by taking him to the sight of himself.

After

After he had left Lincolns-Inne, he was prevailed with to preach in several places, as in Graies Inne, Nov. 5. Anno 1654, which he then thought might have been his Last Sermon, and it was taken as an Honour by that Honourable Society, whereof he had been admitted a Member at a Reading above thirty years before: He preached also at the Temple at Master Seldens Funeral, and at two other places in the City, both which the Lord was pleased to make very effectual in the Conversion of divers that were his Hearers: And indeed seldome did the Sword drawn by him, return empty. The last Sermon which he preached was about Michaelmas, Anno 1655: at Hammer-smith.

His last Sermon. 1655.

He Complained that he was much troubled, finding himself unable to continue his Ministry; his thoughts were on it in the day, and his dreams in the night; and though he had been a preacher about fifty and five years, and so, like the Levites might well be excused from this service of the Sanctuary, and have employed himself (as his manner was) in directing of others, yet he resolved, if God Continued his life the Summer following, to return to it again in some small Church or Chappel.

He sought not great things for himself: In the time of his distress by reason of his Losses in Ireland, the Parliament for some years was bountiful to him; but the two last years of their sitting, it fell out to be suspended. But after they were dissolved, the care of him was renewed by the Lord Protector, by whose Order a Constant Competent allowance was given him, which was Continued till his death, besides very Considerable summes extraordinary.

All that knew him, found him very Communicative, not onely of his studies for the advantage of their mindes, but of part of his stipend, for the relief of their Bodies; and indeed in works of charity he more needed a bridle, than a spur.

His Charity

He was not so severe in his judgement about Episcopacy, as to disown other Reformed Churches, but declared that he loved and honoured them, as true Members of the Church-Universal, and was ready for the Ministers of Holland, France, &c. to testifie his Communion with them.

He owns other Reformed Churches.

He was a man of a most Exemplary Moderation, Meekness, Humility, and Ingenuity. Anno 1641, he drew up an Expedient to Accommodate some of our differences in Ecclesiastical Affairs, which some Moderate men of both parties were ready to subscribe. But in matters of Doctrine for the substantial, it was often his Charge, that Ministers should not preach any thing, as to please men, but God, who hath put them in trust, 1 Thess. 2. 4. For such as seek to please men, are not the servants of Christ, Gal. 1. 10. And in defence of those truths, no man was more resolute and constant than he, not giving place by way of subjection, no, not for an hour, Gal. 2. 5. but in Circumstantial, he thought it to be our duty with St. Paul, to please all men, and not ourselves, in all such things, 1 Cor. 10. 31. to edification and concord. He was in these things alwayes the same, holding fast the form of sound words in Doctrine and practice to the last.

A Peacemaker.

His Zeal.

The night before he left London, Oh! the humble expressions he used of his own unworthiness, demeaning himself as if he had been the least of Saints, which he uttered with many tears: He wished those about him to prepare for afflictions and trials, which he was perswaded, were not far from them. Having abode at London one and fifty dayes, for so it was punctually noted by himself in a Book, it being his Custome, with David so to number his dayes, both for the place where, and the manner how he spent them, he returned to Rygate, February, 13. 1655, to the Countess of Peterboroughs.

His Humility.

His last
Sickness

March the 20 following, was the first day of his sickness, upon which day (as every day) he had been well busied. Most part of it, as long as he had light, he had spent at his study, proceeding in his Chronologia sacra, clearing all the doubts in his Annals of the Bible, in which he had gone as far as to the Book of Judges, where the last words he wrote were these, Hic praterea notandum, but returned not to make any further progress. From his study he went to visit a sick Gentlewoman in that Family, and prescribed to her most excellent preparatives for death, with other most holy advice in practical matters, in which he spent three quarters of an hour, but in such an heavenly manner, as if, like Moses upon Mount Nebo, his eyes had been strengthened to take a prospect of the heavenly Canaan.

That night about eight a Clock, he first Complained of his hip, judging it to be a spice of the Sciatica, which he had been troubled with about five and thirty years before, Contracted by sitting up late in the Colledge Library at Dublin; but by the application of an Ointment, he was presently eased of that pain, so that he took some rest that night. In the morning he complained of a great pain in his side, whereupon a Physitian was sent for, who used such means as he judged fit for him; but the pain Continuing, and his spirits decaying, he wholly addicted himself to prayer, only upon the abating of the torment, he advised those about him, in health to prepare for sickness, and death, that then they might have nothing else to do but to dye; and after a short settlement of the things of this world, he took great content in his approaching death.

His Death.

A Minister there present assisted him with his prayers, but afterwards he desired to be left to his own private prayers. The last words he was heard to utter (which was about one a Clock in the afternoon, and a little before his death) were these; praying for the forgiveness of his sins, he added, But Lord in special forgive my sins of Omission: Herein he had his wish, which he often used, that he might dye as holy Master Perkins did, which expired with crying for mercy and forgiveness.

But did he pray for pardon of his sins of Omission? and yet he was a person that was never known to omit an hour, but was alwayes employed in his Masters business, either in preaching, reading, writing, or hearing others (as of late) to read to him; either resolving doubts, or exhorting, instructing, and Counselling such as came to visit him; yet did he die with this humble expression, Lord forgive my sins of Omission. A speech that may give us all matter of solemn meditation, and imitation.

March the 21. Anno Christi 1655. this glorious Sun set, and from earth was translated to Heaven, having been Primate of Ireland just one and thirty years, and a Preacher five and Fifty years, and having lived about seventy five years. What he had to leave was only his Library, and divers imperfect Copies of his intended Works, which death prevented his finishing of.

His Funeral.

The Lord Protector (as he was then called) gave him an honourable burial at the publick charge, in the Chappel of Henry the seventh at Westminster, and extended to his, what was before intended for himself in the grant of some of the Lands belonging to the Primacy of Armagh for the terme of one and twenty years.

His Learning admired.

He was highly admired, and much honoured by all the famous Lights of his time through the Christian world. Spanhemius, Divinity-Professor at Geneva, Anno Christi 1639, in his Epistle Dedicatory to him, before his third Part Dubiorum Evangelicorum, spends above two leaves in extolling him: Some of his expressions are, Your very great parts, Most excellent Usher, are known, not onely within your own Country, but in ours, and wheresoever else there is honour given to Piety, or price set upon learning, &c. He speaks much of his Charity to strangers, his Humility, Piety, Works, his Library, of which he

he made such use for the publick good, that it was not so much his own as the Library of all learned men: In a word (saith he) the name of Usher with us is a name of Piety and Vertue, it is of great Renowne at our Geneva, &c.

Gerard Vossius frequently admires him as a man of vast Learning, worthy of an everlasting Monument. The high merits (saith he) of this most excellent, and throughout most learned man, both of the Church, and of the whole Commonwealth of Learning, deserve an everlasting grateful memory: A man so excelling in the knowledge both of Humane and Divine things, that I cannot speak any thing so high of him, but his worth doth surpass it.

Bochartus and Simplicius, call him frequently, Magnum Usherium; Usher the Great.

Morus in his Oration at Geneva dedicated to him, styles him, The most Excellent servant of God; The most Reverend man of God; the Athanasius of our Age. Thy breast (saith he) is a breathing Library: Thou art to Britain as Austin was to Hippo: Farewel Britains great Honour.

Ludovicus de Dieu in his Animadversions on the AAs, dedicated to him, entitles him, To the Excellent Prelate, worthy of an Eternal memory, &c.

Paulus Testardus Blesensis styles him, Seculi, & Ecclesia decus eximium; the greatest honour of the Church and Age.

Arnoldus Bootius, saith of him, That he did excel with a most singular Judgement in the Oriental Languages, and in all other abstruse, and deep Learning: Venerable to all Europe, whose Authority prevails much with all men, &c.

Master Selden saith of him, The most Reverend Prelate James Usher, a man of great Piety, singular Judgement, learned to a Miracle, and born to promote the more severe studies, &c.

Doctor Prideaux calls him, The most rich Magazine of solid Learning, and of all Antiquity.

Doctor Davenant speaks thus of him, A man of singular Piety, abounding with all manner of Learning.

Sir Roger Twisden acknowledging the assistance he had from him in his History, saith thus, This we owe to the most worthy Archbishop of Armagh, in whom, with incredible Learning, and rare knowledge of Antiquity, his most courteous Conversation, and wonderful sweetness, in instructing the unskillful, mixed with a certain serious Episcopal gravity, were seen to strive one with the other, &c.

There was an eminent Character given of him by the whole University of Oxford, in the year 1644, by solemn Order in the Convocation, which was given in charge to sixteen eminent persons, of whom seven were Doctors chosen with the Vice-Chancellor and Proctors, to see his Effigies cut, and an Elogium worthy of him, to be prefixed to his Annotations on Ignatius his Epistles (there then in the Press) and at the charges of the University, and in the publick name of it. Indeed it was omitted to that Book, but was afterwards affixed to his Book De Symbolis; the Elogium is this, James Usher Archbishop of Armagh, Primate of all Ireland, the most skilful of Primitive Antiquity, the unanswerable Defender of the Orthodox Religion, the Maul of Errors, in preaching frequent, eloquent, very powerful, a rare example of an unblameable life.

His Character.

Yea for his learning, his very Adversaries being Judges, those of the Church of Rome have acknowledged. A certain Jesuit in a Book called Hibernia Vindicta, writing against Dempster, a Scotchman, who had undervalued the Irish for learning, after he had reckoned up many Learned men of his own, and other Orders of that Nation, at length he addes this of our Primate, And if I should put in men of a different Religion, I might truly say, Scotland ne- never saw another Usher, whose sublime wit, and most curious behaviour, I wish that unlucky education amongst Sectaries had not been his step-mother. Divers others of his Popish Adversaries might be mentioned, but I forbear, and shall adde onely the Testimony of Doctor William Chappel, sometime Fellow of Chirsts College, in Cambridge, and afterwards Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, who was very judicious, and a great learned man: He gave three reasons why he thought our Primate to be the greatest Schollar in the Christian world.

His Learning acknowledged by Papists.

1. Because of his rare Natural parts, having a quick Invention, a prompt Wit, a strong Memory, a clear Understanding, piercing Judgement, and a ready Utterance. Seldome (said he) do all these meet in an eminent degree in the same person; but in him they so Concurred, that it is hard to say in which of them he most excelled.

2. Because few men had made so rich an improvement of these parts; nor indeed had such means, by reason of the choice Libraries which he had the use of, viz. his own, Doctor Challoners, the University Library at Dublin, which he had frequent access unto, besides the University Libraries, and Sir Robert Cottons, in England. He had also taken indefatigable pains in studying, and that for many years together, which few other mens bodies and brains could bear.

3. Because in these, and in the University beyond the Seas, he was so esteemed; and whosoever conversed with him, found him a skilful Linguist, a subtile Disputant, a fluent Orator, a profound Divine, a great Antiquary, an exact Chronologer; and in brief, a living, and walking Library: Inomuch that the greatest Professors admired the Concatenation of so much learning in one person.

The Life and Death of Master Richard Capel, who dyed Anno Christi 1656.

After Richard Capel was born in the City of Gloucester, Anno Christi 1586, of good Parentage, descended from an ancient Family of the Gentry of his own name, in Herefordshire, and of alliance to the Lord Capel, (but he had learned with brave Philpot, to tread that under his feet.) His Father was a stout man, and an Alderman of that City; A fast friend, first to Master Thomas Prior, and afterwards to Master John Workman, (having had a principall hand in drawing of him thither) both of them men of great sufficiency for the preaching of the Gospel, and instruments that the Lord made much use of, for the advancement of the true saving knowledge of himself, and for the setting up of the seal, and substantial power of godliness in that City, during the time that they exercised their Ministry there. His elder Brother yet lives, and is an Alderman in that place.

His birth & parentage.

After he had been trained up at School, and well fitted for it, he was sent to the University of Oxford, where his diligence, and proficiency was such, that he was chosen Fellow of Magdalen Colledge, and had the breeding up of some there, who afterwards proved excellent, and eminent Scholars: as Doctor Frewen, (who was alwayes a thankfull man to him for his education) and famous Master Pemble, who ended his dayes at his house, &c. His attendance at Court upon the chiefeest favourite (in the dayes of that learned King James) gave him opportunity of advancement, if his thoughts had been bent that way: But he sought not great things for himself, yet continued at Court till the death of Sir Thomas Overbury, that learned Knight, and his very good friend, and then he bad adieu to that course of life.

His Education.

His Preferment at Oxford.

His attendance at Court.

As for his inward storms they were very many, and exceeding bitter, (which also were accompanied with many bodily infirmities, which attended him in his younger years) but it was well for him that he bore the yoke in his youth: and there was none that knew so much of his temptations and desertions, as that eminent, and learned Divine, Doctor Harris, by reason of that intimate acquaintance he had with him in those dayes (being his kinsman) which also was occasioned the more, by the often recourse he had then into those parts, for the fetching of some spirituall refreshing from that man of God, Master John Dod, who was both able, and willing, to speak a word in season to a broken and contrite heart.

His Temptations.

His excellent parts.

For the eminency of his parts, there were very few that could match him. The most, even of our most high-flown Eagles, have commonly some peculiar gift wherein they most excell, and by it do very good service to Christ, and his Church: But this man had Grasped all good Learning, and made every thing his own so evenly to see to, that he was very expert in the same, and would (with Cato the elder) be up in the height, in all that ever he was to act in.

Melancthon used to say, that Pomeranus was the Gramarian: That himself was the Logician: That Justus Jonas was the Orator: But that Luther was all in all: here was one that was not inferior to Luther. If he pleased to turn to the School, or to Case-Divinity: to Augustine, or Chrysostome: to Galen, or Hippocrates: To Aristotle, or Tully: To History, or Philosophy: To Arts, or Tongues, who could tell but himself, which of them he was best versed in? He was a very living Library, a full store-house of all kind of good Literature, no less than a little University, the mirror of those parts, and above the envy of most. The least draught of his Pencil, would have told any Protopogenes, he had been the Apelles. He excelled in all that ever he would set his hand to, unless it were in his utterance in the publick Congregation, and therein indeed he had a great defectiveness.

His knowledge of the Times.

God gave him great understanding of the times to know what Israel ought to do. He stood upon the Watch-tower, and saw what was hid from most mens eyes, and being quick of scent, in the fear of the Lord, he gave timely notice to some that stood in place: which had it been heeded, we had never been so fearfully pestered with those Hydraes heads that are now starting up afresh daily, to the great disturbance of our people.

A Universal Scholar.

Simler said of Melancthon at his going from the University of Tubing, that none of the learned men there, how many soever they were, had so much learning, as to know the great learning that was in that man. Too too many amongst us were even sick of the same disease, that knew not the depth that was in this mans Brest. There were many men in this one man, even all Scholarship Epitomized in this profound Clerk: And yet for all this, he had that great blessing, which he himself observed as a singular favour vouchsafed to Doctor John Reynolds, that great Oracle of Oxford, that he never set on foot any manner of new opinion.

His Modesty.

The like is observed of Learned Doctor Whitaker, filed the Oracle of Cambridge, and the miracle of the world. A mercy that most men of superlative parts use not to be too rich in. There is scarce any strong brain, without some strong fancy. If the great wits of our times had kept themselves close to the steps of these rare Divines, we had never seen the sorrows that we now sigh and groan under, and would be glad to be rid of if we knew how.

His excellent Preaching.

For the excellency of his preaching he excelled most men. He was an Interpreter one of a thousand. His understanding was strangely opened, for the understanding and opening the Scriptures. He would bolt out that out of the holy Book of God, that would not come into any other mans Consideration; yet it should be genuine, and evidently appearing to be the drift, and meaning of the Holy Ghost.

His Communicativeness.

An intelligent man could never sit at his feet, or be in his Company, but he should meet with that there, that would never fall from any other mans mouth, nor ever drop from any other mans Pen. His words were as Goads, and as Nails fastened by the Master of the Assemblies. They were edged with so much reason, re-enforced from the lively Oracles, that they could not fall to the ground in vain. It's no marvell therefore that the Cream of the whole Country where he lived (as they could have opportunity) would hang upon his Ministry.

Yet he used to be very plain in all his expressions. He would not deliver what he had from God in an unknown tongue, nor yet in words, and phrases which were too spruce and trim. He had learned his lesson well of that great Apostle, and Doctor of the Gentiles, who came not with enticing words; nor with any other, but such as the very Catechumens, the youngest beginners, might understand. He kept close to the footsteps of our choicest Worthies: as famous Master Dod (who used to say, that so much Latine was so much flesh in a Sermon) Master Cleaver, Master Hildersam, and such other holy men of God, led by the self-same Spirit. He would deliver the whole, and wholesome truths of God, in such an holy, and wholesome way, that it bred very good blood in the hearts of his hearers. He would stoop so low as to speak to the poor Country people in their own proper dialect, so as they could not but even see, and feel, and find out God, and be occasioned to speak of him all the week after. If he meet with a deep Mystery, he would make it plain to the shallowest Capacity. Whatever Subject he fell upon, he would handle it so Divine-like, that the hearts of his Auditors would be wrapt up into Heaven, whilst they heard him winding, and turning a point of Divinity, like a workman that needed not to be ashamed.

His plain
Preaching.

Whereas, now adayes, whilst some of our great Divines, seem to be too much taken up with quaint, and Historicall flourishes, there is a sensible decay of the power of God amongst us. An Exotick, or strange tongue in the publick Congregation (whatever men think of it) is set out as a sign of Gods displeasure, 1 Cor. 14. 21, 22. It feeds such humors as should rather be purged out. It had no good effect in the Church of Corinth. Mens wits will wax wanton, when they be not over-awed by the plain power of Gods Word. When Preachers keep not close to the very words of our Lord Jesus Christ, 1 Tim. 6. 3. and to the Doctrine that is according to godliness: But love to be tampering with another Doctrine, though not with another in the main; but even in the manner of delivery only, (as when it favours too much of the pomp of humane Eloquence (saith Calvin) when it differs from the stile of the Holy Ghost, (saith Danaus) the people be in danger of turning aside to vain jangling, to perverse disputings, desiring to be teachers, and such like matters. The Gold upon the Pill may please the eye; but it profits not the patient. The Paint upon the Glas may feed the fancy; but the room is the darker for it. The Sword of Gods Spirit can never wound so deep, as when it's plucked out of these gaudy Scabbards. Nakedness deforms too too many in these dayes; but it is the best garnishing, and Ornament, the truth can have. A sober dress best becomes a grave Matron. There be words as well as things which the Holy Ghost teacheth, 1 Cor. 2. 13. The Arrows fetched out of Gods own Quiver will pierce the deepest, and make the people fall the soonest under Christ. The weakness of God is stronger than men. Pauls weapons were mighty. The sincere milk of Gods Word will make Christs Babes to grow best.

Note.

This curious age is too too much given to the affectation of words, and phrases, and cadencies: and holy Doctor Jerome was wont to say, That great affectation, and good affections seldome go together. The swelling words of vanity may tickle the ear, tip the tongue, and please in matters of discourse: But when it comes to push of Pike, they afford but little comfort. Master Capel had another manner of wisdom than that of words. He was an able Minister of the New Testament, not of the letter, but of the Spirit, that hath given, doth give, and will give life, 2 Cor. 3. 6. Having this hope then, he used great plainness of speech; and by the manifestation of the truth, he commended himself to every mans conscience in the sight of God, and thereby hath so well seasoned the Country where he lived, that the fruit of it (without doubt) will remain, and be seen many years after.

His

prayers.

His Prayers were lively, and fervent. He was a man that had a very large measure of that Spirit of grace, which is a Spirit of Supplication. He was to well fitted with abilities to open his mind to God, as if (with Blessed Bradford) he had been almost ever upon his knees. He could tell his own Errand, or any other mans, at the Throne of grace, with as good freedom, and to as good purpose, as any man living. He would not be rash with his mouth when he came before God, nor set out what he had to say there, with painted Eloquence, or Court-like Complement: but his mouth used to be filled with such savoury Arguments, as very well became an humble Suppliant. He was far from those battologies, and miserable extravagancies, that too many prayers are stuffed with. He would pour out his soul to God at all manner of times, upon all manner of occasions, with all manner of Prayer, and Supplication, and with that admirable variety of all sorts of quickening and feeling meditations, that it would even ravish the Hearts of those who had the happiness to be partakers with him therein.

Set forms of Prayer lawful.

Yet for all this, he was clear in his opinion for the lawfulness of the use of set Forms of Prayer, according to the tenet of all our best, and most judicious Divines, and according to the practice of all Churches, even the best reformed; saith Master Rogers, now, and in all former ages. So saith Master Hilderham: yea, and Master Smith himself, saith upon the Lords Prayer (though as then he was warping, and afterwards wandred far in the ways of Separation) that it was the practice of the ancient Church, and of all the Reformed Churches in Christendome: of the Churches immediately after the Apostles; nay (saith he) of the Church in the time of the Apostles, as may probably be gathered out of 1 Cor 14. 26. This hath also been the practice of the best lights that ever were set up in the Churches of Christ. It is very well known that the flower of our own Divines went on in this way, when they might have done otherwise if they had pleased, in their Prayers before their Sermons. Nay, Master Dod himself would seldome end his devotions in his own Family but with the use of the Lords Prayer. Nay, yet more, Master Carrwright (Hist. Christ. p. 3. p. 535.) thinks it very probable that Christ his own self made use of a set Form at meales.

It is not good to cast stones of offence in the way of our weak Brethren, who being of meaner parts, want ability, memorie, and audacity to conceive Prayer, especially before others, that they be not taken off from, nor disheartened in this so comfortable, and necessary a service of God: nor may we lay a trap, or snare for our own feet. Who knoweth what times may pass over him? If God should plunge us into the Ditch, and leave us labouring in the Noose, the lostiest of us all may be fain to take relief from, and to make use of these poor contemptible props, and crutches (as some deem, and call them) When the soul is so troubled that it cannot speak; but Chatter only like a Crane, and Swallow, Psal. 77. 4. When it is so full of grief, that it can do no more than sigh, and groan, and make a confused noise, as Psal. 55. 2. it will then be glad to catch at any thing to give it self vent by. Doctor Harris tells us of a second Bradford, that in time of his distress, was fain to adopt Master Bradford's words, and to spread them before God as his own, because he had said more for him (as he thought) than he could say for himself. I knew (saith mine Author) a rare, and eminent Divine indeed, that would be as often upon his knees as any man that ever I conversed with, that would sometimes be in such damps, that he had no more to set before God to give his heart ease by, than the words of David in the one and fiftieth Psal. Well might then this knowing Divine of ours, that had been so tossed with tempests, be tender of that, that might be so usefull for poor trembling hearts in a stormy day.

Get to God therefore as thou canst. Sad judgements be upon our people. Spiritual judgements are the sorest judgements. What if thou hast but the same words? as Christ, Mat. 26. 44. thou maist be heard as he was, Heb. 10. 11.

The

The Song of Moses was a New Song, because tendered to God with New affections, Rev. 14. 3. and 15. 3. What if thy petitions be broken, and Confused? as Exod. 14. 10, 11, 12. This poor man cried, saith David, Psal. 34. 6. when he was in a poor case indeed, like a Bedlam, 1 Sam. 21. 13. and yet he was heard.

The little lisping children have sometimes a grant of their Requests, when those that are of greater maturity seem to be set aside. Whilst Moses held up his hands (though in a poor way) Israel prevailed. Who can tell what God may do? Abraham left asking, ere God left granting, even for a filthy Sodom. Remember Master Latimers, once again, once again: Tug, and wrestle. We may come to see, and our people may be made to know, that their heart is turned back again to the God of their Fathers, 1 King. 18. 37. But to return to Master Capel.

He was of a sound, and settled judgement. He pitched at first upon a good foundation, and being nourished up in the words of Faith, he continued in the things he had learned, and been well assured of, knowing from whom he had received them, as 1 Tim. 4. 6. He was well grounded in his opinion: one that stood like a brazen wall, as firm as a very Rock in the midst of all the dashings and Clashings of tempestuous times. He saw with a clear eye through all the painted glosses of those that were given to change; and therefore was not moved at all with any thing that was said or done in that kinde; he was true to his Religion, and clave close all along to his first principles, holding fast the Faith that was once, and (as he himself would often express it) but once delivered to the Saints. He lived and dyed a true Orthodox Divine, according to the known Doctrine of the Church of England. He knew full well, for all the great talk of the Gospel, as though it were but newly dropt out of the clouds, that there is not any other Gospel, but the everlasting Gospel, Rev. 14. 8. that was preached before unto Abraham, Gal. 3. 8. and hath been entertained all along still by Gods faithful people; and shall be so continually to the end of the world. Yet some there be that are no mean pretenders to the Gospel, and notwithstanding the same, are in great danger of perverting the Gospel of Jesus Christ, as Gal. 1. 7.

His sound judgement.

His constancy.

This constant, and stable man was set up as a sure Sea-mark. Let us stand to his steps though we stand alone. God and a good Conscience are alwayes good company. Elijah was but one, yet did he very good service. One Athanasius in the East; one Hillary in the West; was of mighty great use in a staggering time. What if we meet with stormes. It is but a poor Religion that is not worth suffering for. It will turn to a Testimony, Luke 21. 13. When the wilde humour is spent, men will return home again. A Statue of Mercury will be looked upon then. Those poor silly souls that be tossed to and fro, and whirled about, and about, again with every wind of Doctrine, Eph. 4. 14. will be glad of such a sight in the day of their Visitation; whereas they which know, or should know more of God, be not steddly in their steering, but vary in their course, poor bewildred hearts will be at their wits ends, not knowing which way to turn, nor to whom to go, nor whom to walk after.

The danger of inconstancy in Religion.

As there is but one God, so there is but one Faith, and one Baptisme, and one way to eternal life; and one Rule for us all to walk by; why be we not then all of one Heart? why walk we not all in one tract? So many men as we see, so many minds there be. Every Moneth almost produceth a new Faith. It is easie to swim with the Tyde: To perswade the Heart of the Resolute of that that is favoured by the Times, and yet to pretend still that it is from more Light. We may talk of the Spirit, but it's certain that Schisme is a fruit of the Flesh. The old way is the good way, Jer. 18. 15. He shall stumble, and ensnare his feet that swerves from the Antient Paths. What is got by gadding? Men itch for change still, and there is no rest but with our first Husband, Hos. 2. 7. It is good to be all of one minde in God. Where there is, not Unity in Judgement, there is scarce Unity in Affections.

We are too fierce against such as close not with our Notions. It was Bell, Book, and Candle once; It is not much better now. Wilde fire flies amain: We cannot all cut to a thread; there will be some Variation in the Compass: But whilst we aim at the white, the odds is to be passed by without bitterness. Why should there be such huge Rents and Divisions in the Church? Where is our mutual forbearance? We have not yet learned our Lesson well, to wait one for another till God shall reveal it, Phil. 3. 15. Whilst we be so sharp in our contests, Satan makes his Markets: Religion goes to wrack; our differences are widened. Some are ready to give up all, seeing there is no better Harmony: Others could well wish themselves out of the world, that they might be delivered (as Melancthon said) from the implacable difference, even amongst some Divines. Oh! that we could hearken unto God, who would have the truth followed, but in love, Eph. 4. 15. If the Word will not prevaile, the Cross will come, and make a Hooper and a Ridley imbrace one another.

How to be constant
therein.

Let us fall upon that one, and onely solid way of God, it will ever be our glory. Get we to God, he can stablish our unresolved hearts, 2 Cor. 1. 21. See that the judgement be so rightly set, Isa. 33. 6. and the heart so firmly knit to God, and his Truth, and then we shall not waver. Tamper not with opinions, 2 Pet. 3. 17. nor with opiniative men, 1 Tim. 5. 6. Rom. 16. 17, 18. Nor yet with Books that scatter Tares. This grave, and prudent Divine gives a very good caution to this purpose in his Treatise of Temptations, from famous Master Dod, a man of vast experience. An honest heart may be sorely puzzled with a forked Argument. The Martyr could dye for Christ, that could not dispute for him. Some pretend that they must try all things: But they speak besides the Book. Who will try Rats-bane, or a sharp Sword whether it will pierce into his Bowels? Some think that they can withdraw when they see danger; but Satan is subtle: Venome will get in before we be aware, and error will stick, and eat like a Gangrene. What gets the Fly that playes with the Candle? They that nibble at the bait shall hardly escape the hook. Again, Gingle not with tearms that be improper in matters of Religion; they favour of singularity, breed rents and divisions between Preachers and people, and take off the minde from things more Essential. Learned men have observed, that Hereticks gat great advantage by the unwary speeches of the Fathers. Some of Calvins expressions that were not so well pondered, have done no great good to some in our times. Nestorius fell into his Heresie by defending an improper speech of his; and Eutyches thinking to mend it, fell into the other extreame. Doctor Thomas Taylor speaks much to this point to very good purpose in his Progress to Holiness, p. 134. 135. 154. and concludes, that if we will keep the faith of our Fathers, we must keep the words of our Fathers.

His single-
heartedness

Our Master Capel was a man of a single heart: He was (with Jacob, Gen. 25. 27.) a plain man, i. e. A down-right honest man, as the Original signifies. A very Nathaniel, an Israelite indeed, Joh. 1. 47. in whom, (though there was some infirmity) yet there was no guile. He had much of the wisdome that is from above, and was as far from Hypocrisie as most men living. If all others were of his temper. Momus had no need to complain of the want of a window into any mans Breast. He was what he was indeed, and in truth, without dissimulation: He was very high in his conformity to those Primitive Christians, Act. 2. 46. and left a brave President to all that would be what they should be in this particular.

Hypocrisie
of.

We of this doubting and deceitful Generation had need to look about us; and see what was here set before us in very Legible Characters, that we may learn to be more above board in our dealings. We are faine into an age, like that of the Prophets, wherein every one hath too much of the Hypocrite. We may well cry, Help Lord, for the faithful fail: with a double Heart and double tongue tongue do they ſpeak. The moſt be for all Tides and Times, as mutable as the Weather-Cock: For any manner of Mode, ſo as they can ſerve their own turns by it. Some can be any thing but what they ſhould be. We have need to beware of men where every Brother will ſupplant. The Hypocrite with his mouth deſtroies his Neighbour, Prov. 11. 9. It is indeed good to be wiſe as Serpents, but withall, we ſhould be innocent as Doves. Though it be juſt with God that the deceiver ſhall be deceived, and ſome like it well, yet is it not juſt in thoſe that do it. They that turn aſide to crooked wayes, ſhall be led forth with the workers of iniquity, Pſal. 125. 5.

Plain dealing is a Jewel, yea though it be in ſin as this acute man tells us, in his Tentat. Part. 3. Its a dainty fine thing in our Confessions, Repentance, and in all wherein we act. He that uſeth it (what ever men ſay or think) ſhall neither live, nor dye a Beggar. Down-right honeſty is the beſt policy. It is delightful to God, Prov. 12. 22. and it will be a comfort to us, 2 Cor. 1. 12. This is our rejoycing, and we never eat our meat with more gladneſs, than when we do all with ſingleneſs of heart, Act. 2. 46.

Mr. Capel was a very uſeful man in his life. He was (with Melancthon) born for the common good, and lived for the publick benefit of the whole Country.

His Uſefulneſs.

Whiſt he was at his Poſtoral charge, he gave himſelf fully, and wholly, to Reading, to Exhortation, and Doctrines; and his proſiting appeared unto all men: ſo that he was generally, and that juſtly, reputed a man approved of God, right-ly dividing the word of truth. It is well known what pains he took, and to how good purpoſe, during the whole time of his abode there, which was about one and twenty years. He preached conſtantly twice every Lords day; and beſides, preached a Lecture conſtantly every week, though he had but an infirm body, till by reaſon of ſickneſs he was taken off: And then beſides his Sabbath dayes work, he preached onely upon the Feſtival dayes. His lips were touched with a coal from the Altar. It may truly be ſaid of him, as it was of Muſculus, that his words pierced like a two-edged ſword. He could when he pleaſed be a Boanerges, a ſon of Thunder; But his bent was moſt to be a Barnabas, a ſon of Conſolation. He was a true Evangelical Preacher, and Comforted many a drooping heart by his labours in publick, and gave abundance of ſatisfaction in private to many troubled ſpirits that uſed to reſort to him out of all Countries, both far and near.

His frequent preaching.

He alſo ſhewed himſelf to be a Tree of Gods own planting, by bringing forth more fruit ſtill in his age. When the times were ſuch (ſome flying ſo extreamly high, the Ceremonies being preſſed with rigour, and grievous penalties inflicted) that he (being tender in matters of Conformity) muſt needs quit his Paſtoral charge, which was Novem. 27. 1634. He betook himſelf then to his little Cell (as Samuel did to his Ramah) that had never been looked upon if he had not come thither (no more than Iſlebiun, and Bretta, if not for Luther and Melancthon) and there he had more health and cheerefulneſs of ſpirit than formerly, which he improved well for the publick advantage: For,

He leaves
the Mini-ſtry.

At Pitch-
combe.

There he fell upon the Practice of Phyſick. He indeed had bent his ſtudies that way before hand (foreſeeing what would follow) yet would he do nothing in that kinde (it not being his Calling) ſo long as that great work of the Miniſtry lay upon him: But when he had quit the more ſpecial tye of the care of mens ſouls, he then took himſelf to be at more freedome, and having a Liſenſe ſent him by the Biſhop of Glouceſter to authorize him, he fell upon the cure of mens Bodies; and being of great ſufficiency, his fame was quickly ſpread abroad. He was looked upon as a very Triſmegiſtus, or a ſecond Aſculapius. He could do much at the diving into a diſeaſe, and in applying ſuch medicines as were proper and fit. Not like ſome that will be tampering with that Profeſſion, and give their dotes at adventure. He was quick, yet in caſes of difficulty and danger he would weigh things well. In deſperate diſeaſes he would adventure far, according to the Rules of Reason, what he gave should be safe. He mixed all with his own hands, he would stoop to the meanest, and serve all at an easie rate. His Receipts amounted not to the half, nay not to one quarter of a common Apothecaries Bill. He was blessed by God with great, and good success, and had resort, especially towards his latter end, out of his own, and other Countries, so that he had not leasure to sit at his own meals in quiet. Yea many times he was quite tired out, till God called him to rest.

ſick.

His fruitful
discourses.

His words were seasonable and savoury: His tongue was a Tree of Life: His lips fed many, Whosoever came near him, should have something dropping (if he did but heed it) that was worth carrying away with him. It is true, he would be pleasant, and jest more freely than many did, or could well like. (Some of his best friends wished that it had been otherwise) but there will be something of humane infirmity cleaving to us all in this world. Yet the times are to be considered, and the nature of a many with whom he had to deal, that could no more away with a down-right blow, than some can away with sound Doctrine. Yet there was never a prudent heart but it might have picked sweet out of that which some did most of all distaste. It is said, that Erasmus did more hurt to the Pope by his jesting, than Luther did by his Ruffling: So this man gave a deadlier blow to the iniquity of the times in his jocular way, than most others can do in their most serious undertakings; yet would he be as serious as any man living upon a just and fit occasion, and would be as tender to trouble the spirits of the meanest as heart could desire. Urbanus Regius having had one dayes discourse with Luther, said, That it was one of the sweetest dayes that ever he had in his life: Some can say as much of this rare man, when they had him (as all might have had him) in the right veyn.

An excellent Counsellor.

He was singular in that faithful advice and counsel which he used to give to all of all sorts upon every emergent occasion. It was said in old time, They shall ask Counsel of Abel, 2 Sam. 20. 18. and so they ended their matters. The common conflux of almost all in those parts, was still to his house. Oynment and perfume rejoyce the heart, Prov. 27. 9. so did the sweetness of this man by his hearty counsel. To some he was as another Nestor; others found him ever a most faithful Achates, and such made him (as Tully did his Atticus) their constant Assylum, and his dexterous counsel (like Ariadnes thred) led them out of many a perplexed Labyrinth. He was (as that famous Auger in Homer) one that could see things past, and present, and guess shrewdly also at those that were to come. Old mens counsels (they say) are young mens lances: Master Calvins were very profitable, so were Master Capels: Many a young beginner, and tired conflicter, did fetch all their best weapons out of this mans Armory.

He preached freely.

He preached the Gospel freely for the most part of his last twenty years. Freely he had received, and freely he would give. Nor that he thought it unlawful for a Minister to take maintenance, or to take that maintenance, by Tithes, which hath been publickly set aside in this Land; for his Tithes he paid himself, and that freely and duly too (all the whole time of his preaching thus freely) and that to one who did not much in the work of the Ministry; and he did it upon this ground, because he knew it to be his due. I will not dispute this point at this time, with those that be hampered in their opinions, but heartily wish them, with all those that in these times are such enemies to Tithes, and are so extreemly defective in making Conscience to pay them, to consider what hath fallen from the Pens of holy men that have been far enough off from being this way interested. Master Cartwright saith plainly, that they that take away the Tithes of the Ministers, and turn them to their own use, would doubtless Crucifie Christ again if he were here upon earth, Beza speaks of some that leave Christ, as the Souldiers did which Crucified him, either stark naked, or but sordidly clad; and so to do (saith he) is not to love God, but the goods of God more than God. Doctor John Reynolds saith, Our Ancestors provided Houses, Glebe-lands, Tithes, and other profits for Tithes affer-

for the maintenance of Pastors; And a little after he saith, The Churches Goods allotted to the maintenance of Pastors and Teachers, are not profane, but sacred, and therefore the sin of them that purloyn them, is Sacrilege, not Theft, wherein God is spoiled, Prov. 20. 25. It is a snare to devour that which is holy, and after the vows to enquire. Ananias and Saphira were made a dreadful spectacle, for filching of a little of that that was set apart for God. The Eagle fired her whole Nest by one poor piece of flesh plucked from the Altar. The people of this Land are curst with a Curse, and they will not see the cause of it, viz. Their Robbing of God, Mal. 3. 8, 9. in Tithes and Offerings. When shall we prove God, and see if he will not pour us out a blessing, as he hath promised, Mal. 3. 10. It would be a great joy to some that will get nothing by it, to hear Gods Israel once again tuning it out before the Lord, as Deut. 26. 13, 14. I have brought away the hallowed things out of mine house, I have not taken away ought thereof, for any unclean or common use, as Junius reads it. For then they might say with heart and hope, Lord look down from thy holy habitation, and bless thy people, and the Land that thou hast given us, as Deut. 26. 15.

The practice of this judicious man will sway with some, who was such a burning & shining light, the more to be admired that it blazed so long, and so clearly too, without any of this sublunary Oil. His mind was so fully satisfied with his small gain in the practice of Physick, together with what he had of his own temporal estate, that he would accept of nothing for his preaching of any man living, though tendred, and never so much pressed upon him. He took not himself bound (as the case stood) to labour in the work of the Ministry, there being another Incumbent in that place. What he did was meerly in love to God and mens souls. Indeed he met with many diversions, as the tempests of the times: his own domestick troubles, age creeping on, store of sick and sad people, and recourse of all sorts, so that he had scarce an hour free for study; yet nothing would take him off from this employment, till God took him off from all his labours.

As he preached, so he lived down the iniquities of the times. He did not onely cry them down by his publick Ministry, but gave them a more deadly blow by his contrary walking. Noah condemned the world more by what he did, than by what he said, Heb. 11. 7. The way which Master Capel took, put some to a stand, caused others to relent, and repent, and encouraged others in the good and right way, whilst they had his pattern that could not be contradicted. Now that he is gone, such have a harder task; but God will carry on his own work.

He was eminent for Self-denial: Indeed Self-denial is in very mans mouth, but hardly to be found in any mans practise, Self hath ever been, is, and will be the great Diana, notwithstanding all mens fair pretences. We read of him that could give smooth and golden words, Ruth. 4. 4, 6. but when it came to the point, he would not mar his Inheritance. Self hath too great a stroke in the best of us all, both Preachers and Professors, both in Church and Common-wealth. It began to work betimes. St. Paul tells us in his dayes, that all sought their own things, Phil. 2. 21. and it is now grown to a greater head in our age, when we neither eat, nor drink, nor fast, nor pray, nor do any thing to speak of, but too too apparently wee seek our selves therein. How much then was this brave man to be admired, seeing all that knew him, can bear him witness, how far he excelled in this rare Grace: he could deny himself in his own understanding, and go after God in a way that he knew not, as Abraham, Heb. 11. 8. he could deny himself in his own will, when he that is, above would lead him in a way that he would not, as Joh. 21. 18. He could deny himself in his own affections also, when he came to be Crossed in what he could have most desired, ever ruling them by reason and Religion, as a wise man should do, subjecting himself to bear with quietness what could not be holp, without raising too much dust. It is strange to see how far he could deny himself in apparel, diet, attendance, and what not!

His holy life.

His Self-denial.

He

His contempt of the World.

He was very exemplary for his contempt of the world. He had gotten the start of most men in that particular. He used to be beating upon this point mainly, both in his publick preaching, and in his private conference, and shewed the reality of what he pressed when he came to act himself. Indeed he could not say as Luther did, that he never had been tempted unto Covetousness, but he kept himself from any noted taint in that kinde; nay from the least suspicion of that foul crime, with famous Doctor Whitaker. When he had things under his hand, he still charged his servants to do what few men practice, that they should never set up Corn, nor bring home Cattel, but take as the Market would afford. All that knew him knew that he was far enough from encreasing his estate by any indirect means; and never was there any man more willing to part with money upon a just and fit occasion. It is well known that he gave over a Living of good Value, one of the best in those parts above twenty years before his death, and betook himself to a poor little corner, from which he would never be withdrawn, no more than Musculus from his Berne. And even there he might have picked mens purses if he had been that way given: But many, and many a time he put back Money, and took but a small matter from those that were able, and would have been willing to have given him more; they sought to force him to take it, but he would utterly refuse it.

His Humility.

He was no less Exemplary for his great Humility. This was the Grace that graced all the good that was in him. He would be often speaking of what he had heard concerning Dr. John Rainolds, that he was as learned a man as any was in the world, as godly as learned, and as humble as godly. Master Capel loved, and revered this Doctor, and trod in his steps. He could speak with Tongues more than most men, yet would he never make use of them in the publick Congregation. He used to honour all men; to acknowledge the gifts, and parts of those that were far below him, and to rejoyce in them, as Hooper did in the blind Boy. He would not meddle in things that were too high for him, nor intrench upon that that was beyond his sphere. He would not stand in the place of great men. He could refuse honours, as Musculus did, and contented himself with plain, and mean things. Its observed by Cajetan, the Flower of the Cardinals, that he would never be in his silks and braveries, but kept his old fashions to his lives end. Melancthon would not disdain to do that, which his meanest servant would scarcely have put his hand to. So was it with Master Capel, and he would bear things that went awry without distempering himself about them. Moderation he pressed, and moderation he practised. Staupicius told Luther concerning his behaviour, that in the first three years, he did all things according to the utmost rigour, and that would not do: In the next three years he did all according to the Laws and Counsels of the Antients, and that would not hit: And in the last three years, he did all according to the will of God, and yet neither would that succeed; and then he was fain to be content with what he could have.

His Moderation.

His other Virtues.

Thus you have a taste, and but a little taste (in this that hath been said) of the precious Liquor that was powred into this earthen vessel. To which might be added the quickness of his apprehension, the strength of his Memory, his sense of the publick evils, his passing by of wrongs and offences; his special regard to such as loved their Wives and Ministers, and the like: But where should I make an end? These, and his other eminent Parts, Vertues, and Graces deserve to be laid in oyl-colours by the most skilfull Pencil.

His Patience.

Towards his latter end he met with some pinching griefs, which he did bear with invincible patience, and fortitude: He willingly submitted, because it was Gods will to have him so exercised. All of us must expect to drink of the self-same cup: our last dayes usually are our worst dayes, as Mollerus observes; observes; The clouds will then be returning after the rain. We must be taught to know, and speak it out, that we are but Pilgrims: we must be more truly and thoroughly taken off from the world, more ripened, and mellowed, and seasoned for God, and be made more serious in all our undertakings. Melancthon used to say, That if he had no cares, he should have no Prayers. Our comfort is, our time is but short; The most and best of our treasure is gone before: Our hope is laid up in Heaven. Get we more communion with God, more faith, more patience, and let us put on the whole Armour of God, and then we shall be able to stand, and to withstand in the evil day, and in the end, shall be more than Conquerours through him that hath loved us.

This clear-sighted, and understanding man foresaw storms approaching, and rejoiced that he should be in his grave before they fell, whither also he came as a shock of Corn gathered into the Barn in due season. The Sabbath day was the last day of his life, the strict observation whereof he often pressed: He would say that we should go to sleep that night (as it were) with meat in our mouthes.

That Sabbath day being September the 21. 1656, he preached twice, taking his leave of the world by pressing faith in God. That evening he repeated both his Sermons in his Family, somewhat more largely than ordinary. He read his Chapter also, went to prayer, and so to bed, and dyed, immediately, by that the words were well out of his mouth, being threescore and ten years old. Who can desire to dye better than Stephen did, calling upon God: He would often say, That if God saw it fit, one had better to dye of a quick, than of a lingering Death: And God answered his desires.

THE

The Life and Death of Doctor Robert Harris, who dyed Anno Christi 1658.

His Birth.

Robert Harris was born in a dark time, and place, at Broad-Camden in Glocestershire Anno Christi 1578. His Father had the repute of a very wise, and understanding man, and his Mother of a very devout, and charitable woman, under whose wings he spent his child-hood: But he acknowledged it as a matter of grief to him all his life, that he preferred his play before reading the Scriptures to his parents at their call. So soon as he was fit for it, he was set to a Free-School at Chipping Camden, where he met with a double discouragement; The first was from the often change of his School-masters by reason of the small salary that came to them: The second proceeded from the fierce and cruel carriage of others, which (as he used often to say) was the bane of many young Schollars; and though for his own part, he remembered not that he had smarted under a Rod in any School, yet the sight of the severity used to others, brought such a trembling and sadness upon his spirit, that he could not shake it off to his dying day.

His Education.

His going to Oxford.

From thence he was removed to the School at Worcester, under the care of Master Bright, and on the Sabbaths he heard that Reverend and Learned Doctor Robert Abbotts; and being furnished with School-Learning, he went from thence to Magdalen-Hall in Oxford, being allyed to the Principle, Master Lyster.

There he shewed a more than ordinary desire of Learning, and having but little help either from the Principal, or his Tutor, he followed his private studies with the more earnestness, yet all this while he enquired little into the ways and truths of God.

A special Providence.

His Tutor not long after leaving the Hall, he earnestly solicited the Principal, that he might be committed to the care of one Master Goffe, of Magdalen Colledge, who was noted for a very good Logician and Disputant, but withall he was accounted a Puritan, which made the Principal (who was Popishly affected) to dissuade his choice; But he (not out of love to Religion, but Learning) persisted in his desires, and prevailed.

Master Goffe having thus received him into his charge, Required him, that with the rest of his fellow-Pupils, he should joyn in reading the Scriptures, Repetition of Sermons, and Prayer; which new course, he being unaccustomed to, was somewhat troubled at it, observing that none of the Seniors embraced that way, and yet it was such as he knew not how to contradict. This caused him oft to betake himself to his private Prayers, wherein he begged of God, either either to discover to him the fallhood, if his Tutor had any design upon him to corrupt him, or if this course were pleasing to God, that then he would confirm him in it; and it pleased God after a while so to resolve him, that he bought a Bible, and with indefatigable pains he applied himself to the reading of that, and other good Authors in Divinity.

His Conversion.

Shortly after Master Goffe refuseth to continue his Tutor, onely agrees that they would conjoyn their studies together, Master Goffe reading Philosophy to Master Harris, and Master Harris reading Greek to him, and from Greek they proceeded to Hebrew, in which study some other of the Fellows, joyned with them, whereof one afterwards was president; and besides these studies, his Tutor and he agreed to read Calvins Institutions by turns, which course they continued as long as their other occasions, and exercises would permit.

Having for a while been Bachelor of Arts, he was willing to try his fitness for the Ministry, because otherwise his Father would have him to the study of the Law; and having prepared a Sermon, he proffered his pains at Chipping Cambden; But such was the wofull ignorance of those times, that in the greater Town he knew not where to procure a Bible to carry with him into the Pulpit, yet at last being directed to the Vicar there, he indeed had a Bible, but it could not be found, having not been seen of some moneths before; yet search being made, he was furnished with a Bible, and after Prayer made, he took for his Text those words, Rom. 10. 1. Brethren, my hearts desire and prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved; And his Sermon was highly commended, and yet himself would say, that he was a loser by the bargain. 1. Because his heart swelled upon it. 2. Because his carnal Friends hereupon called on him to give over University studies, and to come amongst them, as having learning enough.

Woful ignorance.

His first Sermon.

His Father also (having many other children to provide for) was willing to ease his charge, and therefore applied himself to some persons of eminency both in Church and State, to get some preferment for him: But he, being willing to decline publick employment for the present, humbly intreated his Father, that what he would hereafter bestow upon him for a Patrimony, he would be pleased for the present to allow it him for his maintenance in Oxford, that he might perfect his studies there, which his Father at last condescending to, he returned with joy to Oxford. But behold Gods providence! He had not been long at Oxford before a fearful Plague brake out in that place, which so scattered the University that few were left remaining, in which case he was again put to his shifts; loath he was to return home, and whither else to betake himself he knew not; till at last, by a special Providence, he was invited to the house of one Master Doyly, five miles from Oxford, a Gentleman of a very ancient Family in that County, and a great Friend to the Gospel, whose wife also was eminent for knowledge, and piety, to them therefore Master Harris goes for the present.

His return to Oxford.

A special Providence.

Coming to Master Doylyes, he there met with one Master Prior, a prudent godly man, and of an excellent spirit, who being much weakned by two wracking diseases, of the Stone and Gout, and overburdened with preaching both on the Sabbaths and Fasts, enjoyned upon the occasion of the Plague, in meer pitty, Master Harris helpt him a turn or two, which he performed with so good approbation, that presently he was set upon, both by Master Doyly, Master Prior, and some others, that he could not withstand their importunity, but was necessitated to preach with them, at least during the continuance of those extraordinary Fasts. Master Harris pleaded that he was not an Ordained Minister, and therefore durst not meddle with any thing but preaching; neither with that, but till he could be Ordained. This they assented to, and during his abode amongst them, he met with ample requitals from the good Gentleman, and his Wife, and great encouragement from the people.

Ministers
suspended.

About this time there was a fearful Eclipse upon the Church; many eminent Ministers were suspended both from their Office and Benefices, and amongst them, those three bright shining Stars, Master Dod, Master Cleaver, Master Lancaster. Upon this occasion Sir Anthony Cope, who had formerly placed, and now lost Master Dod at Hanwell, and Master Cleaver at Drayton, became a Suter to his brother Doyly (for so he was by marriage) for the enjoyment of Mr. Harris. Master Doyly entertained this unwelcome motion with great regret, as being wholly unwilling to part with one whom he so much prized, yet after a long debate, it was judged most beneficial for the publick, and therefore could not be resisted.

His remove
to Hanwell.

Master Harris went to Hanwell with much grief and fear, where he found the temper of the Country to be this: Preach he might and welcome, but they would own no man for their Pastors but those who were ejected: At last it was concluded that Master Harris should preach to both Congregations whilst Authority would permit, and so long as there was any hope of Recovering their former Pastors, this gave some satisfaction, yet was it not sufficient, because Master Harris was not fully of their former Pastors minde.

Mr. Whately
at Banbury.

Just at the same time it fell out that Master Whately came to Banbury, and met with no less a share in the peoples displeasure, who though they could not except against his Ministry (he being endowed with excellent parts) yet they quarrelled; because his judgement about Ceremonies was not the same with that of their former Teachers; and the truth is, they both had a sad time of it for a great while, notwithstanding all the prudence and moderation which Sir Anthony Cope, and Master Dod shewed to the quieting of them.

After a while, Archbishop Bancroft finding that the silenced Ministers would not yeeld, presented two Chaplains to Hanwell and Drayton, upon pretence of a lapse: But Sir Anthony Cope, sitting then in Parliament, took one or two of the House with him, and presented his two Clerks to the Archbishop, who after a long contest, was content to admit his presentation; But Sir Anthony having spoken in that Parliament against insufficient Ministers, not without reflexion upon the Archbishops, and Bishops, Archbishop Bancroft could not but resent this, and therefore referred his Clerks to be strictly examined by his ablest, Chaplain. The Chaplain, having as it seems, his lesson beforehand, brings in the Clerk designed for Hanwell (which Master Harris had declined) as altogether insufficient, though a grave and discreet Divine. Master Harris was returned, mediocriter doctus, moderately learned. The Archbishop being not satisfied with this last account, desires Bishop Barlow, who was present with him, to make some further proof of Master Harris, and the Bishop being an active and witty man, was glad of the opportunity, and deals with Master Harris, first in Divinity, but most in other Learning, and Greek, wherein the Bishops excellency lay; and both of them so long Greeked it, till they were both gravelled for want of words, whereupon they both laughed, and so gave over. The Bishop going into the Archbishop, in his report (as Master Harris expressed it) set him up as much too high, as the Chaplain had set his Fellow too low. The Archbishop hearing the Bishops testimony, was content to admit Master Harris, but upon condition that he might have Hanwell, which was easily assented to by Sir Anthony, having before designed it for him, and Master Dod also was present to testify his Concurrent desire; The only stick with Master Harris was, that he was fearful to succeed so famous a Divine; which answer was not pleasing to the Archbishop, though at present he courted Master Dod.

He is settled
at Hanwell.

A new Pastor being thus placed at Hanwell, and withall, Drayton being furnished with a godly prudent man [Master Scudder] there were now three neighbours, who were linked together, not onely in judgement and affection, but also in affinity; for Master Harris married Master Whately's sister, and Master Scudder his wives sister, and these three for a while met weekly together,

His Marriage.

ther, and by turns translated and Analysed each his Chapter, till multitudes of publick employments caused them to desist.

Not long after, there befell Master Harris his wife, upon the birth of her first childe, a long and sore affliction, which was (as Master Dod told him) but to season, and fit him for his work; and Master Harris himself would oft say, that he had been quite spoyled, had he not thus been taken down; for young Ministers know not what ground they tread on, till God layes them flat.

His Affliction.

This, and some other clouds being blown over, the weather seemed now to clear up, and his people began to relish his Ministry, and much comfort he found in the neighbourhood of many godly Ministers; on one side, he had Master Cleaver, a very solid Text-man; on the other, Master Lancaster, a very humble, and self-denying man, who, though by birth he was a good Gentleman, and had sometime been Fellow in Kings Colledge in Cambridge, where he had read sundry publick Lectures, and made many Speeches, and (as Doctor Collins, that Master of Language used to say) delivered himself in as pure Latine as ever Tully spake, having no other Notes to help him, but what he wrote upon his own nails; yet this good man, thus accomplished with all learning contented himself with a Living that was not worth 40. l. per annum, and in his Preaching made no Noise of any Learning at all. When I was young I knew this Master Lancaster, he was a very little man of stature, but eminent, as for other things, so especially for his living by Faith. His charge being great, and his means so small, his wife would many times come to him when she was to send her maid to Banbury Market to buy provision, and tell him that she had no money; his usual answer was, Yet send your maid, and God will provide; and though she had no money, yet she never returned empty, for one or other that knew her to be Master Lancaster's maid, either by the way, or in Banbury Town meeting her, would give her money, which still supplied their present wants.

Master Lancaster, a learned and humble man.

Life of Faith.

But above all his Neighbours, Master Harris still most respected Master Dod, and concerning him was fully of Master Cartwright's minde, that he was the fittest man in England for a Pastoral Office; he was able to speak to any mans Capacity; He was never out of the Pulpit, for all his discourses were Sermons, which he intermixed with such variety of delightfull expressions, and similitudes, as would take with any man. The truth is, he was a very eloquent man both in English, and Latine, and so facetious and pithy, that Master Harris used to say often, That if all his Apothegmes were gathered together, they would exceed all that Plutarch had written in Greek, and others since his time, in Latine had published. For some years Master Harris had the happiness to live with, and near this man of God, and that in such a conjunction as greater could not be.

Mr. Dod's Character.

During the time of their converse, they studied together, and daily read a Chapter in the Original together. And after Master Dod was restored to the liberty of his Ministry in another Diocess, he would not expound a Text; preach a Sermon, answer a case of Conscience (whereof many were dayly brought to him) without the Concurrence of Master Harris with him; so highly did that eminent Divine prize him, and would often blame him for his reservedness and unwillingness to put forth himself.

How Mr. Dod prized him.

Master Dod being (as was said before) removed into Northamptonshire to Fausley, God vvas pleased to supply his vvant by the resort of sundry young Students from Oxford to Hanwell, so that Master Harris his House vvas a little Academy; And amongst others, he took much comfort in Mr. Pemble (who would do nothing, especially in Divinity, without his advice) as also Master Capel, who oft resorted to him in his grievous conflicts and temptations for advice and succour, and also, in his well known Treatise of Temptations.

Ss 2 Whilst

His invitations to London.
Speciall
Providences.

Whilst he was at Hanwell he had frequent calls to London, sometimes to Pauls Cross, sometimes to preach before Parliaments, and other sometimes at Country-Feasts, which occasioned many invitations to places there: But of all the Auditories, that of Saviours in Southwark was most grateful to him, and there he could have spent the remainder of his dayes if his Voyce would have reached so great an Assembly. From thence he was invited to some lesser Churches, but God had not yet finished his work by him at Hanwell, and therefore something or other still interposed. Probably he had closed with Aldermanbury, had not the then Bishop of London complemented him out of it, commending his Conscio ad Clerum at Oxford, and promising him better preferment than he thought he should merit. Some other offers were made to him, but still he met with some Cross Providence, which made him come to a resolution to end where he began.

His La-
Hanwell.

At Hanwell he went over many Scriptures, but his people found least good from that which cost him most pains, viz. his Sermons upon the Colossians, which Epistle he preached throughout. Indeed at that time he thought he could not speak too highly to a people who had been so taught, but upon further trial he found that he could not go too low, so that (as some of his hearers after told him) his pains upon that Epistle was wholly lost as to them. His Sermons upon Historical Scriptures, best pleased most of his auditors; But with himself, and the more spiritual sort, his labours upon the Book of the Canticles prevailed most, the Notes whereof he was often pressed to make publick, which he refused upon a double account. 1. Because a great part of them were lost, and dyed with Doctor Preston, to whom he had lent them, and whom he used to call, A needles engrosser of other mens Notes. 2. He less satisfied himself in his elder years, in divers passages of that Mysterious Book. Yet if the world were at leasure to hear old men speak, it might be very useful to Collect those dispersed Papers, and it is hoped that some of his near Relations (who best know his hand, and method in writing) may take some pains therein for the publick good.

His frequent preaching and succes.

At Hanwell Master Harris continued preaching for about forty years, a constant, painful, and faithfull Preacher, both upon the Sabbaths, and other occasions which fell out often; For when he came thither, he found that there had been an accustomed course of preaching upon such Festival dayes (then so called) which might not enterfere with the Lecture or Market at Banbury, which he also kept up, especially on Easter, and Whislon Mundayes, unto which, multitudes of Christians resorted far and near, as the Doves to the windows, yet without any superstition. And on the morrow, they were entertained with the like Feast at Banbury by Master Wheatley. O, what a Faire of souls was then held at Hanwell and Banbury by these two Brothers? How did Religion then flourish, and Professors thrive like the Calves in their stalls? The truth is, these Preachers carved out sound and wholesome food, and their hearers came with good stomachs, expecting what they found, viz. Milk for Babes, and Strong meat for strong men, and accordingly did grow thereby. In those dayes godly Preachers stuffed not their Sermons with airy notions, and curious speculations, but sought out profitable matter, which they delivered in sound words, and in a plain method of Doctrine, Reason, and Use, accommodating themselves to every mans Capacity, and God gave them a plentiful Harvest in that Country.

Great success.

Plain Preaching.

His Lecture at Stratford
upon Avon.

These his employments at home (together with his natural Bookishness) made him less forward to engage in Lectures abroad, onely he was one in a combination at Dedington in Oxfordshire; And for sometime he kept a Lecture alone at Stratford upon Avon in Warwickshire every other week, unto which there was a great resort both of the Chief Gentry, and choicest Preachers and Professors in those parts, and amongst them, that Noble and Learned Knight, Sir Thomas Lucy of Charlcot had alwayes a great respect for him.

About

About this time a great Living in the Country was offered him, about which he was very indifferent, and indeed, was but very indifferently dealt with in it, which occasioned him to say, That he never bore any thing more impatiently than the abuse of Religion to base and private ends; and, that carnal Policy, would render Profession despicable at least, whilst some men took such a Liberty to themselves in equivocating and dawdling; and the reason of such mens success was, not because they had more Wit than others, but more boldness to say and do what others durst not.

Disingenu-ity.

All this while he continued at Hanwell in much Prosperity, and the Neighbours thereabouts frequented his Sermons, amongst whom he received the greatest Seals of his Ministry: But though he found so much encouragement from abroad, yet we must not forget his people at home, who were so far brought into a conformity, that at sometimes there was not a Family in the Town where Gods Name was not in some measure called upon, nor a Person that refused to be prepared by him for the Lords Supper.

Religion
flourisheth.

And as the Lord was thus pleased to bless, and succeed his Labours, so he caused him to thrive in his outward estate likewise, which himself could not but take notice of; For though his means was not great, and his Children many (for whose sakes he kept a Schoolmaster) and the resort of Friends to his House not small, both on Sabbath days, and Lecture days, yet was he in a thriving Condition; which occasioned him to say, That there was a secret Blessing attending on housekeeping. For (said he) I am not able to give an account of my expences and of Gods supplies.

Gods blessing estate.

Note.

But now began those cloudy times, and his sadder days, when Troops and Armies Marched into those Quarters, about Edg Hill, where was fought a bloody Battel, Octob. 23. 1642. upon the Lords Day, in the Vale of the Red Horse, being distant about four miles from him; yet it pleased God so to order it (which he took for a great Mercy) that he heard not the least noise of it (the wind sitting contrary) till the publick work of the day was over; nor could he believe the Report of a Battel, till a Souldier besmired with Blood and Powder came to witness it. From this very time his Troubles encreased: Now was he threatned by this, then by the other Garrison; one while he was a Roundhead, and then a Malignant; frequently oppressed with Souldiers that were quartered upon him, yet still he kept his station, and some of his Guests would joyn with him in Family-Duties, which he intermitted not, when others would scoffe at them, because not mingled with Book-Prayers. Every Sabbath he held on the course of his Ministry, and most of those which quartered with him, being Commanders and Officers, they shewed themselves Civil to him, and his; onely at one time there was a company who were so outrageous in swearing and Blasphemy, that he could not forbear preaching upon that Text, James 5. 12. Above all things, my Brethren; swear not, &c. which so nettled some of them, that they damned themselves to Hell if they did not shoot him in case he preached again upon that Text, which they judged to be purposely chosen against them; The next Sabbath he proceeded purposely upon the same Text, wherein he backed what he had said before, and as he was preaching he saw a Souldier take his Carbine, and fumble about the Cock as if he was preparing to shoot; but Master Harris, apprehending that he did it onely to disturb him, went through his work, and heard no more news of his Souldier.

Thus he continued his labours in those sad times, and though he was chosen a member of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, yet because upon serious thoughts, he judged his prefence less needful there than in the Country, he continued his station there, till he saw his Tenements in the Neighbourhood fired, wood, and nurseries of wood destroyed, himself threatned, and at last enforced by a Scottish Commander, to shift for himself; yea some of his own own Neighbours were now ready to betray him, whereupon he went to London, and by Gods good providence came thither in safety, though a sad man.

His remove
to London.

A good Providence.

When he came to London he went to the Assembly, where he found much more undone than done: Indeed he met there with many excellent and learned men; but his thoughts were sollicitous for his people, his wife and children, whom he had left behinde: and indeed he found little rest in his spirit, till the same good hand of Providence had safely brought them unto him. Then went he with more comfort to the Assembly, where he did Antiquum obtinere, Hear all, and say little.

Upon his remove from his house, both his Books, and his Notes (some few only accepted which he had conveyed away beforehand) together with all his remaining goods, were seized upon, and his Living given to another; But that might soon have been supplied, many offers being made to him, from several places, and Country-Committees.

He is settled
at But- tolphs Bi- shopsgate.

The first motion that he hearkened to was the Temple; But upon trial, he found that Church too large for his voyce, and thereupon refused; and at last he was sent to Buttolphs Bishopsgate, where, though the Congregation was too large for him, yet being necessitated to do something for the maintenance of his Family, he remained there, during his attendance upon the Assembly.

He is sent to Oxford.

After his continuance there for some time, himself with four more Divines were commanded down to Oxford, which was then under suspension by the Parliament; Which employment, he often professed, that he did earnestly decline, and that principally for two reasons;

He is chosen to Peters- field.

1. Because the Committee for Hampshire, had given him a free call to Petersfield, and thither he would willingly have gone.

2. Having long discontinued from the University, he looked upon himself as very unfit for such a service; but in conclusion he was plainly told, that such as would not be intreated, must be commanded, and so he was ordered to prepare for his journey. This much troubled him, and therefore he first goes to Petersfield, and acquaints them how the case stood with him; and because he could not come suddenly to them, he desires them, either to pitch upon some other Minister, or else, to take the care upon themselves, to provide supplies for both the Churches (for two they were) and to pay the Preachers out of the Revenues of the place. The people liked neither of the offers, yet were content to wait a while in hopes, that he might come to settle with them, requesting him in the mean while to provide them such supply as himself should approve of. This proved a troublesome work to him, though for a time he sent them help from Oxford, and thereabout; for preachers were now hard to be gotten, there being more want of Ministers, than of places; yet at last two were procured, the one of whom gave no good content. At last he was put upon it, either to relinquish Oxon, or Petersfield; The former he could not decline, and therefore he left the latter, though with great regret, because he could not seal up such respect, and thanks, as he conceived was due from him to that Country. Neither had he less trouble in providing for Buttolphs Bishopsgate (it being no easie matter to please Citizens) yet at the last they were supplied to their content.

He leaves
Petersfield.

He is traduced.

About this time many Libels were cast abroad in Oxford against other Preachers, and one amongst the rest reflected upon Master Harris, reckoning up his several Livings, and great Revenues, wherein they mentioned what was past; present, and to come, and happily if they had heard of the rest, which at several times were offered him, they would have put them also into that Catalogue: Master Harris being informed hereof, he wrote to some Friends (which Letters are already extant) wherein he vindicated himself in the main; yet withall he professed unto others, that it would, and should be to him matter

ter of humbling, and caution to him whilst he lived, that he had given the least advantage to such as sought it; for though he stood clear in his own and others consciences, who best knew him; that he was far from allowing non-residency, and plurality of Livings, yet to such as were ignorant of all Circumstances, there was some appearances of evil; which also he took the more to heart, because from that time forward he found the afflicting hand of God both upon him, and his.

His several afflictions.

The Preachers that were sent to Oxford found but ill entertainment; on the one hand they were aspersed, and libelled against by their own Mothers Sons; and on the other hand, they were challenged to a publick Disputation by one Master Erbery, a Sectary, and his associates. Master Harris was unwilling that his challenge should be entertained, having observed that disputes of that kinde, send away each party more strengthened in their opinions, than when they came thither; yet his Concurrence, at least so far with them, as to begin the work with prayer. This he condescended unto, and the Disputation proceeded; and the issue was, that all were Censured, some for speaking, others for their silence, in which latter rank he was willingly placed.

A Disputation at Oxford.

Not long after, came the Chancellor of Oxon [the Earle of Pembroke] to visit the University, who, according to the custome, bestowed Degrees upon some of the Schollars, and amongst others, Master Harris was admitted Doctor of Divinity, who yet, neither thought himself the better Schollar, nor the better Preacher for this new honour; and had it not been, that he was loath to sleight the favour from his Betters, he had refused it: having learned, That an empty hand from a Prince, and a naked title from his Chancellor, must be counted an honour.

He commenced Doctor.

Note.

At this time, many Headships of Colledges (before made void) were now to be supplied, and Doctor Harris professed, that seeing it was noised abroad, that these Reforming Preachers, came thither to play their own game, viz. to thrust out others, and to invest themselves with their places, he therefore resolved to keep to his old course; namely, to stand silent without opening his mouth for any Headship at all, and presently the best places were all disposed of; neither was any thing spoken of for Doctor Harris, till a Noble man, of the other University, made mention of him, as not fit to be forgotten; whereupon Trinity Colledge was assigned to him. This some of his Friends much wondered at, considering, that, though he was the meanest in his own eyes, yet was he the oldest man, and one that had suffered more by the times than any, if not than all the rest; yet he himself said little to it, onely he enquired who was the Head that was ejected, and what was the nature of the place: For he was unwilling to entertain the proffer, if the former Head could find favour to hold it, and thereupon he forbore as long as he could be permitted; and as for the place, the smalness of the Colledge, and the scituation of it, gave him great content, who desired no more than what would keep him from distractions in his studies; and the only thing that he stuck at was, because there was a Personage annexed to the Colledge.

He is made Head of Trinity Colledge.

But when he understood, that his distance from Oxford was not great, and the conditions easie, viz. That he was required to preach but eight Sermons per annum at it, he the more willingly inclined to it, though after acceptance, he could not satisfie himself under two Sermons a week; and so at last there he sate down, and took much content in the Fellows of that Colledge, betwixt whom, and him, there was ever a very fair Correspondence.

At the Parsonage, he found most of the people (though they had been long taught) very ignorant, and much addicted to their old Customs, and (which he looked upon as a sad prognostick to the place) no sooner did any where look Heaven-ward in any special manner, but the Lord presently took him.

him away, some few, and those very few excepted.

He refused
New Col-
ledge.

About this time a motion was made by the Committee at Oxford of removing him to New Colledge, which was now void; but as the motion began without him, so it was stifled by him, the rather, when he heard that some exception was taken above against him as being incapable of that place, because he was not a Winchester Schollar. The truth is (as he professed to some of his Friends) he rather desired a little, than a great Colledge, being one who was very much addicted to privacy, and his Book, which made him often say, That if Trinity Colledge were a competency without the Parsonage, he would not leave it for any place, except it were an Hospital: So much had he seen into the Vanity, and troublesomenesse of the world.

He is chosen to preach a Lecture in
Oxford.

In his latter dayes, journies began to be tedious to him, which occasioned some well-affected Citizens in Oxford (who were moved thereunto by a Sermon which Doctor Cheynell preached unto them) to make some overtures to him of Reading a Catechisme Lecture, or of preaching upon the Principles of Religion (which liked him best) in one of their Churches; in consideration whereof, they would maintain him an assistant at his Parsonage. The motion was good, the exercise needful, the onely question was, how such a work would be accepted in such a place amongst the Wits, and Schollars of the University; yet because he had bemoaned himself to God in private, bewailing that his comfort was little in the place where he preached, and made it his humble sute that God would not lay him aside, but finde some employment for him, whilst he had ability to perform it: because (I say) he had prayed thus, and this motion presently ensued, he durst not reject it, but set upon the work, wherein the Lord assisted, giving him strength even beyond what could be expected from a man of his age, and caused his labours to find great acceptance with his Auditors; and thus he continued preaching once every Sabbath at his Parsonage, and once in the week this Lecture: besides which, he preached when his turn came in the University, and that both in English, and in Latine also. Yet we are not come to the end of his Labours; for having now freed himself from worldly Affairs, disposed of all his children, and having left himself nothing else to do, but to prepare himself, and his wife, for their graves, who had lived about fifty years together, it pleased God to exercise him in this strange manner.

His wives
fore temptations.

His wife, who was born of Parents eminently pious, had been Religiously educated, and her self a constant worshipper of God all her time, who seldom rose from her prayers with dry eyes, was delivered up by God to Satans buffetings, and to such hellish temptations, and horrors of minde, as struck a grief and terrour unto all the Spectators, which occasioned him often to say, That God made it appear to all Beholders, that the best man is no more than the Lord makes him hourly. For as the receiving of Grace, so the keeping, using, the comfort and enjoyment of it, is all from him, which is not onely true in supernatural Graces, but in the gifts of Nature also; our wits, senses, phantasies, all are in Gods hand; nor are the wisest men any thing longer than he pleases to continue them so.

Note.
Mercies
mixed with Trials.

This good Woman was a sad instance of all this, whose temptations were so violent, so horrid, and withall so subtil, that they put the ablest, and most experienced men to their Wits end to answer them, and her poor self even beyond her self: Whilst she was in this perplexed Condition, sundry eminent Preachers and Professors visited her, and her Husband (who had been a happy Instrument of satisfying many others) could give her no satisfaction. One day as she was complaining that she could find no Comfort, O (saith he) What an Idol do some make of Comfort, as if their Comfort were their Christ!

In the midst of these Trials, he yet took notice of these Comforts and Mercies, That she was kept from Blaspheming the Highest (for so she she filed God) and from hurting her self, and others. 2. That this affliction awaked him and his Children; For they esteemed her the most conscientious and innocent amongst them all. 3. It put him upon more Work than his Age could well bear, that so he might call out his thoughts upon business, and not eat up his own Heart with grief and care. And lastly, it wrought in him an holy despair of all Creature-Comforts; for now he could neither enjoy Child, nor Friend, nor Food, nor Sleep, having her continually before him in his Eye, Ear, and Heart, and all Friends fearing to come in sight, lest they should wound themselves, or trouble her; only continual Prayers were offered up for her upon all occasions, which gave hopes that the Lord might yet make her End comfortable, and Conquest glorious.

However (her Husband would often say) That the difference was not great, whether Comfort came at Death, or an hour after, since Comfort would come assuredly. But leaving her under a general expectation of a blessed Issue in the best time, we return once more to her Husband now ready to enter into his Haven of Rest.

After a long and laborious Life, which could not but be painful to him that underwent it, we come at length to his last, long, and painful sickness, which is the usual Harbinger of Death.

In the Summer he began to droop, and finding his decay, he sent for two Physicians [Dr. Bathurst, and Dr. Willis] who were well known to him and his, by former experiences, and eminently known in the University; to whom he professed, that he used means meerly in obedience to God, but for his own part he could live and durst die. His Physicians (as himself confessed) had proceeded so far as Art, and Learning could carry them, but herein they would lose of their worth, that they had to deal with complicated Diseases, which were seldom removed, but most of all with old Age, a disease which was never cured. His first encounter was with a vehement Pleuritical pain in his left side, which was attended with a Fever, as also with a great defluxion of Rheume, and oppression of his Lungs with Flegme, and when after divers weeks, all these his Assailants seemed well-nigh vanquished through the tender care of his skillful Physicians, yet then that Enemy which had so long lodged in his Bosome, brake forth into an Empyema, which he expectorated daily in so great a measure, for the space of two moneths or more, that hereby (together with some fits of his old diseases, the Stone and Strangury) he was not able to speak much to those that visited him.

His last Sickness.

His Diseases.

And herein indeed, it fell out according to what he had often foretold, in his best strength, viz. That little was to be expected from him on his Death-bed, which occasioned him to write (fearing that his Tongue might not then be able to utter it) his Advice and Council to his Family many Years before his Death. The truth is, he the rather forbore to speak, because he perceived that some had a design to make his speeches publick, which he was utterly averse to, neither would he consent that any thing of his Life or Death should be written: Nay, he could never be perswaded at any time to sit, that his Picture might be drawn; so desirous was he, that all of him might be buried with him. And albeit he spit up those Lungs which he had wasted in the Pulpit, yet could not that light of Grace be so smothered under a Bushel, but that oft-times, the Beams thereof would shine forth, and himself would breath forth himself in pithy Speeches and savoury Discourses.

His Humility.

In the beginning of his sickness, being desired to admit of Company, he answered, I am alone in Company, its all due to me to be left alone, or to have Friends with me; my work is now to arm my self for Death which assaileth me, and I apply my self (as I am able) for that great encounter. And accordingly he spent his whole time in Meditation, Prayer, and reading the holy Scriptures, especially the Book of Psalms, the Prophecie of Isaiah, and St. Johns Gospel, taking exceeding delight in the 10, 14, 15, 16, and 17, Chapters of that Evangelist.

After which time his nights were long, and sleeps short; and when he could neither sleep nor sit up in his bed to read, his manner was to command others to read to him, and then himself would collect the most useful things that were contained in the Chapter, explaining such things as were difficult, and sweetly feeding upon the rest.

His constant practice was, to exhort such as either visited, or attended upon him, above all things to get Faith. It is (saith he) your Victory, your Peace, your Life, your Crown, and your chief piece of spiritual Armour:—Howbeit, get on all the other pieces, and then go forth in the Lords might, Stand to the fight, and the issue shall be glorious; onely forget not to call in the help of your General: Do all from him, and under him.

On the Lords dayes, he would not hinder any from the publick Ordinances, for any thing that was to be done about him, till Sermons were ended, and then he would say, Come, what have you for me? (meaning something of Repetition) unto which he would attend with such diligence, as that he would summe up the heads of every Sermon, and say, O what excellent Truths are these! lay them up charily, you will have need of them.

When Friends came to visit him, he used to say, I cannot speak, but I can hear: And when he was asked where his comfort lay? His answer was, In Christ, and in the free Grace of God: One telling him, Sir, you may take much comfort in your labours, you have done much good, &c. His answer was, All is nothing without a Saviour; without him my best works would condemn me. Oh, I am ashamed of them, being mixed with so much sin! Oh, I am an unprofitable servant, I have not done any thing for God as I ought; loss of time sits heavy upon my spirit. Work, work apace; assure your selves, nothing will more trouble you when you come to dye, than that you have done no more for God who hath done so much for you.

Sometimes he used thus to breath out himself, I never in all my life saw the worth of a Christ, nor tasted the sweetness of Gods love in that measure as now I do. When he was asked what should be done for him? His answer was, Do not onely pray for me, but praise God, for his unspeakable mercy unto me, and in particular that he hath kept Satan from me in this my weakness. Oh how good is God, entertain good thoughts of him. How ever it be with us, we cannot think too well of him, or too bad of our selves.

And this sense of Gods goodness was very deeply imprinted upon his heart to his very last; and therefore in all his Wills, this Legacy was alwayes renewed, Item, I bequeath to all my children, and to their childrens children, to each of them a Bible, with this Inscription, None but Christ. Being upon a time visited by two Reverend Doctors, his choice Friends, who before they prayed with him, desired him to tell them what he chiefly requested: He answered, I praise God he supports me, and keeps off Satan; beg that I may hold out: I am now in a good way home, even quite spent: I am now at the shore, I leave you tossing on the Sea. Oh, it is a good time to dye in: Yet when his end approached nearer, being often asked how he did? He answered, In no great pain (I praise God) onely weary of my unuseful life. If God hath no more service for me to do here, I could be gladly in Heaven, where I shall serve him better, freed from sin and distractions. I pass from one death to another, yet I fear none; I praise God I can live, and I dare dye. If God hath more work for me to do here, I am willing to do it, though my infirm body be very weary.

Desiring one to pray with him, and for him, that God would hasten the work, it was asked whether pain, &c. put him upon that desire? He answered No, but I now do no good, and I hinder others, which might be better employed, played, if I were not: Why should any desire to live but to do God service? Now I cease from that, I do not live.

Note.

By this time the violence of his distempers disabled him, and the advice of his Physicians was, that he should forbear speech, yet he called upon those which attended him, to read some part of the Scriptures to him constantly; especially he put one of his Sons that was with him, to pray frequently, and whilst his life and speech lasted, he used to conclude all the Prayers with a loud, Amen.

The nearer he approached to his end, the more he slumbered. Once when he awoke, he found himself very ill; whereupon calling for his Son, he took him by the hand, and said, Pray with me; It is the last time in likelihood that I shall ever joyn with you; and complaining to him of his wearisomeness, his Son answered, There remains a rest: To whom he replied, My Sabbath is not far off, and yours is at hand, ere that, I shall be rid of all my trouble, and you will be eased of some.

At length his ruinous house (which onely in obedience to the will of God had held out beyond his own desires, and all mens expectations, from the height of Summer till the depth of Winter) comes to be dissolved. About Saturday in the Even, he began to set himself to dye, forbidding all cordials to be administred upon what extremity soever, and gave his dying blessing to his Son (who onely of all his children was present with him) and (upon his request) enjoined him to signifie, when he had opportunity, to that Country where he had lived longest, that he lived and dyed in that Faith which he had preached and printed; the comfort whereof he now found. Something else he began to speak, but his distempers interrupted his purpose, and from that time he never entertained any discourse with man, onely he commanded the eighth Chapter of the Epistle to the Romans to be read to him. And herein God was exceeding good to him, in the return of those Petitions which had been put up for him that afternoon, by those two eminent Divines, and his dearest Brethren before mentioned: For whereas his great distempers gave occasion to fear his death would be exceeding painful, yet did it prove so easie, that his Son, and other attendants, could but guess at the particular time of his departure: His breathings were easie, and even, his eyes open, and full of water, till at the last (having lifted them up towards Heaven) they closed of themselves, and his soul, without the least motion of resistance of the Body, entred into everlasting rest, whilst those whom he left behind, were entring upon the day of their rest. For then began he a perpetual Sabbath in Heaven, when they began theirs on earth, betwixt twelve and one on Saturday night, December 11. Anno Christi, 1658.

His Prudence.

He dyed in a good old age, and full of dayes, having over-lived four-score years: His loss was much bewayled by the Colledge, by the City, and whole Univerfity of Oxford. He was (as all that knew him confessed) a man of admirable prudence, profound judgement, eminent gifts and graces, and furnished with all qualifications that might render him a compleat man; a wise Governour, a profitable Preacher, and a good Christian.

His Death.

First, look upon him as a Christian, for that was his, and is every mans greatest Ornament. He was a man that had much acquaintance with God, much communion with him in private meditation and prayer, accounting those his best dayes wherein he enjoyed most converse with him.

In the time of his sickness, one asking him how he did? Oh (saith he) this hath been a sweet day, I have had sweet communion with God in Jesus Christ. He was not like them who are all for promises and priviledges, though in the mean time they neglect duties: He made them his exercise, but not his Christ: He was much in those severer parts of Religion, as private Humiliation, Mortification, and Self-denial, whereby he gained the Conquest over himself. The truth is, he was (as far as is consistent with humane frailty) Master of his corruptions, passions, reason, appetite, language, and all. T t z The

Conversion

The Lord was pleased to work upon him in the Primrose of his Life, though he certainly knew not, either the Preacher or Sermon whereby he was converted. His course was in the days of his strictest Examination, to set down in writing his Evidences for Heaven, sometimes in Propositions from Scripture; other sometimes in Sylogismes, and these he often Subscribed to, in a Book that he kept for that purpose. But these Evidences, were best read by others in the course of his Life, by his exact walking with God in Piety, Charity, Humility, Patience, and Dependence upon him. He was far unlike to those who sit in Moses Chair, and teach what themselves practise not. He had well digested that Fathers Precept to Preachers, Either Preach not at all, or live as you Preach. His Life was a Commentary upon his Doctrine, and his Practice, the Counterpane of his Sermons. What was said of that precious Bishop Jewel, was true of him, That he adorned a heavenly Doctrine, with a heavenly Life. In a word, he did vertere verba in opera, he lived Religion, whilst many only make it the Subject of their discourse. He was much more than he seemed to be, not loving to make a noise in the world, but accounting it better to do, than to speak.

Note.

His Charity.

In his Works of Charity to the Poor, he was no less discreet, than private. When he met with fit Objects, his Hands was more ready to give, than his Tongue to proclaim it. Indeed he was no Friend to Idle, Lazy, Canting Persons, who live on the sweat of other mens Brows. These he looked upon as the Pests of the Commonwealth, nor could he think it Charity to relieve such to the prejudice of the publick, and to their own destruction. But Gods Poor, and the Hosbould of Faith lay neer his Heart. Whosoever shall survey his large Bills of weekly, and quarterly allowances (besides considerable Sums given to the poor Ministers, and especially to their Widows and Orphans, who never knew whence it came) and shall add thereunto, his Legacies bequeathed in his Will to charitable Uses, cannot (whatever others thought of him) but judge, that his Charity exceeded the ordinary proportion of his Revenues. Naturally he was of a stout and masculine Temper, yet through Grace, he attained to a great measure of Humility: He was mean, and low, in his own Eyes, and had more undervaluing Thoughts of himself, than all the World besides had of him. He was very sensible of that Enemy, which he often complained of, viz. Discouragement, which he used to stile, The child of Pride and Unbelief. It must needs be acknowledged a great measure of Humility, that could keep a man lowly under such Abilities, Attainments, and such general Applauses as he met with in every place. His usual saying was, That he valued no man for his Gifts, but for his Humility under them: Neither should he expect much from any man, were his Parts never so great, till he was broken with Afflictions and Temptations.

His Humility.

His pithy
Speeches.

It was his Observation, That the humblest Preachers converted most Souls, not the choicest Schollars, whilst unbroken. He would sometimes use this speech, which though a seeming Contradiction, yet hath it much Truth in it, It is better to be an humble Devil, than a proud Angel. He never affected popular Applause, variety of Pulpits, Printing, &c. as one conscious to himself of, I know not what unworthiness; neither ever came he thus abroad, but when by importunity he was haled to it.

His Temperance.

2. Consider him as a man in his Morals, whether in the Government of himself in particular, or of his Family, or his greater Trusts; and in all you shall find him like himself, excellent, and almost without a Parallel.

In regard of Himself, he was exactly Temperate, confining himself to Hours for Diet, Sleep, &c. He would often say, That he would rather pour Liquor into his Boots, than into his Mouth between meals. He was a strict observer

ver of those Laws of Sobriety, which St. Paul had pressed upon Ministers, and which himself in his Drunkards Cup had taught others. He used to eat seasonably and sparingly, which (without question) was one great means of preserving such vigorous Spirits to so great an Age: His only play-time was Saturdays in the afternoon; then he used to unbend, and disburden himself by some innocent Recreations, but only ad Ruborem. He was a man of an excellent Deportment, and sweet Behaviour, whereby he won much upon all with whom he Converſed. Grave he was without affectation, pleasant without levity: Indeed he never loved to hear himself Talk, and therefore by some was judged too reserved; but when he knew with whom he had to do, he was communicative enough. No man was more Candid, or fuller of Civility; none more open or free to entertain or return Discourses. He was very cautious before he struck a League of intimate friendship with any man; but when he had once chosen, he was Cordial, Firm, and Constant, his Head, Hand, Tongue, Pen, Feet, Purse, all, were now no longer his own but his Friends. It is said of the French, that whatsoever cloaths they wear, whatsoever Garb they accost you in, becomes them so well, as if nothing else did; and a great Crick in men as well as in Books, used to say of our Doctor, that whatsoever he did or spake, became him.

Mr. R. M.

It was a rare thing to see him angry. If at any time the folly of others had discomposed him, or their sin had provoked him, yet could he quickly command himself, and convert his passion into wholesome instruction.

His Patience.

Though himself had great parts, both natural, and acquired, yet would he never sleight or undervalue, much less contemn, or discourage any whom he judged to be right in the main. He was very sparing in his censures of others, gentle to all, and severe onely to himself.

Humility.

He had a special gift of forgetting injuries, but would offer none. His Memory was never more faithfull than in retaining Civilities received, to which he would industriously make what proportionable returns lay in his power. He much feared lest he should give any occasion of suspicion that he either forgot, or neglected any, because he could not readily recall mens names, which occasioned him to say, That if he lived long he should forget his own name, with him in Valerius.

At meals his manner was to be sociable, and facetious; yet still he took occasion to enquire of the publick, and how it fared with particular Towns and Families, whence he would alwayes extract something for matter of Prayer or Praise in his Thanksgiving after meat.

Prudence.

In his Family he had that qualification of a good Bishop mentioned by the Apostle, That ruled well his own house. He had an excellent method in the education of his Children, which was this:

Family Government.

In general, his care was to maintain his authority over them, yet even that authority was equally tempered with lenity and gravity. He loved them without fondness, and ruled them without rigour. In particular, so soon as they could use their Tongues, they were made acquainted with the Historical part of the Scriptures. As soon as they could use their legs, they were set to School, and when they could remember any thing of a Chapter read, or bring home any part of a Sermon, his care was to instruct them in the Fundamentals of Religion. Their childehood being past, he would call upon them for the practice of Religion, and was a diligent observer of their private performance of Religious exercises, wherein their Mother was no small help to him.

When they grew up to more maturity, he diligently observed their capacities, inclinations, but especially their constitutions, when he could guess at that sin which was like to prove their destructum delictum, their darling Corruption, he accordingly suited their Callings, so as that sin might be least nourished, and most beaten down. The Rule which he gave them, was this, When you are

His Advice to his Children.

are youths, chuse your Callings; when men, chuse your wives, only take me along with you: It may be, old men may see further than you. Thus whilst he Condescended to them, and they submitted to him, both parties were gratified.

Though he had a numerous issue, yet (through Gods blessing upon his estate) he disposed of them to no mean imployments. Many he sent to the Universities; some to Merchandise, &c. To his Sons whom he bred in the University, his Rule was, Study work, more than wages: To those whom he bred in the City, he would say, Do not waste a half-penny, and you will not want a penny. And truly so well did they all improve, as his advice, so their own time and parts, that they became Masters of their particular Callings, which Ministred unto him no small comfort. He acknowledged it a great mercy to his dying day, that none of his children were blemished, either in their bodies, or in their reputations. He was one of them in whose children that Popish slander concerning the ungraciousness of the children of the married Clergy, received a real confutation.

Gods Blessing upon his Children.

Many of his Sons he buried in their prime, some at home, others in foreign parts, and some dyed shortly after himself, yet all of them gave comfortable hopes to conclude upon a rational charity (both by the pious Letters of those which dyed abroad, and from that particular account which they gave of themselves who dyed at home) that they all meet in Heaven; they which survive need not this attestation. Amongst the dead, there was Master Thomas Harris of Magdalen Colledge in Oxford, who was eminently learned beyond his age, an Ornament to that Noble Foundation, whereof he was a member; once the joy of his friends, and still their sorrow; and probably this arrow from Gods hand struck deep in the Fathers heart to his dying day.

His Servants Gods
Servants.

For his servants, there are some yet living that served him in his younger dayes, who still bless God that ever they came under his roof, where they received the beginnings of Grace, and such a measure of knowledge as kept them from warping in the late giddy times.

His good Government in the Colledge.

Whilst he remained with his antient Flock, his Constant manner was, to keep a Religious Fast before his administration of the Sacrament of the Lords Supper. And after he came to his small Colledge, he so prudently managed all his affairs, that he was both feared, and loved. Indeed his Government there was such as caused a wonder: For whereas that Colledge before, was famous for factions; during his time, there was never any complaint made to any Visitors; and no marvel, for the Foundation there, honoured him as a Father, and he looked upon, and loved them as his Children, and accordingly he sealed up his love to them in his last Will and Testament.

He called Gifts, Bribery, and hated the very shadow of it. Examples are known in the Colledge of Gratuities, refused long after fair and free Elections.

His great Learning.

But look upon him as a Schollar, and there we have him in his proper Element. Though he left the University early, and preached constantly, yet being of a retired disposition, a constant student, and endowed with great parts, he became Master of all manner of Learning to qualifie a Divine. In the sacred Languages, especially in the Hebrew, he was very exact.

His Conciones ad Clerum, declare him to have been a pure and Polite Latinist: His first, which was preached and printed long since, hath undergone the test, and gained the approbation of all knowing men in that Language; the younger by full forty years, is of as good a Complexion, and of as Vigorous a Constitution as its elder Brother; and its hoped that in due time it may be made as publick.

What his abilities in Disputations were, hath upon several occasions been made to appear in that Colledge-Exercises in the Chappel, where oft-times in the unexpected absence of the Opponents, himself would ex tempore take up the Cudgels, and make good their ground. In which Exercises he approved himself a subtle, clear, and ready Disputant, without any grains of allowance either for his age or discontinuance. A good Disputant.

Indeed his chiefest Learning lay, where he made least shew of it in publick, viz. in Chronology, Church-History, Councils, Case-Divinity, and his insight into the Fathers. But his parts were best seen in the Pulpit. His gifts in Prayer were much more than ordinary, wherein his affections were warm, and fervent, his Petitions pithy and substantial, his Language pertinent, unaffected, and without Tautologies. Oh, how would he raise up a dull and sinking spirit! How would he warm a cold and frozen heart! How would he carry a man out of himself, and by degrees mount the soul heavenward. His fervent Prayers.

His Sermons in Print are well known to the world, and his Works praise him in the Gates. The particular excellencies of Nozianzen, Basil, Chrysostome, Austin, Ambrose, Bernard, seemed all to concenter in him. He taught Rhetorick to speak in our Mother-tongue, and (without falshood, or flattery) he may be stiled, The English Orator. His Doctrines carried light with them, and his Ules heat: His Reproofs were weighty, and his Exhortations powerful. But enough of this, lest we hear as he did who spake much in commendation of Hercules, Quis unquam vituperavit? who ever dispraised him? yea, what either Christian or Schollar, but approved, or commended him? If you would know the worth of his Sermons, read them (though read, they come short of what they were when preached) yea read them again, and again, endeavour to read them with the same spirit they were preached, and you cannot but acknowledge an excellency in them. An excellent Preacher.

Amongst other his excellencies in preaching, which were many, these were not the least, that he could so cook his meat that he could make it relish to every palate: He could dress a plain discourse, so as that all sorts should be delighted with it. He could preach with a learned plainness; and had learned to conceal his Art. He had clear Notions of high Mysteries, and proper language to make them stoop to the meanest capacity.

His way in contriving and penning his Sermons was this:

1. He so contrived the parts of his Text, and points of Doctrine, as might afford him most scope in his Application, wherein his, and indeed, a Sermons excellency doth consist; and therefore he used to say, That in a Sermon, he contrived the Ules first: He did often handle the same Texts, and the same Points, and yet still would pen new Applications, which might be most suitable to the quality and condition of the Auditory. His method in Preaching.

2. In penning, when he once began, he would never take Pen from paper, nor turn to any Book till he had written all. All his younger dayes, for about twenty years together, he wrought all, and could without much difficulty preach the same verbatim. He was wont to say, That he had a fluid, and waterish Memory. I can (said he) quickly remember any thing of my own, and as quickly forget it again. Yet questionless his Memory was vast and tenacious; for though sometimes he had but short Notes in his Bible, and that but seldome, yet did he never use them, except when he preached a Clerus of late years, in which he sometimes glanced upon his Papers. His custome was, presently after he had heard a Sermon, to write down the heads thereof, and he scarce either forgot, or misplaced any of them. Upon Fast-nights he would by the strength of his Memory repeat two, sometimes three Sermons that he had heard that day, in the same order as they were delivered. His strong Memory.

Speaking

Speaking with a Friend about Memories, he said, That his Memory never failed him: For (said he) I durst never trust it.

He used to say, that a Preacher had three Books to study, 1. The Bible. 2. Himself. 3. The People.

He looked much to the Ordinance, and Relation between Pastor, and People, and would say, That preaching to them was but one part of the Pastors Duty. He was to live and dye in them, as well as for, and with them.

What Sermons are best.

He complained much of some mens too large insisting upon the Doctrinal parts of their Point, whereby they left little or no room for Application; and found that few, either in the Cities or Universities, bended themselves to enlarge upon their Uses, which made their Sermons to differ little from Divinity Lectures; and though all Preachers could not enlarge themselves therein, yet he would often call upon them to accustom themselves to it, as being most profitable. He would relate a passage of Master Dods concerning Master Cartwright (who often in his dayes preached occasionally at Hanwell) He thoughts (said Master Dod) when I heard the Doctrinal part of his Sermon, I was in heaven: but when he came to apply it, I sometimes thought that if I had been in his place, I could presently have applied his Point more closely. Non omnia possumus omnes.

His advice to young Preachers.

Many young Preachers resorted to Doctor Harris for Counsell, both for direction in their private studies, and in their Sermons; and he used to perswade them, for many reasons, to pen largely, and to keep their Notes for all emergent occasions, often commending Master Dods words, who professed, That he would rather preach an old Sermon ten times, than speak any thing new without preparation. He would say, that he would have a Preacher to exceed himself upon just occasion, and not alwayes to keep the same pace, yet did not that alwayes hold in his own practice; for generally his hearers commended those Sermons most, which cost him least, and himself would say, That he never came off with less comfort, and worse content to himself, than when he was in appearance best provided: and he gave this reason for it, Not because he had used such diligence in preparing (for that was his duty) but because he was then aptest to depend upon himself, and to neglect his dependance upon God.

His advice about Books.

Many sought to him for advice in choosing Divinity Books, to whom he would open himself freely. Some he perswaded to read Ames his Medulla, Tileni Syntagma, Bucanus, and such like. To some others, he would commend Aquinas his Summes (which Doctor John Reynolds used to call That absolute Body of Divinity) Melchior Canus, and of late, Master Bowels his Pastor Evangelicus. But above all, he would call upon every one to read the Text in the Originals, and to Analyse Chapters. This he perswaded Master Femble to, and set him to practice it in the Book of the Preacher, or Ecclesiastes (which he accounted a very hard Book, till he met with that brief, but pithy Exposition, of that incomparable Divine, Dr. Edward Reynolds) & after that upon Zachary. When any consulted with him about Writers, he would ask what they aimed at in a Writer, for several men had their several excellencies. For acuteness he used to commend Master Baines, and his second, Doctor Ames, Master John Ball, Master Capel, &c. If they aimed at the spiritual part of Divinity, he would leave them to Doctor Sibbs: If the rational, to Doctor Preston: If the Historical, to Bishop Usher. For solid Preachers, he much prized Doctor Sandersons first Works (to his latter he was a meer stranger) Master Randal, Master Hildersam, Doctor Rainolds, &c. And for all the requisites for a Preacher, both for method, matter, Elocution, pronounciation, all, he would often say, that he seldom met with an abler man than his Brother Whately of Banbury.

His judgement of Master Calvin.

When his judgement was asked about Commentators, he used to answer, that he was now more of Doctor John Reynolds his minde than ever concerning Master Calvin; for upon experience (said he) I finde, that the most of the late Writers do but descant upon his plain Song; and the Jesuits are very Plagiaries; who first Rob him, and then rail upon him.

Next

Next to Calvin he used to commend sundry late Writers, as Paynus, Rivet, Master Caywright especially, together with some Papish Writers, as Mal-donate (whose wit, and learning he preferred before his spirit) before him, Learned Masius, modest Ribera, and (for ought he found by him) honest Estius. And being asked about the best Editions, his answer was, that what was said of Homer, was true of the Fathers, and the first Papish Writers, viz. That was ever the best which was least corrected. Of the Antient Fathers he would say, That unless it were for their Polemical and Historical parts, their Writings were more for Devotion and Affection, than for their judgement and understanding.

And of other Writers.

About modern Authors this was his opinion generally; That what English men did ex professo undertake, they did best perform it. No men excel them in expounding Scriptures, in answering Papists, Arminians, &c. None equal to them in the Pulpit, or in Practical, or Case-Divinity. And he held Cambridge very happy in her Whitakers, Downams, Davnant, Perkins, besides many others. And for Oxford, he would lay one John Reynolds (to pass in silence a younger Reynolds, and his son in Law, born a School-man) in the ballance with hundreds, as a man never sufficiently admired for his Humility, as well as for his Learning.

For the Schoolmen he liked many things in them, but not their awkward, and ignorant quoting of Scripture, nor their multiplying of useless questions, with needless obscurities.

For Lutherans, he commended divers of them for their learning and industry, but disliked their tartness.

For Arminius (though he were none of the best) yet he liked him better than his Disciples and Successors, who were more desperate and dangerous in the five controverted Points, than many of the Papists.

As for Socinianism, he accounted it to be but a kind of blancht Mahometisme. And this he observed in general, that those Papists who were most conversant in the Scriptures, come nearest to us; the like he said of the Lutherans, as Chemnitius, Gerard, Hemingsius, &c.

He was sparing to deliver his judgement about our condition at home, yet some things lay sadly upon his spirit; as,

His judgement of our times.

1. He complained that the power of Godliness, and exercise of Love, and Self-denial, were much abated in these latter dayes; and he much bewailed the vast difference, both in garb and practice, betwixt new and old Professors.

2. That the Indulgence that was shewed to tender Consciences, was much abused to prophaneſs, whilst men of no Conscience most pleaded that liberty of choosing their own Churches, and Teachers; and indeed, on the matter abandoned all.

3. That the liberty of Propheſying which some pretended to, was abused to meer licentiousness and confusion, whilst some would have none, and others all Prophets and Preachers.

4. That in the University few could be called constant Students, but the most made a short work of it, and posted into the pulpit before they understood their grounds, so that few were able to encounter our growing Errours.

5. That the Church-men were in their extreams, some pressing nothing but Law, others preaching nothing but the Gospel, and Christ.

6. He complained of the want of Catechizing, and instructing youth in the Principles, the want of which, he saw by experience was a great occasion of the peoples giddiness.

7. But most of all he bewailed the readiness of many to side, and make divisions. He loved not either to use, or to hear used, dividing names, and titles, upon which occasion he often related Master Greenham answer to the Lord Treasurer Cecil, who being asked on which side the blame lay in that great rent between the Bishops, and their Antagonists, answered, That the fault was on both sides, and in neither side: For (said he) the godly wise on both side bear with each other, and center in the main; but then there be selfish, peevish spirits, on both sides some, and these be they that make the quarrel.

This he applied to our times by reason of the distinction of Presbyterians, and Independents, saying, Men of humble, and sincere hearts, though differing in opinion, can, and do walk together, pray together, and love one another; but men who wholly look at their own interests, blow the coals, and make a stir, as if the opinions were irreconcilable, and as every one was disaffected to Christs cause that goes not their pace and path.

He professed freely, that for his own part he was not convinced of some things that were earnestly pressed about Church Government: He did not Conceive any one external form to be so Essential to a Church, but that it might still deserve that name, though under a Presbyterian, or Independent, or Episcopal form, so long as it was kept within the bounds of those general Rules laid down in the Scriptures. Its true, some of these had been abused to Tyranny, and the rest might in time be abused also; But the use and abuse of things are far different, and he would not commend either the one, or the other in their rigid exactions in some cases.

For Presbytery, though he thought that Bishop Bilson could never (with all his learning) disprove the being of Lay-Elders in the Apostles times, yet he thought withall, that it was not so easie a thing to prove the perpetuity of such an Ordinance to the worlds end, especially so cloathed and attended with all those perquisites which some heretofore called for. He thought that there was some reason in the distinction of Jure Humano, and Juris Humani, what ever his application was who first used it: But for the thing it self, sith it is not altogether disproved, but allowed, yea once commanded, and not since retracted (for ought he knew) he saw no reason why any man should, co nomine, be asperfed, because a Presbyterian, by any dissenting Brethren.

About Independency

For the other of Independency, he confessed that it was a Politick way, and free from much trouble, and opposition: For who shall oppose the Minister, when all are of his minde before they are admitted? yet could he never satisfie himself (though upon occasion he often desired it) in some particulars; As,

1. What warrant men have to take out of anothers Flock, his best Sheep, and to entertain them without his Consent, or Testimony. He asks, whether any man would willingly be so served? Whether this would not open a gap, that so soon as a Member is offended with his own Pastor (happily upon deserved reproof) presently to fly to another Congregation.

2. To leave the cullen sheep in a hard condition: For how shall they be looked upon? The answer must needs be, little better than Heathens: For the Minister may Preach to such, and what more may he do to these, when the chief are gone?

3. This way seemed to him, to be very destructive to that relation between Pastor and People.

4. He conceived, this way of gathering of Churches, into private places, and companies, to be prejudicial to the publick Worship of God: Experience declaring, that in many places of late, the publick Ordinances are grown into dis-use, preaching only excepted, which might be afforded to Canibals if they would hear.

5. Lastly, For Congregations, to consist of Members at such a distance, as that one should live in the North, and another in the South, &c. many miles asunder, whereby inspection cannot be performed on the Pastors part; and on the Peoples part, they can enjoy little Communion and Edification one from another, this (he used to say) that he did not understand, nor could he find any Precept for it in the Word, nor any President or Practice of it in Antiquity, if we speak Speak of Churches constituted, and out of Persecution, Banishment, &c. These things he neither wrote, nor spake, but with much Fear, and Grief.

Amongst other things, he did very much bewail the great sleighting of solemn Ordination of Ministers, the Office being so Sacred, the work of the Ministry so important, and the Minister, of so publick Concernment. He wondred that when, as in all other Offices, there is such Solemnities at the Officers Instalments, that a Minister, and Ambassador of Jesus Christ should be silently admitted without Fasting, Prayer, and some publick Solemnity.

About Ordination of Ministers.

As to private passages, it were endless to Write all his Observations: only take these few.

He observed, that such as often changed their Principles, and Faith professed, usually fell from Scepticism to Atheism.

That so much Humility as any man had, so much Grace, and Worth he had, and no more.

His excellent Speeches.

That nothing was to be accounted good in, or to any man, but that which was his proper Fruit, and done by vertue of his Calling, from a Principle of God, and for God.

That the best man, hath no security from any one Sin, or Fall, or Temptation, any further, or longer, than he was held up by Gods Hand, and Christs Mediation.

That God doth oftentimes leave us to own Satans suggestions for our own, because we do not own God in his holy motions, and breathings.

That its just with God, to deny us the comfort of our Graces, when we deny him the Glory of them.

In himself he observed, that what he forgot in the Week, would unseasonably press in on the Sabbath; so that he could, if he durst, contrive more worldly business on the Sabbath, than he could dispatch all the Week.

That he found no greater enemy than discouragement, which he called, The childe of pride and unbelief.

He used to say, that some duties which were oft in mens mouths, he found very difficult to him: As

1. To deny himself in all his Sells, was a work to be learning whilst he lived.

2. To live only by Faith, and a bare Promise without a pawn, is a great Work.

3. To give all to free Grace, and to Christ alone, is a mighty Work.

4. To love where we meet with unlovingness, and contempt, is no easie matter.

5. To do ones proper Work without some present Pay, and Countenance from God and Man, is a hard Task.

6. That its far harder to adopt others Comforts, than their Sorrows, and to hold ones self Exalted in anothers exaltation.

7. That to die in cold Blood, and to be active in it, as an Act of Obedience, is the Work of a Christian.

In his sickness he would occasionally vent himself thus:

Its a hard thing to think ill of our selves, and well of God at the same time.

Its a hard thing for a Saint to forgive himself some Faults, when God hath forgiven them.

Its hard to think holy Thoughts long, and to confine them to anothers Prayers.

We know but little of Christs Love, till all be perfected, and spread before us in Heaven.

For his Children he referred them to an old Will, which he had made, Anno Christi 1636. when they were many, and small, which because it may be of use to many others, its here inserted.

The Advice and Counsel of Dr. Harris to his Family, annexed to a Will made by him, Anno Christi 1636.

To my dear Wife and Children;

My dear Selfs, I know not what leasure I shall have to speak unto you at my Death, and I am not, you know, very free in speech, especially in Sickness and Sadness, and therefore now I will speak my heart to you, and I would have you to hear me speaking whilst you live, in this my Writing which I divide amongst you all.

First for you, my dear Wife, you shall find the substance of that I would say to you, printed to your hand in the Book of Martyrs, Vol. 2. p. 1744. to Wit, in John Careless his Letter to his Wife; keep the Book, and often read the Letter; only one thing I add, if you marry again, remember your own observation, viz. That second Husbands are very Uxorious, second Wives very prevalent, and therefore take heed that you do no ill Office in estranging your Husband from his Natural Children or Kindred; you shall thereby draw upon him a great Sin and judgment, if you kill in him natural affections: I have said, and do with all the strength and power that is in me, thank you for your Faithfulness, and resign you to the Husband of Husbands, the Lord Christ.

Now my poor Children, let me pour out my Heart to you, and speak to your Souls first.

For your Souls.

Trifle not in the main Point; The Soul is Immortal, you have to deal with an infinite Majesty, you go upon Life and Death, therefore here be serious; do all to God in a serious manner. When you think of him, speak of him, pray to him, any way make your addresses to his great Majesty, be in good earnest, and have God, and have all.

1. More particularly, get your Pardon in Christ: It is not impossible to get it assured to you, if you will learn, 1. To deny your selves. 2. To live by Faith. 3. To understand the nature of the New Covenant. Settle your judgments in these Points, and the thing is Feasible.

2. Having gotten it, be still adding to your Evidences, and enjoy your present Assurance: Do all to God as to your Father.

Next to this, think how you and I shall endure the fight, the thought one of another at the last day, if you appear in the Old Adam; much less shall you stand before Christ, unless you shew the Image of Christ in you, and therefore never cease till you be made New Creatures, and study well what that is.

In the last place, strive for those Graces most, which concern your places and conditions, and make Head against those sins which most threaten you: As first, Hereditary Sins. I was naturally Melancholy, that is a humour that admits of any Temptation, and is capable of any Impression and Distemper: Shun as death this Humour, which will work you to all unthankfulness against God, unlovingness to Man, and unnaturalness to your selves. 2. Of your times, and habitations. 3. Of your tempers and age. 4. Of your Callings.

I have made my own Peace, my Sins shall not hurt you, if you make them not yours; you need not fear the success if you will oppose to sin; Christ is made Sanctification to you, he came to dissolve the works of Satan; he hath overcome for you, and hath made as many promises for your Sanctification, as your Justification: Gather those Promises as they be set down, especially especially in the Covenant with an Oath, Luke 1. Press these to God, 2 Cor. 7. 1.

In short, do not talk and make a noise to get a name of forward men, but do the thing; be constant in secret Duties, and a Religion in your Callings; For it is not a Name, or Notion: It is a frame of Nature, and habit of living by Divine Rule. What it is, you will then know, when you have it in Truth first, and in Power next, and not before. Only this for the present; It is that you must Live and Die by, that you must Rise and Reign by; therefore, my Children, I give you that Advice, which I gave your Brother, now with God; Be more than you seem: Do more than you talk of in point of Religion: Satisfie your own Consciences in what you do; all men you shall never satisfie; nay, some will not be satisfi'd, though they be convinced.

For your Bodies.

I was troubled with straightness of Breath and Breast, which was also Hereditary, and therefore you must fear it the more.

The Remedies are, 1. Disclaim Hereditary sins. 2. Keep Heads clean, Feet warm, and Hearts cheerful. 3. Be more frequent than I and your Brothers, in Exercise. 4. Shun late Drinking or Studying. 5. Use lighter Suppers.

For your Callings.

1. Choose well, 1. A profitable Calling for the Publick, 2. A full employment. 3. A Calling fit for your Parts and Means. It is better to be a Rich Cobler, than a Poor Merchant.

2. Use a Calling well. 1. Make it an help, not a snare to your Souls. 2. Be 1. Diligent. 2. Skilful. Any honest Calling will honour you; if thus you honour it; and therefore you may be hopeful, because my self (who had not your parts and helps) never found any thing too hard for me in my Calling, but discouragement, and unbelief.

For your Company.

Abandon all infectious, flattering, self-serving Companions; when once you have found them false, trust them no more. Sort with such as are able to do, or receive good. Solomon gives you the best Counsel for this in many places. Read the Proverbs, and remember him in this; 1. Forsake not an old Friend. 2. Be friendly, and faithful to your Friends. 3. Never trouble, or trust Friends unless there be a necessity. 4. and Lastly, be long in closing with Friends; and loath to lose them upon experience of them.

For your Marriages.

In Marriage you lay the Foundation of your present Woe, or Weal; therefore here be not rash, go not alone, yet remember Paul, 1 Cor. 7. 2. First, study whether you have a calling to Marry yea or no, and advise well of that. If none, forbear; if so, advise with Friends, before your Affections be engaged. In your Choice, 1. Aim at Grace. 2. Good nature and Education; The best Woman is not ever the best Wife. 3. Good parts of Understanding, Huswifery, &c. As for Portion, be it more or less, be upon certainties, and trust not words; and for Parentage, let not the distance be too great, lest you despise, or be despised: However be sure that the person likes not your Fancy, but your judgment.

For your Children.

Make it your chiefest work to make them, 1. Godly. 2. Useful. Bestow most of their Portions in good Education; and if Grace make no difference, do you make none in your Affections, Countenances, Portions; Partiality this way, ends in nothing else but Envy, Strangeness, &c.

For your Selves within your Selves.

My desire hath been to carry an even hand over you all, and have laboured to reduce you, as near as I could (all circumstances considered) to an equality; quality, and therefore my last request, and charge, is, that you will live together in an undivided bond of love; you are many of you, and if you joyn together as one man, you need not want any thing: what counsel, what comfort, what money, what friends may you not help your selves unto; if you will contribute your aides? Wherefore (my dear children) I pray, beseech, command, adjure you by all the Relations, and deareness that hath ever been betwixt us, that you know one another, Visite (as you may) each other, Comfort, Counsel, Relieve, succour, Help, Admonish one another. Whilst your Mother lives, meet there (if possible) yearly. When she is dead, pitch upon some other place; If it may be, your eldest Brothers house; or if you cannot meet, yet send to, and hear from one another yearly. And when you have neither Father, nor Mother, be so many Fathers and Mothers each to other: so you shall understand the blessing mentioned, Psal. 133.

For your Estates.

Be not troubled that you are below your kindred; get more Wisdome, Humility, Goodness, and you are above them; onely this do, 1. Study work more than wages. 2. Deal with your hearts to make them less: 3. Begin below. 4. Joyn together to help one another. 5. Rest upon the Promises, which are many, and precious this way. 6. Sow mercy. Take of your Mother (to this end)-- a piece: give that in works of mercy, and if all other means fail you, that shall maintain you; I know, I know I say, and I am Confident in it, that if ye will be humbled for my barrenness, and will trust God in his own way, he will make comfortable provision for you. Object no more, but trust him.

For the Publick.

Bless God that you are born English men, and bear your selves dutifully, and Conscionably towards Authority. See God in the Magistrate, and hold Order a precious thing: And for the Church, neither set her above her Husband Christ, nor below her Children; give her that honour, obedience, and respect that is her due; and if you will be my Children, and heirs of my comfort in my dying age, be neither Authors, nor Fautors of any, either faction, or novelty. Its true, this is not a rising way, but it is a free, fair, comfortable way for a man to follow his own Judgement, without warping to either hand. Perhaps you may hear variety of judgements touching my walk, when I sleep in silence; some taxing me for too much, some for too little Conformity; but be not ye troubled: I did what in my Circumstances seemed best to me, for the present; Howsoever the event hath not in some points answered expectation, yet I have learned to measure things by another rule than events, and satisfie my self in this, that I did all for the best, as I thought. Sure I am, my Saviour Christ is perfect, and never failed so much as in Circumstance. To him I commit your Souls, Bodies, Estates, Names, Lives, Deaths, All; and my self waiting when he shall change my vile body, and make it glorious like unto his own, Amen. Even so come Lord Jesus, Amen.

On

On the Memory of that Famous and Godly Minister, Dr. Robert Harris, my late Worthy Friend.

AS once Elias in John Baptist came Back to the Jews, in that Tryumphant flame
Of Light and Zeal, wherein he did before
Without Deaths help up into Glory soar;
And by this Transmigration of his Grace,
Prepared paths before his masters face:
Even so in thee (blest Soul) did breath anew
Great Chrysostom, yea great Apollos too;
To thee those mighty Orators did give
Their Tongues to speak, to thee their life to Live:
Nay, thou thy self didst in thy self renew,
Thy Fort's vigour in Fourscore; we knew
When all thy strength decay'd, thy Gifts did thrive;
The man is dead, the Preacher still alive;
Alive in his own sermons, in our love,
His Name alive below, his Soul above.
And may the younger Prophets still inherit
A double Portion of the Fathers Spirit;
That by a sacred Metempsychosis,
The gifts may now be theirs, which once were his;
That every Sermon which we hear, may be (Rare Preacher) a true Portraiture of thee;
Yea, may it of each following Age be true,
The former are exceeded by the new;
Visions of young surpass old Prophets dreams,
The Fathers Light's out-shin'd by Childrens beams,
That in their measures we may more, and more,
Th' unmeasur'd fulness of our Lord adore.

The Life of Gustavus Ericson, King of Sweden,
whod yed Anno Christi 1562.

IN the dayes of Christian the Second, King of Denmark (who also laid claim to the Crown of Sweden) after the decease of Swanto, the Lords of Sweden chose Steno Stur to be their Governor, against whom Gustavus, Archbishop of Upsal opposed himself, loving his place, more than his Country; and being Crossed in his Expectation, he promotes the interest of Christian of Denmark, who to set forward his claim to the Crown of Sweden, spent one year in the pursuit thereof by force of Arms, but effected little. Nor did the Archbishop of Upsal get ought in Denmark, who saw that he played his own game, nor could he escape the seizure of his Temporalities in Sweden, for his treachery against his native Country; whereupon, the year following, he obtained the Popes sentence of Excommunication against the Governour of Sweden, and all his partakers, for invading the Rights of his Church and Bishoprick; and hereupon the King of Denmark takes courage to invade Sweden once more with an Army under his General, who in a Battel overthrew the Swedes, and wounded Steno their Governour, who thereupon retired to Stockholm (the Regal City) and unto him repaired all such as intended to adventure their all, in the defence of their Country. The rest of the Swedes submitted to the Danish General, who encouraged thereby, marched to Stockholm; But meeting with many difficulties in his march; and when he came to the City, finding no hope to draw them to a Treaty, and his Army being now much wasted, he sent to Denmark for Recruits; And after a while the King in person comes to him, and so Stockholme is beleagured, which yet held out bravely, so that the Danish Army being wasted, and the remainder being wind-bound, and almost famished, a Treaty of peace is set on foot, and at last agreed unto by both parties. But the King intending nothing less than to stand to it, pretends that he could not come into Stockholme to finish the Treaty till pledges were first given for the safety of his person. This the Swedes assent to, and sent him pledges of the Sons of the Nobles, who were sent aboard his Ship; And the Kings minde, changing with the wind, away he sails with them into Denmark, and there committed them to safe custody: And, after four years, returns into Sweden with a great Army, and gives a second overthrow to the Swedes in the Field, wherein the Governour Steno was slain: then the King marching to Stockholme, finds the City standing upon its Guard, under the Government of Christina, the Wife of Steno; where for a while we shall leave him in a long, and tedious siege, whilst we give you some account of our Gustavus.

Amongst the pledges carried away, and imprisoned as aforesaid, by the King of Denmark, was this Gustavus, the Son of Ericus, a Noble Swedish Lord now in Stockholme beleagured by the King. This Gustavus was of a Noble Family, whose Grandfather having married the sister of Steno Stur, the Governour, thereby he became incorporate into the ancient Stem of the Kings of Sweden; And in his younger years he was trained up in the Court, under his Uncle Steno, who was no less valiant in the Field, than wise for Government in peace. Under him did our Gustavus learn the principles of War, which afterwards he began to practice under Suano, the next Governour. For after the death of Steno the first, the difference between the Danes and Swedes about the Government grew so high, that they fought two Battels, in both which the Swedes were the Victors, Gustavus carrying the Royal Standard of Sweden, though at that time he was but eighteen years old; and being now about the age of twenty six, he was (as was said before) committed prisoner to the Castle of Callo in Futland, under the custody of Sir Ericus Banner, a Knight of Denmark, who kept him warily that he might suffer no wrong, except from the King himself. This imprisonment he had now endured for the space of four years with patience: But having daily intelligence brought him of the Danes cruelty to the Swedes his Countrymen, he concluded that his own condition was like to Ulysses in Polyphemus his Den, being reserved but as a chief dish for the Tyrants pallate, when all the rest were devoured.

Having therefore upon a day obtained liberty to ride on hunting, being eager in the chase (though he minded another game) he rode away, and having changed his apparel as well as his course, passing through many unknown wayes and dangers, after a chase of three hundred miles, he arrived at last at Lubeck, one of the Hanse Towns, and that held Correspondence with Sweden against the Dane upon the same quarrel of being oppressed by them.

No sooner was Gustavus arrived at Lubeck, but that his Keeper, Sir Ericus Banner, was comethither also in pursuit of him, who demanded of the Magistrates the delivery of his Prisoner. Gustavus pleaded for himself that he was no lawful Prisoner to the King of Denmark, but amongst others, was delivered by his Country as a pledge for the safety of the Kings person during the Treaty between the King, and his Countrymen, and that the King contrary to all right and faith, detaining him, and the other pledges, had carried them captive into Denmark; That now he was under the Publick Faith of the State of Lubeck, to whom he was fled for refuge against oppression, desiring to have the benefit of Law, and to have the matter tried; divers of the Senate of Lubeck were of opinion that Gustavus ought to be returned to the Dane as his prisoner, and that it concerned not them to be Judges of the lawfulness, or unlawfulness of his imprisonment: But the Consul over-ruled the matter, who affirmed, that though Originally they had not power to determine the point, yet Gustavus being before them de facto a Freeman, and as such, had put himself into the protection of the City of Lubeck, and had appealed to them for Justice, it becomes them therefore to do herein according to Law; And that by the Law of God, the Law Civil, and the Law of Nations, they ought to enquire into the true state of Gustavus his Captivity, and to determine the same upon grounds of Justice; otherwise they might make themselves parties to the King of Denmarks oppressions (if the case prove so) before they understand what they do. The Authority of the Consul, and the strength of his reasons prevailed so far with the rest of the Senate, that they passed this definitive sentence; That Gustavus shall be protected by the State of Lubeck, till the cause be tried.

This served Gustavus his turn for the present, but he knew not how short a time it would continue: He knew that interests of Nations are soon changed, especially of such petty States as Lubeck was: Besides, he had too much other work work to do, to continue long in one place, and thereupon secretly, without giving notice to any, save to his good Friend the Consul, whose counsel he took along with him, he gat aboard a Merchants ship, and sailed into the Bay of Clamar, into which he entred secretly; and finding that they stood upon their Guard against the Danes, he discovered himself to the Lady Magnus, that held the Castle, acquainting her with the manner, both of his Captivity and escape; and taking advantage of the reports which then came of the sad examples of the Danish cruelty, and oppressions, he endeavoured to perswade, and encourage the Citizens to stand out in defence of the Liberties of themselves, their wives, and children, and not to trust to the fair words, and glozing promises of the Danes; but rather to endure a little hardship for a time, assuring them that the face of affairs would be shortly changed. The Citizens willingly hearkened to him, but some mercenary Souldiers, raising a Mutiny, had thought to have slain him: But the plot being discovered, the Mutiny was suppressed, and Gustavus advised for his safety to withdraw himself into his own Country, and there to obscure himself, till a more convenient time should enable him to carry on his design.

He knew this journey would be full of difficulty and danger; For his Way lay through Smalland, where the Danish Emissaries were very active to draw the Swedes to moderation, and to submit to the Danish yoke: yet through it he adventures, but with much grief of heart to see the Country people so miserably deluded; in so much that he could not forbear, but told them, That they should consider the cases of many of their Country-men, who had as fair promises from the Danes, yet met with nothing but miserable bondage. Adding, that there was much less danger in standing the push of the Danish Pike, than in committing themselves, and all that was dear unto them to so broken a Reed as their fair words, which had not only failed, but mortally wounded the Liberties of their Country-men, who had given credit to them.

Say what he could, divers Swedes of the better rank in those parts, being pre-engaged to the Danes, perswaded the people otherwise, saying, That the Danes aimed only at the suppressing of such of Swedish Nobility, as combined themselves against the Kings Government: But as for the people, the King was resolved to win them, and that they should never need to fear want, so long as Salt and Herrings lasted: But if they would not be prevailed with, they were all but dead men, except speedily they forsook their Country, and fled.

Gustavus finding the people hereby so affrighted, that they had rather be Slaves with quiet, than hazard themselves in War, he found it not convenient for him to stay any longer there, whereupon he secretly departed to Terno, amongst his own Tenants, and having there provided himself of necessaries, he went thence to Resnass, his Fathers house, where he Concealed himself for the most part of that Summer; yet at length he adventured to discover himself to one that had been a faithful Friend to him, and once was Archbishop of Upsal; but in those troublesome times had been laid aside, and now was retired to a Monastery at Gripsholm. This man being now grown old, was fearful, and willing to be quiet, though upon hard conditions; wherefore he dissuaded Gustavus from stirring, alleadging the great advantage that the King had, having an Army in the Field, and the Towns generally under his command, affirming that the King desired nothing more than to ingratiate himself with the people, for whose assurance he had granted Letters of Grace, and a general pardon, and therein particularly mentioning Gustavus himself; wherefore he advised him to give credit to the King, and to submit to his Government. And for my part (said the old man) I dare engage to procure from the King a special, full, and free pardon for you if you shall desire it. Gustavus heard him with silence, but liked not his undertaking; For (thought he) this old man may hope hereby to screw himself into the Kings Favour: Neither indeed did he like to adventure himself upon the Kings Promises, wherefore he resolved to Wave this old Mans Council, and to Retire himself back to Rafsnäs.

All this while the King continued in the siege of Stockholme, where we formerly left him, endeavouring, partly by force, partly by messages of Grace, to get possession of that City: For which end, he first confirmed the agreement which his General had made with the Lords in the Field, and then granted a General Pardon, and Act of Oblivion for whatsoever former Faults. Then sent his hearty Commendations, and fair Promises, to the People in the Country by the Swedish Lords that were of his Party, yet in many places it met with little or no respect at all. Nevertheless, in continuance of time, by the often droppings of his good Words, serious Promises, Protestations, Execrations, Letters-Patents, and Declarations under the Kings hand and Seal, an entrance is made into the Hearts of the men at Stockholm, the Gates at length are opened, and the King admitted entrance, and acknowledged by all, to be their lawful King, and then was Crowned, and solemn Feasts were held for all sorts of people, both Swedes, Danes, and Germans.

The King
admitted into Stockholme.

Plots to destroy the Swedish
Lords.

This was a fair morning, but who knows what a great-bellied day may bring forth? The King all this while was contriving the Ruine of the Swedish Nobility, and now he hath them in one place within the Walls, and a sufficient Guard upon them: But it must be done under the fairest pretence that may be, for the thing it self, was ugly and ill-favoured. Hence it was first resolved, that a Treason should be supposed to be plotted, by the Swedes to Massacre the Danes, and therefore the Danes, as in their own defence, should assassinate the Swedes; But this was thought dangerous, and might in the event turn to the Destruction of the Danes in so populous a City, and who knows what men in despair may do?

Then another way was propounded, viz. That the King must look upon the Swedish Lords as under the Popes Curse, and Sentence of Excommunication; and to draw forth the Kings justice with more colourable Zeal, the Archbishop of Upsal, who had procured that Sentence, must openly accuse the Swedish Lords as excommunicated Persons, for Treason against the King, Robbery of the Church, and as spoylers of the Dignity and Estate of the Archbishop, and therefore he must demand Judgment against them? And this was approved of.

And the better to draw these Swedish Lords together, a Feast is appointed the third day after the Coronation, at which also the Germans and Danes were present, and then before them all, the Archbishop of Upsal (though unwillingly when he saw what would be the event) steps forth before the King, and accuses the Swedish Lords of injury done by them to himself, both in Person and Estate, and demanded satisfaction for his Damages. The King, liked not this Charge as not being home enough, and therefore told him, that he forgot the Popes Sentence, the Crime of Treason, and his own place, who ought in Zeal to the Church, to have demanded punishment upon the Persons offending. After which, he commanded the Guards to seize upon the Swedish Lords, and (as some Writers say) shewed them so much mercy as to let them live till the next day; and in the interim, he set Guards upon all the Avenues to the City that none might be suffered to depart out of it. And the next day being November 8. Anno Christi 1520. not by legal Trial, but in a way of Butchery, he murdered near a hundred of the Nobles, and chief men of Sweden, and Citizens of Stockholm, and then letting loose the Souldiers upon the City and Country, all sorts of persons, Ecclesiastical, Civil, Great, Mean, Men, and Women, and Children suffered all manner of Violences and Deaths that Cruelty could devise; their

The Swedish Lords surprised.

And Murdered.

Rage

Rage extending, not onely to the living, but to the dead, towards whom they used all the opprobrious indignities that could be, the lively Character whereof may be described better by some Dane that saw it, or some that were interested in the Scicilian Vespers, or the Parisian Nuptials, or Irish Massacre, than by my pen.

Danish
Cruelty.

After these horrid Murders and outrages, Covetousness began to ascend the Stage, the King seizing upon all the estates, both of the dead and living; and to make all sure, the Liberties of Sweden being thus brought into the state of a dead man, they thought to bury them also so as they might never rise again: To which end, they set Guards in all places, published Edicts, and did not onely deprive the Swedes of their Armour, but of their Arms and Legs also, saying in scorn, That a Swede could plow his ground well enough with one arm, and a wooden Leg.

Covetous-
ness.

But the last, and worst of evils, was abominable Hypocrisie. For this Christian Kings conscience (forsooth) is pretended for what he did: He was touched with much compassion, and would not have done it, but that his conscience tyed him thereto in zeal to the Church, and obedience to the Popes sentence of Excommunication; and thus Religion is made the Patron of all these Villanies. Yet all this quieted not the Kings conscience, but he hastes out of Sweden, possibly fearing lest the ground should open her mouth, and swallow him up; or lest the fame of his cruelty should arrive before him in Denmark, and make that Nation abhor, and vomit him out.

Hypocrisie.

But behold how Vengeance follows him! Now is he gone home, King of the three Kingdomes of the Baltick Sea; and to secure Sweden, he had left Guards in every place: But cruelty never conquered mens spirits; A Tyrant may be feared of all, but is hated of all, and his own Conscience so pursues him, that he can be quiet nowhere. And so it fell out with this King; for within three years he lost all his three Kingdomes without adventuring one drop of Blood, or striking one blow for them. The manner shall be after glanced upon; but my present work is to shew how Sweden, now under water, comes to lift up its head again.

This sad news at Stockholme coming to the ears of Gustavus now at Rasness, and in particular, the murder of his own Father Ericus amongst the rest of the Nobles, he was not at all discouraged; but rather provoked with a desire of revenge, and to rescue his Country from such Barbarous Tyranny; yet what with grief and detestation of such execrable cruelty, and doubt, that many would be affrighted thereby from appearing in their Countries cause, his spirit was much troubled, and rendred less able at the present to determine upon the manner of his proceeding; and therefore in all haste away he goes to the Mountain-people with this news; But they, scarce civilized, are little sensible of their Countries cause, Gustavus therefore makes no stay there, but away he goes to a Castle in those parts commanded by one Aaron Peter, a Noble man, whom once he knew to be well affected to the Liberties of his Country; and to him he discovered himself what he was, and what were his intentions, desiring his counsel; But he found the man, and others in those parts so amazed at the news of Stockholme, as that they forgot both themselves and the publick, and were rather willing to Couch under any burden, than to make opposition against it; yea so fearful they were of being suspected by the Danes, that they rather desired to be esteemed wholly at their service, and especially Aaron Peter, who (though he pretended pity and compassion to Gustavus in this condition) and promised not onely security to his person, if he would abide with him; but his best assistance in compassing the ends proponed by him; yet having drawn from him the utmost of his Resolutions, after a few dayes, wherein he carryed himself fairly to avoid suspicion, he gets himself abroad, and away he went to the Danish Lieutenant Bruno, and discovers to him the Treachery whole matter, as well concerning Gustavus his intentions, as what counsel himself

What Gustavus then did.

providence

himself had given him. But Aaron forgot one point of policy, which was, to let none know his intentions but his own heart; for he told his wife, whither, and what he went about; who being more true to her Country, and regardful of the Laws of common honesty and Hospitality, than her Lord was, when he was gone, told Gustavus, whither her Lord was gone, and to what purpose, and therefore advised him forthwith to shift for himself, furnishing him with her own horse to go to Sueriso, to one that had been Gustavus his Colleague in the University. The day following came Bruno the Dane, with twenty Souldiers to apprehend Gustavus at Aaron Peters house; But his Lady told him that Gustavus was secretly departed the day before; and so the prey being lost, Bruno returns without sport. Thus God made a woman a great instrument in saving Sweden from miserable ruine.

He goes to the Dall-
carls.

Gustavus being come to Sueriso found kind entertainment; but consideration being had to the restless pursuit of the Danes, it was thought convenient that he should not stay long there (for now the enemy hunted upon hot scent) and therefore he departed privately beyond the Dallcarls unto Retwick. These Dallcarls are a people of Sweden strong and hardly, men of resolution, and being inured to work hard in the Mines, were fit for action; whence (as some Writers note) they have their name of Dallcarls or Carles, or Robustious men of the Dales, having by reason of their priviledges this advantage, that they are numerous and rich. To these Gustavus applies himself, and relates to them the particulars of the Massacre at Stockholme, whereby the Swedes had lost much of their best Blood; He told them also, what further danger the Nation was in, which he in good language set forth to the life (for he could no less skillfully manage his Tongue than his Arms) The Dallcarls pitying the estate of their Country, and having respect to themselves, and their Friends, they told Gustavus, that they would adventure all that was dear to them to be revenged on the Danes, and to vindicate their Nation from bondage; onely they desired him, that he would engage their Brethren of the Eastern Dales with them. This Gustavus willingly undertook, and forthwith departed to Mora, the chief City of those Dales, whither coming about the latter end of December, the next day he obtained Audience of them, and told them.

His speech
to them.

"That he should not need to make any preface to gain their attention, being persuaded that the matter of his discourse would ease him that trouble; He therefore prayed them to take into their consideration the perplexed condition of the Swedish Nation in those later years, that through their own distractions, and civil, or rather uncivil discontents, they had betrayed the Liberties of Sweden into the hands of strangers, who instead of seeking the publick weal, had wrought altogether for the advancement of their own interest, the people of Sweden being in the meantime glutted with misery, and drunk with tears, having themselves, their wives, children, and estates, prostituted to Murthers, Torments, Rapine, and all manner of contempt. I appeal (saith he) to the old men, they know it, they cannot forget it, and the young men may know it, if they will ask their Elders. And shall there never be an end of these miseries? Are the Swedes become a people alwayes to be trampled upon, devoured, and made food for forreigners? Call (I pray you) to minde the Government of that Tyrant, Ericus of Pomerland, his Cruelties, Oppressions, and Extortions; and remember, that you, that you I say, of the Dales, rose unanimously in defence of your Country against him, and therein hazarded all that was dear to you, even to your lives, and thereby compelled him with shame to return to his own Country. And now look about you and consider, Are you in any better condition under the enraged Danes: a people that bear an immortal hatred to our Nation, and are themselves hatefull to all Nations, but themselves: Can you expect better dealing now from them, than you

"you have found hitherto, after an Hundred years experience? Hear the cries of "the Survivers at Stockholme, the fatherless and widows, the dying groans of "so many brave men of this Nation, under the cruel torments, and unsatiabable
 "Butcheries; The Abhorred Massacre of all sorts, degrees, and sexes, and "ages, contrary to all Faith, Promises, Oaths, Execrations and Engagements
 "under hand and seal. It may be they will now promise you Peace, Justice, "and what not? Did they not give all these assurances to our dead Friends
 "at Stockholme? and yet they brake all bonds and engagements, and will "you believe their words? No, no, the Danes are still the same men, or "rather inhumane Monsters that ever they were; their hatred is now broken "forth into a flame, which will never be quenched, so long as the riches, or "any Blood of the Swedish Nobility lasteth, nor will ever cease till it hath "run over all the Country. Do you not every day hear the sad news of "this approaching evil? Is it not almost come to your own doors? and will "you sit still till it hath seized on your neck? Is it not much better
 "(if we must dye) to dye like Souldiers, than like Slaves? Are the Danes "more than men, and we less than women? I am here present this day:
 "Command my estate, person, and life, and I will adventure all in this ser"vice, if you will joyn with me in any way, though I should serve but as a "private Souldier. For I had rather dye a free Nobleman of Sweden, in the "defence of my Country, than live to see it under perpetual Vassal-
 "lage.

The Morvants being much affected with this speech, professed their readiness to appear in the defence of their dear Friends and Country-men, in whose liberties and lives their own were wrapped up. Yet they prayed him, for the present, to retire himself to some place of privacy for his own safety, till their neighbours of the Western Dales might be in a fit posture to joyn with them, assuring him that in the Interim they would not slack their preparations.

Gustavus took this answer courteously, and away he flies to the Western Dallcarles bordering upon the Mountains, to gain them into a posture; and there also meeting with fresh news of the Bloody cruelty of the Danes, he goes once more amongst the Mountains, where having to deal with sharp weather, rough and unknown wayes, more trodden by wilde Beasts than men; yet indignation against the enemies, and zeal for his Country, adde new courage, and Resolution against all difficulties, and dangers, and at last he makes trial of the peoples minde again: But they, scarcely, sensible of any thing but what was under grounds, and knowing no happiness above mining, nor any misery worse than it, turned a deaf ear to all that he spake, till at length Gustavus came to the house of Laurence Olai, an active, and brave Knight in those parts, who had sometime served Steno Stur, the Governour, with much valour and faithfulness. He, joyning with Gustavus, told the Mountainers that Gustavus had given them true intelligence Concerning the Swedish miseries under the Danish cruelties at Stockholme, and other places:
 Further adding, that he had received late information, that the Danish King intended a Royal progress through all Sweden, to receive homage of the people, and had by Proclamation enjoyned Gibbers to be erected in all places, and that Letters were coming down into the Country to provide quarter for the Danish Souldiers that were to be as a guard to the King in his Progress.

This news wrought effectually upon them, and as they were considering what to do, Messengers came from the Country of the Dallcarles round about to seek after Gustavus; But he was gon further out of Reach, to Lima.
 Hereupon the Mountainers resolve to joyn with those of the Dales to request
Gustavus his speedy return, whom they would make their Captain, and accordingly he came back with the Messengers, where he found the people assembled;

Thus one great Work is over. Gustavus had all this while to do with a people whose Principles were fixed in their Manufactures; and though they had many Eyes, and could discern things nigh at hand well enough, yet could they not discern the times, nor from thence make conclusions what they ought to do. For God never made all men for all things. Miners are no good States-men, nor States-men good Miners, and therefore its the less marvel that Gustavus spent an whole year in this painful Pilgrimage, with continual Labour and Danger, and all to make this People sensible of their Condition, and willing to defend their Liberties before it was too late; and yet could he prevail nothing, till the Danish Feast at Stockholme (not above two moneth past) roused them out of their Security. But now Gustavus was in a Posture for the Field, as a Captain for the Liberties of Sweden, against a known Enemy, or Tyrant rather, who thought that he had settled his Government in Sweden, both by Law and Arms.

Gods providence to the Swedes. Nor indeed can this Work be looked upon but as a special Work of Divine Omnipotency, in compassion to an oppressed, and undone people, that so strong a Principle of Magnanimity, Zeal, and Constancy, should lead one man thus in this Service through all opposition and danger; But these are but small things in comparison of what remained, and was further done by him.

He raiseth an Army. Gustavus being thus engaged, proceeds to gather his Army, and to him Laurentius Olai joyns, together with the Friends and Servants of those Noble Men who were Murthered at Stockholm, and others disinterested, who were in danger of the Danish interdict, and with these he begins first to march on Candlemas day, Anno Christi 1520. leading his men to the Copper Mountains, where he surprised the Governour and other Officers belonging to the Mines, seizing upon all the Danish Goods, the Kings Revenue, and the Tents, and so returned into the Valley.

Seizeth on the Kings Treasure.

He divides his Army.

By this means, he gained in some measure, a stock for the encouragement of his Souldiers, whereby his Army encreased daily, and he facing about, went to the other Mountains, where, by general Consent, he was made their Lord and Governour: After which, He divided his Army into two Parts, leaving one in the Mountains under the Command of Peter Sueno, a famous Captain, to whom many of the Inhabitants joyned themselves, and these he kept as a reserve, to assist him as occasion required.

With the other part of his Army, he marched into the Country of Helsing, which on one side bordered upon the Sea, having the Valley of the Dalcarles on the other; and this he did, as well to gain a passage by Sea, if occasion should require, as to secure his Army the more by such good Neighborhood: But whilst he thus advanced into Helsing, Letters were sent unto the Mountainers from the Archbishop of Upsal, the old Enemy of the Swedish Liberties, signed by himself, his Father Ericus Trolli, and Benet Canutus, who stiled themselves the Council of the Kingdome of Sweden. The purport whereof was, to beseech them to be mindful of their Duty to their Sovereign the King, and of the Peace of the Kingdome of Sweden, with large Promises of the Kings Grace and Favour to them, and of a safe Conduet to Gustavus, if he would lay down Armes; adding that by so doing, Differences might be composed for their great Advantage: But all the entertainment these Letters met with, was, Indignation, and Scorn.

He advanceth into Helsing.

The Helsingers gave Gustavus no harsh Entertainment, yet was his Presence not very acceptable, they besought him that they might be spared from from present Engagement in Arms, their Country being exhausted and much impoverished by the late Troubles: Gustavus hereby found that their Temper was not for his turn; He must have men of Resolution, and therefore he accepted of their submissive Answer, and leaving them to second Thoughts, he Marched thence into Gestrick, where the people readily submitted to him, and so he returned to the Dales again, having by this March encreased his Army to the Number of five thousand good old Soldiers, who having formerly hidden themselves in several Places, now repaired to him.

From thence into Gestrick.

The Archbishop of Upsal, finding what little Respect his Letters had with the Mountainers, he resolved to do that by force, which his fair Language could not effect, and therefore he sent Henry de Milen, with a commanded Party of Souldiers into the Dales, to reduce them betimes, and to crush the Bird in the Egge.

Gustavus being informed of his coming, advanceth to meet him, de Milen hearing this, retires from him, professing to the Archbishop, that Gustavus was not to be dealt with by Parties: But the truth is, a Spirit of trepidation had possessed the Danes, or else being in the Field, as they were, they would never have suffered an Enemy thus to gather under their Noses, nor have dallied thus with Gustavus by Parties, when they had a just Army in readiness.

The Danes
are infatuated.

Gustavus was otherwise minded, he had begun, and now there was no re-treating; He will now let all men know, that he was so far from fearing the Danes, that he undertakes a long March to find them out, and fight them within their Walls; and accordingly he advanceth to Westerass, a City having a Castle, and being Rich by a continual Market of Copper and Iron, brought daily from the Mountains thither, and therefore, there the Danes had placed a Garrison.

He marches to Westerass

Gustavus by this March also, had much encreased his Army, by the confluence of the Country to him, whereupon; he divided his Army into three Battels; the Van was commanded by Laurentius Olai, the middle by Laurentius Ericus, whom he commanded to march through the Valley of Balingass, and to encamp near to St. Olais Chappel, but not to attempt any thing without further order.

The Enemy not minding to stay their leisure, and observing the manner of Laurentius his approach, gave him a full Charge, especially with their Horse, which was so bravely entertained by Laurentius, that the Danes gave ground, and at last both Horse and Foot were driven to a disorderly Retreat, whom Laurentius pursued. Gustavus hearing hereof, and fearing lest his mens forwardness might carry them beyond their post, he hastened into the Van, though with some danger to his Person, and with the loss of some that were nigh to him; and when he came, he found Laurentius engaged even unto the streets of the City, in pursuit of the flying Enemy, so that it was dangerous to bring them to a stand, whereupon he gave them their Liberty, and with them he follows the Enemy through the streets. But the Danes, when they came into the Market place, Rallied themselves, and made a stand behind their Ordnance, which were ready Planted to give the Swedes a Salutation upon their first approach: But Laurentius Ericus with the middle Battel, found out a nearer way, and was already gotten into the City, and now charged the Danes in their Rear, making them quit their place, and their Ordnance, and thereby saved much Blood which might have been shed of the Swedish side. The Souldiers in the Castle seeing their Friends thus beaten, shot fiery Bullets, whereby the City was fired in sundry places; but the Swedish Souldiers quenched the Fire, and saved the City. The Danes in the City being fled to their intrenchments, defended themselves till they had strengthened the Garrison in the Castle, and then by the help of their Boats, gat them to Stockholme.

This Victory, as it discouraged the Enemy, so it much encouraged many secret Friends, to their Country to forsake the Danes, and to take part with Gustavus, amongst whom was Arvidus, a West Goth, whom Gustavus knew so well, that he presently sent him with part of the Army to besiege the Castle of Steckburrow, and to watch the motion of the people in those parts. Other Castles also were besieged; But Laurentius Ericus was sent with his Brigade to Upsal, and Laurentius Olai, with the Country people, that now flocked to him from all parts, was appointed to second him. As they marched thitherward they intercepted the Scouts of the Governour of Upsal; and the next day Letters were sent from the Governour, and Magistrates of Upsal, to the Swedish Commander in chief, to desire liberty according to their wonted manner every year upon St. Ericus day, to hold their Procession with the shrine of St. Ericus, to the Church of old Upsal, being half a mile without their City; to which, answer was returned, That it belonged to the Swedes, not to the Danes to hold that solemnity. The Governour though he missed the Procession, yet would not lose his Feast; He therefore would let the Swedes know, that he could keep his Feast though the Swedish Army waited upon his Trenches; and accordingly held his Feast in the Archbishops Garden. But the next morning before break of the day, the Swedish Army came to the walls, seized upon the Guards, and entered the City, whilst the Danes half asleep, and as yet scarce sober, being surprized with a Pannick fear, fled out of the City, firing of it as they went: But the Swedes appointing a party to quench the fire, pursued the Danes till they had passed the River, in which passage the Governour was shot with an arrow, whereof he died at Stockholm.

Upsal taken

About eight dayes after, comes Gustavus from Westerass to Upsal, and calling the Canons of the Colledge together, he asked them whether, they were Swedes or Danes, charges them with the Blood, spoyl, and misery of Sweden, affirming that they, and their Archbishop had nourished all the Rebellions in Sweden against their lawful Governours, that they were betrayers of their Countries Liberties into the hands of Forreigners, that ere long they must be responsible for those actions, and in the mean time he required Fealty from them, and security, that in their stations they would maintain the peace and liberty of the Country. They humbly answer by Petition, desiring that he would consider their Engagement to their Arch-Bishop, now at Stockholm, and that they might have leave to send to him, to see if they could prevail to take him along with them in this engagement, promising to write to him to invite, and perswade him hereunto. This Gustavus was content to grant, and wrote himself by the same messenger: But what other message the Canons sent privately, the event renders somewhat doubtful. For the Letters were received with contempt, and the messenger detained, the Archbishop saying, that he would carry an answer in his own person, and accordingly, he caused a Body of Horse and Foot immediately to be drawn forth, with which he marched with that speed and secrecie, that they were within two miles of Upsal, before Gustavus heard any thing of their coming.

Gustavus now too late, began to consider his own weakness, his Army being divided in so many severall imployments, and the enemies (if he was not misinformed) exceeding him in strength: whereupon he debated with himself what were fittest for him to do; the City was unassured to him, if not assured against him: If he retreat, it would be construed for a flight: If he stay, he must put all to the hazard: He considered also, that though he might suffer in his Honour by a Retreat, yet that might be repaired again, but if he lost his men, that loss would be irreparable, both as for his own honour, the liberty of Sweden, and the safety of his Party.

Hereupon

Hereupon he speedily withdrew out of the City into a Wood not far off: and the Archbishop without opposition entering the City, is soon informed thereof, and as eagerly pursues him to the Wood, where the Swedes had made a stand, and gave not ground for all that the Danes could do against them.

*Gustavus
quits Upsal.*

As Gustavus was bestirring himself from place to place, his Horse fell into a Quagmire, where, being espied by the Danes, he was knock't from his Horse, and had been at their mercy; but that a party of about twenty of the Swedish Horse came seasonably to his rescue, and horsed him again; after which, returning to charge the enemy afresh, they retired, but yet in good order, which Gustavus observing, he was willing to make a golden Bridge for a flying enemy, and so let them go quietly to Upsal.

& delivery.*

Gustavus had now leisure to consider what to do: and found by experience a double Error in his proceedings: First, that he had divided his Army into so many Parts, that none of them, was of it-self sufficient to oppose the Enemy, in case they should gather to an Head: The other, that in his March (contrary to Casars Rule) he had not reduced the Enemies Castles, but left them, as Birds of Prey, to fall upon any of his Parties, when they should be weak. He considered also, that if now he should leave the Wood, he was environed with those Castles, and had the Enemies Army entire, and near him. What shall he now do? Men bring themselves into Straits, and Plunges, but God brings them out. Gustavus had a party now besieging the Castle of Westerass, who hearing of the fight between the Archbishop and Gustavus, Rose, and hasted to him. Gustavus being thus recruited, turns to the left hand, leaving Upsal on the right, and so bended his March towards Stockholm, supposing that they might meet with the Archbishop, before he could recover Stockholm, and herein his expectation was not frustrated: For if Gustavus committed two Errours, the Archbishop fell into one which was worse than both of them, and that was, that being returned to Upsal, he considered not that he had left Gustavus in a Posture of Defence, who also might possibly recruit his Army, and so meet with him in his return to Stockholm if he made not the better hast; and so indeed it fell out, Gustavus met him, fought him, and after an hours dispute, Gustavus his Arguments were of that force, that the Archbishop hardly escaped into Stockholm with the tenth part of his Army.

vidence.*

The Danes again are beaten.

Gustavus follows him, and entrenches his Army near to the City, but considering that the City was full of Danes, and that most of the Swedes, after the late Massacre, had forsaken their Houses, and that it was like to hold out long, he was casting with himself how to encrease his Army, but he was soon eased of that Care: For the Helsingers, that hitherto had concealed themselves, now come unanimously, and offer their service to him, and the like did many old Souldiers of Germany, insomuch, as he was not able to provide quarter for them and his own men.

His Army much en-creased.

But what doth the King of Denmark all this while? Is not he ready by this to march with a compleat Army, to save a Kingdome that is ready to be lost? No doubt but he had a good minde to it; but his condition was such, that he durst not stir from home. For as he went out, of Sweden without one God-speed, so he came into Denmark without one Welcome-home. He was so dyed in Blood that all were afraid of him: His Victory was abominated, his person odious, and his Government grown intolerable; wherefore, finding that he could raise no Army at home, and that if he should go out of Denmark he might lose all there, and get nothing but blows abroad; he commands his Governour in the Isle of Gotland to relieve the Danes in Sweden as occasion should require; in pursuance whereof, he repairs thither, and after one repulse suffered, he relieved the Castle of Stechburg, besieged by Arvidus, and then changing the Garrison, he committed the keeping of it to one Bernard de Milen.

Gustavus Considering that the siege of that place would prove dangerous to Arvidus, if the Country, and neighbourhood were not assured to him; he sent to the Bishop of Hincopen, and having prevailed with him, by his advice, he summoned a meeting of all the States of East and West Gothland, Smaland, Vermeland, and of the Dales; and when they were assembled, he prayed them to take into consideration the condition of their Country: that the misery thereof was occasioned onely through their divisions and variety of interests; and the Government having been of late in the hands of Forreigners, the Publick weal hath thereby been much endamaged. He said, he should not need to enlarge upon the particular burdens which they felt and groaned under. The great business which he desires them to take into consideration, was, to advise, and conclude upon the means of redress: As for himself he would deliver his opinion freely and cleerly, viz. That no means on earth could cure these evils, but a speedy and effectual unanimity, and joynt endeavour to restore the old principles of Government, by one supreme Governour, and a free Parliament of the States, as formerly had been used: But if they had any further advice therein, he earnestly desired to be informed by them, assuring them that whatsoever they should judge meet to be done in order to a settlement, he would endeavour the accomplishment of the same, though to the sacrificing of his life, and all that was dear to him.

They proffer the Kingdome.

Which he refuseth.

This Speech being ended, there was a joynt acclamation, and assurance given, that they all fully, and freely assented to his opinion, and were ready to assist him therein to the utmost, withall, giving him great thanks for his undertaking their rescue out of the Tyrants hands, earnestly requesting him to proceed till he had perfected the same, whereunto they would constantly contribute their prayers to God for his gracious assistance, and for the protection of his person; and for his further assurance, they do not only acknowledge, and promise submission to him as their lawful Governour; but they pray that it may not seem grievous to him to take upon him the place, and title of their lawful Lord and King.

To this Gustavus answered, That he took up Arms against the common enemy of his Country, not aiming at Rule, but at the peoples liberty from the iron yoke of the Danish Tyranny, under which, themselves, their wives and children, lay bound day and night; That he called not himself to the work, but onely offered his assistance therein; That he was invited to command by the Transilvanian Swedes of the Dales; That his detestation of that abhorred Butchery at Stockholme (wherein, not onely many Personages fit to do their Country service, but many of his own Blood lost their lives and estates) did enrage his spirit to it; so that he thought nothing dangerous for him to adventure, so that he might take vengeance for it, which made him yeeld to the invitation of the men of the Dales: and if you also (said he) will joyn your aid in this work, and can confide in my command, I will not refuse to be your Captain and Governour untill the enemy be fully vanquished, and our Country cleared from them. But as touching the making of a King, you may take that into consideration when the War shall be fully finished; For then, whomsoever the States of Sweden shall Elect to be King or Governour, theirs will I be to serve in any condition.

This Speech was received with joyful Acclamations, and an unanimous vote, that Gustavus should be accepted for their Lord and Governour; and accordingly, all that were present sware Fealty to him, and faithful obedience next under God.

This was a little Parliament of part of the Nation, and chiefly intended to assure those places where the War was, and to unite them in a more vigorous prosecution thereof; and the success was answerable: For hereupon many Towns

Towns and Castles of West-Gothland, and Smalland, readily surrendered, and submitted to Gustavus, whose Deputies being sent to the Council, and convinced in their judgements of the justness of the cause, the people had obliged themselves to stand to what their Deputies should conclude. Hereupon Gustavus finding less need of employing so many Souldiers in these neighbouring parts, he sends a party into Finland, to which many of the people joyned: Amongst whom was one Grabb, a valiant man, and skilful Sea-Captain, who having armed a few ships, with them assaulted such places upon the Coast as held for the Dane, sometimes in one part, sometimes in another; surprizing Towns, slaying many, doing all by night, and before the next morning, he was gone, no body knew whither, nor which way. This caused the Enemies to divide their Forces, to guard so many places at once; and in the mean time the Swedes sat down before Abbo, though they were there hard matched, and sometimes over-matched by the Danes; for as yet that part of the Country had not felt the Danish cruelty, though if they had prospered, they should not long have escaped the same.

Many joyned with him.

Abbo besieged.

The Castle of Steckburg, after above half an years siege, was taken by Arvidus, the Governour whereof being committed to Prison, after he had lain there two moneths, he submitted to Gustavus, and sware Fealty to him. The Governour of the Isle of Gothland being ignorant of these passages, came with a Fleet, well provided to relieve the Castle; but when he came to the Promontory, he was suddenly assailed by the Swedish ships which lay behinde the same, and after the loss of six hundred of his men, he was glad to betake him to his wings. Shortly after, Arvidus was sent with part of his Army to block up Calmar, the rest being sent to the Camp before Stockholme; For the Danish Admiral, after the late defeat, having repaired his losses with a new supply of men and ships, came to the relief of them in Stockholme, and the Danes being strengthened by this recruit, sallied out of the City, and beat up one of the Swedish Quarters; so that for a moneths space, the City remained disingaged.

Stockburg surrendered.

Stockholme, relieved by the Danes.

Gustavus now finding by experience that Stockholme was a morsel too big for him to swallow, without further strength, he bent his principal industry for the recovery of other places Garrisoned by the Danes, and amongst other places the City of Nicopen was at length yeilded up to him by the Governour; Henry Canzow, with whom Letters were found from the Danish Tyrant, which required him to put to death all the Swedes that came into his power, especially those of the Nobility: But as he had too much humanity in him to execute so bloody a Decree, so he liked it not in others, and therefore he told Gustavus, that Letters of the same purport were sent to other places, and he believed they would be put in execution, which fell out accordingly in Finland; for the Governour of Abbo, being blocked up (though not formally besieged) by the Swedes, caused divers of the chief men of Finland to be assassinated: But Ericus Flemming being forewarned of the danger, and now in the Governours hand, offered his service, with so many Swedes as adhered to the Danes, to adventure their lives the night following to beat the Swedes before the City out of their quarters, which being liked by the Governour, he assigned him such men as he desired, who accordingly entered the Swedish quarters, but liked their entertainment so well, that they returned no more into Abbo: And thus he escaped that danger which many others shortly after smarted under.

Nicopen yeilded to the Swedes.

Gustavus having gained Nicopen, the Castles of Tineslor, and Westersast, presently after were delivered up to him; the latter having endured a siege of nine moneths: But finding all his labour before Stockholme lost, unless he could encrease his strength at Sea, he sent to Lubeck for men of War, and Ammunition, who readily assented, being oppressed by the Danes in their Trade. Nine ships were sent to Gustavus within a few moneths with Ammunition, and Souldiers, who had a great mind to see Gustavus before they would engage, but being satisfied when they had seen him, They all swear to be faithful to him; part of these Gustavus sent to the Siege of Calmar, the other part he carried along with him to the Siege of Stockholm (as it was the Policy of War amongst the Romans to divide their Auxiliaries) and then he sent the Country-men to their several Habitations. Within a few weeks after, eight more Ships of War Arrived from Lubeck at Stockholm, and being thus more secured at Sea, Gustavus re-inforced the Siege in a more regular way than formerly.

The Danes beaten at Sea.

The Swedes before Abbo, finding the work too hard for them, withdrew their Forces, and the Governour being now at Liberty, by order from the Danish Admiral, prepared a Ship of War, with Ammunition, and Souldiers, for the relief of Stockholm, which early in a Morning coming to the Foreland, sent out a Skiffe for discovery, which was intercepted by Ericus Flemming, now Admiral of the Swedes, who clearing the men out of the Skiffe, and manning it with Swedes in the same Fashion, he sent it back, into which, when the Governor of Abbo was entred to enquire after News, they presently apprehended him, and carried him away, and being hardly chafed by the Danish Ships, they suddenly fell amongst the Swedes, and being charged by them, some were taken, and others escaped. But the Governour of Abbo being brought to Gustavus, he presently hanged him on a Tree, for his cruel Assassinating the Nobility of Finland.

Stockholm straitly besieged.

Within a few Weeks after, the Danish Admiral came with five Ships for the Relief of Stockholm, but being within View, and not liking the Coast, he returned without doing any thing; and Gustavus now finding the Sea safely Guarded, he prosecuted his Siege more vigorously, making his approaches to the very Subburbs, and by Bridges closing his Quarters. Hereupon the City began to be in distress, and many escaping out, submitted to Gustavus: Amongst these, a Spy is sent out, who under colour of submission, was to make discovery, and as occasion served, either to return into the City, or to haste into Denmark to acquaint the King with the state of their affairs. This Spy was discovered, and being searched, Letters were found sown up in his cloaths, whereupon he was convicted, and executed: And this being known in the City, and judged to be by intelligence from some within, all the Swedes were ordered to depart, but such as would take up Arms for the Danes. On the other side, Gustavus having intelligence of preparations, intended for the Relief of the Danes in Sweden, he sent a Party into Norway to begin a War there, who meeting with little Opposition, soon made themselves Masters of the Province of Wicken, the Castle of Carlsburg, the Danes being in no Posture to Oppose them, as the Case stood.

He begins a War in Norway.

The King of Denmark flies into Germany.

For Christian the second, then King of Denmark, by reason of his injustice and oppressions of his own people, whilst he invaded the lives, liberties, and estates of all sorts, and for his execrable murders, and perfidiousness in Sweden; his contumelious outrages towards strangers, and his uncivil behaviour towards his own Queen who was sister to the Emp. Charles the fifth, having hereby provoked all men against him, but more especially the Duke of Holst, he proclaimed War against the King; and the Nobility of Denmark, perceiving that they were distrusted by their King, who relying upon strangers, intended to bring them into Government in Denmark, and so to rule his Kingdome by force and rigour, they joyned with the Duke, and invited him into Farland, where all joyned with him. And Christian, now too late, though too soon to him, concluding that the Duke would be made King, leaves his Throne and Country, providing for his safety elsewhere; and shipping himself, his Queen, Children, and all the Treasure he could scrape together, he sailed into Germany; first going to the Duke of Brandenburgh, and then to the

Electors

Elector of Saxony: and after some time he found means to raise to an Army for the recovery of his Kingdome, but not keeping touch with his Soldiers, he lost his Army and Kingdome a second time; whereupon despairing of good success, he fled into Flanders, where he lost his Queen, the greatest comfort he had left him in the World; not only in regard of her Relation to the Emperour, but in regard of her excellent Vertues, whereby she was so much beloved of the Danes, that they offered to submit to her as to their lawful Queen, if she would stay in Denmark; but she, like her self, chose to live in exile with her Husband, rather than to reign without him.

Then into Flanders.

A good
Wife.

The Danes in Sweden understood these things, and those of them that were besieged in the Castle of Calmar, were ordered to hold out as long as they could, and then to fire the City, and ship themselves for the Isle of Gothland; But the Citizens being informed hereof, in the night time opened their Gates and let in the Swedes, who soon made themselves Masters of the Castle, and after that, of the Isle of Oland, whereof when tidings came to Stockholm, they proffered to surrender, but upon such Conditions as Gustavus would not accept of.

Calmar surrendered.

Now did the Swedish affairs seem to promise a Calm night at hand; whereupon Gustavus thought it convenient to endeavour a settled Form of Government, for which end he summoned a general meeting of all the States at Stregness; who being assembled, he told them, that now things were in a hopeful way of Peace; that it was necessary for the publick Peace, and Justice of the Nation, that the ancient Form of Government should be revived: That for the present they see the Nation without a supreme Magistrate, and without a Senate: That the former hath Murthered the latter, and the people ejected the former: That he hoped in a short time to render an Account of the Nation reunited, and in a peaceable condition, which is the end of War; But some person must be elected to govern them when in a peaceable Condition, and a Senate must be constituted according to the ancient Custome of Sweden, who may elect the supreme Governour: That they, the States of Sweden, are the only first movers in this work, and have power to constitute this Senate anew; and therefore he prays them to proceed according to their Discretions for the settlement of the Government, and such instruments, as are necessary, and conducing thereto.

A Parliament called.

An excellent Speech

The States seeing their way clear before them, without further demur, proceed to the Election of a Senate, consisting of some of those of the former Senate who had escaped the Enemies Fury, and continued faithful: to whom they added others of the Great Men: and having constituted them, they granted to them the same Power and Privileges which the ancient Senate had; and in particular, to elect one such person as they should think meet to be their lawful King or Governour.

A Senate established.

The Senate being thus chosen, and impowered; they unanimously Elect Gustavus for their King; and send a Message thereof to him, humbly requesting that he will not refuse to take the Kingdome upon him; and to perfect the work of restoring Liberty to the Nation, and vindicating the same from all Tyranny.

They choose
Gustavus
King.

Gustavus having heard this Message, answered, That the Burthen of Governing a Kingdome was too heavy for his Shoulders. That it was one thing to govern in War, wherein he was Trained; and another thing to be a King, wherein he was not skilled. That he was well wearied already with the Dangers, Cares, and Labours of the War; and now having brought the Nation into a Posture of subsistence in Peace, he hath his ends; and therefore desires them to rest contented therewith, and that they would make Choice of some other Person of the Nobility of Sweden to be their King, assuring them that himself would gladly serve under him whom they should choose; and so thanking them for their good Opinion of him, he dismissed the Messengers.

Which he refuses.

They press
him again.

The States, and Senate having heard this answer, where no wise satisfied with it, and therefore renew their Requests (the Popes Legate also joyning with them) and tells Gustavus plainly, that they will not receive any Negative, nor can he evade the Election if he regard the Senate, or convention of States, or the peoples good.

He submits.

His Piety.

Sabbath.

Gustavus hereupon is at length overswayed, and yet abhorring all unworthy self-ends, he professed his acceptance, only upon the same Grounds which moved them to Elect him: and that withall, he was convinced that the Work was of that Nature, that he was unable to go through with it, and therefore, he would rest upon the Lord of Sabbath for his assistance and protection, and next under him, upon the Lords of Sweden, whose Wisdom, Care, and Industry he much Prized; especially desiring the earnest, and dayly prayers of all the People, upon which account only he would submit to their desires. And so, according to the ancient Custome, by mutual Obligations of Oaths, Gustavus is solemnly declared and Proclaimed King of Sweden: yet refused he to be Crowned till five years after.

The Lubeckers requi-
ted.

The Articles of Agreement.

The first thing that was done after this Election was, the requital of the Lubeckers, for adventuring their Men, Ships and Estates, with the Swedes against the Danes; in recompence whereof, the Swedes granted, That they would never make Peace with the Danes; without the consent of the Lubeckers. That upon the surrender of Stockholm, such Wares, Goods, and Debts therein, as the Lubeckers, and Dantzicars should own upon Oath, should be secured, and returned to them. That the Lubeckers shall be paid for their service. That the Sea should be free for them, and that they shall have a free Trade in Sweden. That they only of all foreign Nations shall have a free Trade in the Ports of Stockholm, Calmer, Sarcopen, and Abbo. That the King shall do them Right. That he shall never let Prizes upon any of their Marchandise, nor compel them to sell, or leave their Goods against their Wills. That their Goods and Estates Wracked, shall be Restored to the Owners, without loss. That their Goods sold in Sweden by their Mariners, or Servants without Order, shall be restored to their Owners, and the Offenders punished. That the King of Sweden shall not harbour any of the Enemies of Lubeck. That if any difference shall arise between the Swedes, and Lubeckers, the same shall be ordered by four Lords of Sweden sent to Lubeck, and so many Citizens of Lubeck joyning with them. These were confirmed under the Hands, and Seals of the King, and Lords of Sweden, and Commissioners of Lubeck. This was more than a recompence to the City of Lubeck, had they been as careful to keep touch with the Swedes as the Swedes were with them.

Stockholme surrendered.

Shortly after Stockholm was surrendered to the King, who entred the same in the month of June, after well nigh three years siege, wherein the Danes had time enough to have relieved it, if they had been convinced of any Right that they had to the Kingdome of Sweden. Upon his entry, he was Proclaimed King of Sweden and Gothland, with great applause and joy of all sorts. Hereupon, divers Towns and Castles were surrendered to him; and in the Rear, the Dukedome of Bleking, and the Town and Castle of Elisburg, the only commodious Port that the Swedes have into the Western Sea. But still the Dukedome of Finland, and the adjacent Countries were out of the Kings Possession; and therefore beginning now to study good Husbandry for those People whom he must own, he dismissed his Forreign Forces, and the residue of his Army he sent into Finland, under the Command of Ivar, and Bricus Fleming, who within the space of one year, reduced all that Country into Obedience, and the Northern People submitted upon the Credit of their Neighbours, so that the whole Kingdome was now United under the Kings Command, and he had nothing to do but to study dy Peace and Justice. And accordingly he first made Peace with the Muscovite, having none other Enemy whom he need to fear, nor indeed any that bordered upon him, but the Muscovite on the East, and the Danes on the West; and as for the Danes, their Condition was this:

Peace being made with the Muscovite.
The Duke of Holst chosen King of Denmark.

King Christian being fled, Frederick, Duke of Holst, being sent for, came into Denmark, and by the Nobility, was elected and crowned King, some years before Gustavus was Crowned in Sweden, though Gustavus was in Arms divers years before him. Both these coming to the Throne upon the same title of the peoples liberty; and knowing how necessary peace with one another would be, a mutual Treaty is propounded by the King of Denmark, and in order thereto, the King of Sweden propounded an interview, wherein he stood not upon punctilio's, but proffered to come to the King of Denmark in some convenient place upon security of a safe conduct, which the King of Denmark granted as soon as it was demanded. The place of meeting was Ancona, in the confines of Scania, where, in the presence of the Lords of both Nations, an interview is had; and after mutual salutations and complements, the King of Denmark spake of the miseries, and calamities that had befallen both the Nations for divers years last past, declaring their present dangers also by reason of the continual contrivances of Christian their late King, which (saith he) will be much heightened if our discords should continue: For my own part therefore I am for peace with Sweden upon just and honourable terms. Gustavus answered, that he held peace between the Nations, convenient and commendable, and was willing to hearken thereto upon equal conditions.

The two new Kings meet.

The King of Denmark began with proposing the continuance of the union of the three Northern Kingdoms according to the Articles of Calmar, which (saith he) were confirmed by the Oaths of the Deputies of all the three Nations; yet he desired not the change of the present Government of Sweden, but onely that Gustavus should acknowledge him Superior. Gustavus secretly disliking this proposal, answered modestly, that for his part he was unwillingly drawn to accept of the Swedish Crown. That he could wish that both Nations could flourish under one Head. But (saith he) the agreement of Calmar is dissolved by the misgovernment of the late King; and if the Danes could not all this while gain their expectations by force of Arms, much less can they think it rational, for the Swedes to yeeld up by Treaty the Liberties of their Country, which are dearer to them than their lives; as the late Wars have demonstrated. Neither can himself who is sworn to maintain the Liberties of his Country, allow of such terms, much less advise his people to consent thereto. Yet (saith he) for my own part, though I will not be a subject, yet I desire to be a friend, true, and faithful to the King of Denmark, and am ready to gratifie him in all things agreeable to equity.

The King
of Denmark

The King of Sweden
answer

The King of Denmark perceiving hereby the unreasonableness of his former demands, tells the King of Sweden in plain terms, that himself was desirous of a firm peace, and league with him, if Sweden would be content with its antient limits, and would yeeld up what in these late Wars they had gained from Denmark, especially the Dukedome of Bleking.

The King of Sweden answered, that himself valued the peace of both Nations beyond that petty Duchy, and therefore he would consult with his Lords about it, and accordingly it was assented to.

But the proposal about the Isle of Gotland, proved more difficult: It was in the possession of the Danes, but claimed as belonging to the Crown of Sweden, yet at last they agreed to lay that debate aside till a more convenient time: and thus peace was concluded between these two Kings, as well for the Hans-Towns, as for themselves, against Christian the deposed King; and all the Swedish Captives in Denmark were set at liberty, and such of the Swedes as formerly had any particular interest in Denmark, were restored to their right.

Peace concluded.

About this time a spiritual disease was newly breeding in Germany, which Gospel-light soon grew to be almost Epidemical in those Eastern parts. Gospel-light was newly sprung out of Popish darkness, discovering the very Bowels of the Romish Religion, to be a meer garbage of pride and covetousness: To prevent which, the Devil raiseth up another light, or a thing as like to light as himself is, when he is transformed into an Angel of light. He found the people as desirous to gain their Civil as their Religious Liberties. This he colourably helps on by a company of Professors, pretending to a more pure light, and perfect way of holiness by a second Baptism, suggesting that men of light must walk according to their light, and that they were bound by no other Law, and so needed, neither Magistracy, nor Ministry: Nay, those Ordinances favour of Antichristian Tyranny. Hereupon they rose, and ran up and down Germany, and like the waves of the Sea, swallow up, and bear down all before them, till dashing on a Rock, they break themselves in pieces.

Two of them come into Sweden, and cause much trouble.

But before this storm, two drops fall upon Sweden by the coming over of two men with the Holland Merchants, during the interview of these two Kings. These were Melchior Rinus, and Knipper Dolling, who arriving at Stockholme, instill new principles into the people; whence followed, that entering the Churches, down go Images, and Organs, and all such things as they will call monuments of Idolatry. They made also publick invectives against publick Worship and the Clergy, as Antichristian, suggesting that it were better to have none at all.

Gustavus banisheth them.

Gustavus the King returning to Stockholme finds much need of his presence, and understanding of the tumultuous Reformation, and the sad principles taken up, he commits the two Evangelists to prison, and afterwards banished them; But their poison was not so easily cured.

Their infection spreadeth.

The news of this Reformation at Stockholme, spreads far and wide over the Kingdome, and liberty was so welcome to all, being newly crept from under a Tyranny, that even good Government is brought into question; and the King saw no way to pacifie the storm, but by casting overboard to the people somewhat to keep the Whale from overturning the Ship: and finding that he must adventure a breach with the Pope, who had lately sent a special Legate, the Cardinal de Potentia, with Authority to enquire of the Bloody Massacre made by Christian at Stockholme, thereby to vindicate himself of so horrible a crime, and that the Legate upon examination had judicially pronounced sentence, that nothing was done therein by Christian but what was just and right; He therefore told the people that he would visit all the Churches in his own person, and make a reformation by the advice of learned men; and accordingly the King in person visited all the Churches throughout the Nation, and informed himself of the state of them; But coming to Upsal, he was opposed by the Archbishop, and Canons; whereupon a Disputation was appointed, wherein the King himself would be President: After which he summoned all the States of Sweden to meet, to whom he related what he found in his Visitation, requesting their help in directing some moderation in the work of Reformation, in Doctrine, and the worship of God, and in calming the violence of the Catholick Clergy, which were such desperate enemies to it; as also in regulating their abuse of the Church-maintenance, which they spent in pride and luxury, which ought to be employed for the saving of peoples Souls.

The Pope justifies the massacre at Stockholme.

The King visits the Kingdome.

A Convention of the Estates.

Their answer was, that if the matter be made to appear upon enquiry, they were of opinion, that the Temporalities belonging to the Clergy, may, and ought to be seized, and the Church-maintenance also secured, for the right ends and uses to which they were appointed.

The Ecclesiasticks declaim against this, affirming, that the Churches privileges and revenues were granted and confirmed to the Church by Kings and Emperours;

Emperours; and therefore ought not to be invaded under pain of damnation. To this it was replied, that the true Elders were worthy of double honour, both of reverence and maintenance; But such as are slow bellies, neither serving God nor man, ought not to have the Churches maintenance; and that if some Kings, against all equity, permitted the same, other succeeding Kings may, and ought to reform it; That there is not one Sentence in all the Scriptures that Warranteth such Power in Church-men, or that countenanceth such manner of living, especially in an unlawful way of opposing the Civil Magistrate; as hath been used in Sweden for these last two Hundred years. In conclusion, the States determined, that the Churches Revenues are in the power of the King, according to the condition of times, to encrease, maintain, or to diminish, as may best conduce to the safety of true Religion in Doctrine, and to the establishment of the pure worship of God, and holiness of life.

Hence followed a storm of Imputations, and Execrations; Forreign Nations are made to believe that the King is an Atheist, and that the common people in Sweden obey a Devil in the shape of a man; But the King sleighted these Scare-crows, as all Princes that fix their counsels upon good foundations, ought to do; yet the common People in Sweden were enraged hereby, and amongst these the Dalcarles; They who were the first in vindicating the peoples liberties, are now the first that appear to keep themselves and the people in bondage; But they knew not who to pitch upon for their Leader; yet at length one was discovered, called Nicholas Stur, reputed the son of Steno Stur late Governour of Sweden, and he ascends the Stage in West Gothland to act for the old Church Government; The people also allured by his great name, joyned with him, and so the War is now become Bellum Episcopale, the Bishops War.

The King hears, and sees all, yet the hatred and practices of these men move him not: He shewed magnanimity in the Field, but never more than in this case. He is but newly a King, and contrary to all principles of policy, he is presently put upon an hard task, even to change Ecclesiastical Government, and their formerly received Religion, wherein he was to sail against wind and tyde; and therefore though he was very courageous, yet this daring adventure must rather be attributed to his Faith, than to his Valour; and he met with success accordingly; For the Dalcarles, not finding that bravery of spirit in their new Captain, as might become a son of that famous Steno, began to suspect that they might be in danger of a cheat, and therefore they secretly sent to the Widow of Steno Stur to enquire the truth: She tells the Messengers plainly, that they were deceived; For that her son Nicholas was long since dead. This message caused the Dalcarles presently to withdraw their assistance, fearing that the cause of Religion will not bear them out, unless patronized by one of the Royal Blood of Sweden. The Dalcarles now gone, the spirit presently disappears, and is no where to be found, till he makes another apparition at Rosstock, where at the request of the King of Sweden, he was put to death; As also some others of his party in Sweden were served in the like manner, and so the storm blew away.

Yet the common people are still like a Sea; A Famine comes upon the Land, and the Church-men tell the people, that this is the fruit of their Innovations in matters of Religion; whereupon they are again angry, and refuse to pay the Kings Tribute; The King tells them that few of them understood Gods word, and that fewer of them could make a right judgement of his Works; That their stop of his Tributes should not stop his course; He soon gathers an Army, and marches to Westerafs, and from thence gives notice of his coming to them of the Dale, requiring them to meet him at Ternd, ready either to fight for their cause, or to beg pardon for their crime.

The Dalcarles like neither if they could help it, Feign they would hold their old way of Religion, yet choose rather to submit, and to hazard their opinions, rather than their lives; and the issue was, some of them were corporally punished, others reprov'd, and sent home, giving security for their good behaviour; And in the like manner, others in other places were so served; onely the Archbishop of Upsal, being one of the Popes sons, was admitted as a male-content to banish himself from his native Country.

Convention of Estates

The Kings Speech to them.

The King being returned to Westerafs, considered with himself the danger of the Kingdom by reason of the bad lives of the Clergy, and their neglect of the peoples souls, and their restless endeavour to bring his Government into dislike with the people, and his person into contempt, by imputations of Herefie and Blasphemy, to which some stop must be put speedily, or all would come to confusion: Hereupon he called a Convention of all the States of Sweden, to whom he propounded to take into consideration the State of the Nation, saying, that they all knew that he neither sought, nor willingly undertook the Government of the same; That they all promised to assist him therein, without whose help it was impossible for him to Govern; That he now, contrary to his expectation, found the people much dissatisfied through the instigation of the Clergy, whose Lordship, and Power amongst them, you all (saith he) know to be such, as that now it is put into the ballance with the Kings; And their luxury, pride, and idleness all the world knows to be such, as is inconsistent with the duty of their places, the good of the people, and righteous Government; That their Castles and temporal Revenues are exempted from the service and safeguard of the Kingdom, to maintain Dissentions, Mutenies, and Rebellions; That for his part, he must rather cease to be a King, than to see all things in confusion under his Government: And therefore I require (saith he) some order to be taken by the Convention of the States for regulating hereof, or else I am resolved to lay down my Government, and leave it to them that can manage it to better purpose; And hereof I desire a speedy and positive answer from you the Bishops, and other States of this Kingdom.

But the Bishops ears were deaf to these things: their Authority, and Revenues were dearer to them, than to part with them for words. They thought they had the King at an advantage, which they purposed to make use of: and the major part of the other States, overswayed by the Bishops, did not so readily, and resolutely appear for the King, as they ought to have done, fearing the Popes Thunderbolt more than the Kings displeasure.

He resigns his Kingdome to the States.

Note.

The King being offended hereat, said, He would never adventure one drop of Swedish Blood more, to maintain his Government by a Civil Warre, wherein the conquered must be miserable, and the Conqueror unjust, and wherein Friends must destroy one another: and forthwith coming into the Convention of States, he resigned up his Kingdom, and Government, asking nothing but a recompence for his service, and that they would take his Inheritance at a moderate valew, and so he departed into the Castle. This may seem a strange example. Ottavius only debated with the Senate about laying down his Government, but did it not: Gustavus did it, and debated it not. They that make Government their work, will be glad of rest: but they that make it their sport, the people will sooner be weary of them, than they of it. It seems, Gustavus missed of those encouragements which were promised from the Convention of States when he undertook the Government; and for him to continue therein without them, in order to maintain the peoples liberty, was vain: And therefore if he herein followed the examples of some of his Ancestors, he may the rather be excused, though hereby the Kingdom was left in a confused condition.

The Nobles oppose the Bishops.

The next day the States met again, and in cold Blood, and upon second thoughts told the Bishops, that the Kingdom must not be ruined to satisfy their lusts, and that if they would not be equal judges between themselves and

and the people, others must: yet (said they) you shall be once more heard what you can say for your selves: And hereupon, a Conference was appointed, wherein Doctor Olans appeared for the King, and Doctor Gallen for the Bishops; and the point about Ecclesiastical power was largely debated, which Conference the longer it lasted, the more it touched the quick, so that many of the Hearers saw cause to alter their opinions about Preslacy, inso-much, as upon the third day, the Voters for the people urged the Bishops positively to submit to the King: But if they meant otherwise to expose the Nation to extremity, and mischief should come thereby, they vowed to be revenged upon the Authours thereof; and to this, the greater part of the Nobles agreed. At length the plurality of Votes prevailed, and a message was sent into the Castle to Gustavus by a person of quality, to beseech him to return into the Convention of States, but prevailed not, and a second message prevailed as little, till a third message, presented by persons of near Relation to him, prevailed to bring him to the Convention, where he was received by all the States with the greatest observancy that could be, all making it their humble request, that he would not reject the Government in such a juncture of affairs; withall, promising their utmost and faithful assistance. The King considering with himself, that though it was an ill condition with him to be alwayes labouring, and yet never to do the work; yet it was much worse to grow weary before he had attained to the shore, for that was the next door to drowning; whereupon, he took up a resolution to neglect mens Opinions and Censures, and to see to what issue he could bring the Counsels of the Conventions of Estates.

At last it was concluded that the Bishops should render up their Castles and Temporalities to the Kings disposal, and submit to live upon such Pensions as should be allowed them by the States, saving evermore the titles, interests and right of the Nobility, and others, to any part of the said Temporalities, which by the distemper of the times, had been encroached upon: But the execution hereof proved more difficult; many being unwilling to disrobe themselves before they went to Bed.

Such as were worst affected were soonest at the issue, as desperate persons, through conscience of their guilt, conclude that no mercy is to be had, and therefore they had as good pass the Pikes at first as at last. Only the Bishop of Hincopen was loth to part with his Castle of Monkbed, about which he held some debate, but in conclusion, was ordered to deliver possession at a day prefixed, and in the mean time to put in security for the performance thereof, and not to disturb the publick peace. The King would not discharge his Army till all was done, and at the time appointed he marched with it to the Castle of Monkbed, where he was sumptuously feasted by the Bishop, who gave so great content to the King, that he discharged the Bishops Sureties, and at his request, allowed him to visit the Churches of Gothland, where, having gotten much Treasure, without taking leave of the King, he took shipping, and sailed to Dantzick, where, after some years, he dyed. And thus Sweden gave a leading example to the Eastern Nations, of regulating, and restoring the Church-revenues to the right ends, for which they were intended.

Gustavus having now reigned five years since his first election, and having thus far prevailed to pare the nails, and clip the wings of the Lordly Clergy, he thought that now he might hearken to the advice of his States, and give them satisfaction by being Crowned, and thereupon he appointed a day to solemnize his Coronation at Upsal, which accordingly was performed, after he had served at the helm of Government seven years.

Gustavus his spirit, which was alwayes daring, grew yet more brave: His aims are yet higher, viz. at a reformation in Doctrine, Worship, and holyness of life; For which end he first placed in all the Cathedrals, men eminent for Learning, Holiness, and Eloquence, to preach the Word of God, en-joyning the Bishops out of the Church-Revenues, to provide them such Pen-sions as might encourage them in the Work. The King also kept set-times every week to hear them, in his own Person, before he sent them forth; and this he did, as well to satisfie his own Conscience, as to encourage others to attend upon publick Ordinances. But now comes the Trial, the States had agreed, and the Prelates had in shew submitted as to their Tem-poralities; but when the Reformation in Doctrine, Worship, and Conversa-tion was promoted, the Devil Roars, and will not so easily be cast out of the whole Nation of Sweden. The Minister that was sent to Preach at Scaren, was so entertained by the Bishop and his party, that he was forced to fly to Upland to save his Life; and the Rector of the Colledge under-taking to Expound St. Matthews Gospel, was in danger of being stoned by the Schollars, who were encouraged thereto by the Lords, and great men that joyned with the Bishop, in this undertaking. Some also, both of the great men, and Commons of West-Gothland hearing hereof, bestirred themselves, not for the Bishops sake (say they) but because our Religion is invaded by this new Germaine Doctrine of Luther; and upon this account they sent Letters to Smalland to stir them up to take Arms, who were easily perswaded there-to, and seized upon such as would not joyn with them; and amongst others, upon the Countess of Hoy, the Kings own Sister. They wrote also to those in the Dales, and other neighbouring Provinces, to send their Deputies to a meeting appointed by them at Larva: So uncertain is the love of the people. Thus the Scene of War is changed, and though Tyranny was in the Van, and Prelacy in the main Battel, yet Popery brought up the Rear; and all tended to bring the Nation into its old condition, rather than to suffer such a Change. So unsensible are men of their present happiness.

This storm the King might rationally foresee, by what he found in the case of Prelacy; yet his Courage leads him on even to Astonishment, ha-ving nothing to back him but a good Cause and a good Conscience; and tru-ly, though Politicians might condemn him, yet the Issue justified him. For the inhabitants of West-Gothland, considering that the generality of the People, had sworn Allegiance to the King, thereupon demurred upon the bu-siness; As also the Kings Merits, their enjoyments of their Laws and Liberties; and that, as to the point, of Heresie objected against the King, they were no competent Judges; and that, considering the Kings Piety, they had no cause to believe it, but rather to judge it a Scandal raised by his Enemies. Hereupon the Confederate-Lords grew into Differences a-mongst themselves, and the Bishop, and one other of them fled into Den-mark, whither the Kings Letters pursued them, alledging that it was con-trary to their Agreement, that either King should harbour the others Ene-mies, so that they were feign to fly from thence into Mecklemburgh; and the other Lords (forgetting what they had done) stood upon their justifi-cation, alledging that they were forced to it by the Heads that were ab-sent in Forrein parts; and that they never promoted, or encouraged the Rebellion either by Advice, Letters or Instructions, and therefore would stand to their Trial at Law.

The King and his Council wondered at their Confidence, advising them rather to stand to the Kings Mercy, and to crave his Pardon: But they refused any Mercy but what the Law would allow. At last the King pro-duced their own Letters, wherein they had written to the Provinces to take Arms, and so being self-condemned, two of them suffered Death; one was Ransomed, and the rest begging Pardon, were received to Mercy: Which excellent temperature in the execution of Justice, commended, and confir-med the King in his new-begun Kingdome, making the People both to fear, and love him. And thus was this stir (for War I cannot call it) about Po-

The King taking into his Conſideration, that the King of Denmark's carriage in this matter, ſuited not with the former Agreement made betwixt them, and being unwilling that the ſame ſhould be invalidated in the leaſt point (wiſe men who will preſerve Friendſhip, muſt ſtop the Breach whilſt it is ſmall) he prevailed for an other interview, that they might underſtand each others mind more fully, and hereby the former agreement was explained, enlarged, and confirmed, and ſo parting in Love, they returned with joy.

The Bible tranſlated.

The King of Sweden after ſo many Storms, now hoped for Peace, and a ſettled Government, and having been three years a Crowned King, he purpoſed to build up his Family by Marriage, which he Solemnized with the Lady Katherine, Daughter to the Duke of Saxony, at Stockholm, and now he muſt abide the Iſſues, and Events of the Affaires of the Kingdome, to be theirs, for better and worſe; and what he was formerly bound to do, meerly for the Nations ſake, he muſt now do for the ſake of his own Family and Relations. And thus having laid the Foundation of his own Houſe, he proceeds to the further building up of the Houſe of God; For though he had before ſeized upon the Temporalties of the Prelates, yet their places, ſo far as they concerned Church-Government, he took not away, nor that maintenance which was appointed for the Miniſtry. The States alſo ſettled Penſions upon ſuch as ſhould be Overſeers, or Biſhops, to have care of the Churches; and to theſe places (as was ſaid before) the King had ſent choiſe men for Gravity, Learning, and Holineſs of Life, and now he advanced two Brethren, Dr. Laurentius and Dr. Olaus, the one to be Archbiſhop of Upſal, the other to be Biſhop of Stockholm, through whoſe care and induſtry, together with other reformed Biſhops, the Reformation of Religion much prospered in the Kingdome during their Lives, which was for the ſpace of about thirty years; and through their ſtudy and diligence, it was principally, that the Bible was Tranſlated into the Swediſh Language; and being Printed, was diſperſed into every Town through the Nation.

King Chriſtian invades Norway.

Policy.

But the time of the Kings Reſt was not yet come: A ſtrange Apparition proceeds from the Belgick ſhore unto the Coaſt of Norway, Chriſtian the deposed King of Denmark, now long ſince reputed, as buried in Brabant, had at laſt by the help of the Emperour, and ſome adventurers in Holland and the adjacent Countries, who hoped for large Privileges in Denmark or Norway (if they could be regained to the King) gathered Souldiers and Ammunition, and with twenty five Ships ſailed from Enchuſen to the Coaſt of Norway; But by the way having loſt ten of them, they arrived only with the reſt, and before they were aware they were imprifoned by the Ice, all that Winter. Yet was Chriſtian at liberty all that while to work his deſigns upon that Country of Norway, the Danes being at that ſeaſon wholly diſabled to oppoſe him.

As many therefore of the great men of Norway as pleaſed, had free correſpondence with Chriſtian: Only the Governour of Agger-houſe Caſtle dealt ſubtilly with him, reſuſing to ſurrender it to Chriſtian, but upon ſuch terms as might ſtand with his honour. For (ſaith he) though I acknowledge Chriſtian to be King of theſe three Northern Kingdoms; yet for the honour of my Family, I deſire leave to write to Frederick, the now King of Denmark, for preſent relief (which in common reaſon he cannot ſend during Winter) otherwiſe I will tell him that I muſt ſurrender the Caſtle to King Chriſtian; and by this means your Maſeſty will be no loſer, and my honour ſhall be ſaved. Chriſtian was contented herewith, and the Governour diſpatched his meſſenger into Denmark, and notwithstanding the Froſt, he had ſuch ſupply ſent him as enabled him to ſtand upon his own defence. Upon this Chriſtian prepared for a siege, during the Continuance whereof, as the besieged were relieved by the Danes, so were the besiegers not onely by the Normans, but by many Runnegadoes out of Sweden: such was their old love to Christian, and their hatred to Gustavus; and these flocking to Christian from all parts, soliciting the Dallcarles (who were now disobliged from their King) to revolt with them to their former King, who (as they said) was through afflictions become quite another man, changed into a meek and compassionate nature, and a gracious deportment, and would doubtless imbrace them readily, and give them all the assurance they could desire.

They told them also that Foreign Princes would assist him, for that they liked not such presidents of Subjects deposing their King. And above all, they might hereby assure themselves that they should be received into the bosome of the Church, and into the favour of the Pope. These, and such like motives were suggested to the Dallcarles: But old Birds would not be caught with chaffe; few of them gave any credit to these things, and many derided them, knowing that nature is no changeling, except it be overpowered by supernatural principles: That the manner of Christians coming, shewed little signs of repentance for any other thing, than for that he had parted with the Crown upon such easie terms: That the differences between Gustavus their King, and them, were but lately begun, and might easily be composed; But those between Christian and them, were beyond a cure. The revolted Swedes seeing this, soon disappear, and the Winter being now almost ended, and Christian finding his party discouraged, and the stream still, after six years, so strong against him, and being grown weary of living upon the German courtesie, he chose rather to cast himself upon a Treaty with his Uncle the King of Denmark, than to return into Brabant: and having conditions proffered him by the Danish Admiral of safe conduct, whilst he treated with his Uncle, and in case of non-agreement, that he should have liberty to go whither he would, he sails with the Admiral into Denmark, never so much as enquiring whether the Admiral had power to grant such conditions or not.

Coming into Denmark, before he was aware, he was made a Prisoner, gaining onely this advantage, that now he was maintained honourably upon the publick charge of the Kingdome; as one that formerly had been their King, whereas if he had been elsewhere, he must have lived upon the curtesie of such as would have pitied him; and yet this is observable, that the Danish Admiral had no thanks for this service, and many thought, that it would have been better for Denmark, if the Prisoner had been in a Foreign Country: For though it be true, that deposing of Kings by their subjects is sadly resented by other Princes, yet it is only whilst the sore is green, and the flesh tender, which may occasion some anger from abroad for the present; But if upon some trial, they get nothing, Foreign Princes so love their own interest, and peaceable Government, that by continuance, the wound breeds stupefaction, and they will engage no more.

Now as touching Sweden, who was not a little concerned in this business of Norway, its worthy our observation, how the breach between the King and the Dallcarles was first made; For though the occasion was small, yet the mischief might have been exceeding great. The matter was briefly thus:

The Kings debts to the Lubeckers for their service in the time of his War, were not yet fully satisfied, and now payment was required with some eagerness, but how they should be paid, and how the money levied, admitted great matter of debate; some were for a Tax, that was thought would go hardly down with the people, who were so exhausted by Ten years Wars. Others were of Opinion that the profit of the Mines might be assigned to the Lubeckers for certain years, but then they knew not how the Government should be maintained without them? At last a project was propounded to give the King the Biggest Bell save one out of every Steeple within his Dominions, which (as was alledged) would do the work, and no particular man should have any loss, nor the publick be prejudiced. But this was a great mistake as things then stood: For the Merchants had engrossed much Copper, and if this proceeded, they were undone, they could get no Market. It was said, this was no good reason, being of too private a nature, to be ballanced with the publick good.

Then the quarrel was about the condition of these Bells: It was said, they were Anointed, and Consecrated to an holy Use, and ought not to be employed for prophane Uses; But this also was judged invalid, the Opinion being grounded upon superstitious Principles: But be it granted, that the Anointing, and Consecrating them was superstitious, yet if any property be at all in such devoted things, that property remaineth till it be legally destroyed; and untill then, the seizing of such things, and converting them to other uses, will in the vulgar Opinion fall under the notion of Sacrilege, which hath been always abominable even amongst the Heathen, though it were done in the Wilde Wars: Or, if it comes not under that notion, then it must be in the nature of a gift to the people of the Parish, either for their pleasure, or for the more convenient assembling them to publick duties; in both which Cases the unlawful seizing upon them is looked upon as a common plunder, and invasion of the goods of the whole body of the people at once, which is a sad presage, that no mans particular estate is his own any longer under such a Government. And it seems the people of Sweden had such an apprehension of this president; for after it was resolved upon, and began to be put in execution, an insurrection was made, and the people stood up in defence of their Bells, so that some could not be removed, others that were taken down, and carrying away, were pursued and rescued, and the Officers that were employed, were well beaten for their pains.

Tumults about Bells.

This being reported to the King, he called a Convention of the States, which would have been more seasonable before the business of the Bells had made such a jangling. This Convention of States met at Upsal: But the Dallcarles, who were most eager for their Bells, summon another Convention of the people at Arbogg, so that here was one Parliament against another. The people (saith the Historian) are commonly of that temper, that they will either serve humbly, or govern proudly. True liberty (which is the golden mean) they neither know how to want, nor how to use, especially such as the Swedes now were, trained up in Warre; who therefore chose rather to lose their Peace than their Bells.

A Convention of the States.

But the Parliament at Arbogg thrives not: few hearkened to their summons: yet did they set a good face upon the matter, and sending Messengers to the King, they protest their fidelity, yet desired his answer to two requests: One, that the King would not send more forces into the Country of the Dallcarles than they should deem Convenient for them to quarter: The other, not to set any Governour over them, but such an one as was of their own Country, and neighbourhood. The Kings spirit was too great to like of conditions from his Subjects; yet his wisdom prevailed; to take into consideration the condition of his affairs. He considered that Christian was now in Norway: That Winter was newly begun: That the Norwegians were inclined to assist Christian: And that if the Dallcarles should be further provoked; the issue might be doubtful. He therefore dissembled his Displeasure, and sent them a Governour according to their desire: But at the end of three years, he raised an Army, and seized upon the chief Authors of this Rebellion, and put them to Death: And further, to bring down the Pride of the Dallcarles, he seized upon their Liberties, and so levelled them with the rest of the People.

This was the first malignant design against the Government of Gustavus, in favour of the Cause of the deposed King, which, like a Granado firing in the Air, spent it self before it fell: But it proved not the last. For, soon after the King of Denmark died, leaving Christian a Prisoner to the Lords of Denmark, who differing in their Opinions as to the Election of a King, spent two years in an Interregnum: during which time, some sought to promote the Son of the Deceased King, which was but a Child, and therefore more capable of Counsel, and herein the Bishops joyned. Others Acted for the Duke of Holfst: and some were for restoring Christian, then a prisoner, to the Crown again. This was one summons to the King of Sweden to look about him, and kept him off from punishing the Dallcarles for the matter about the Bells. But there was another thing that was no less dangerous, though the effect was not like to be so sudden, and that was this:

About this time there was a change of Government in Lubeck, from the the Papish to the Lutheran way, which although in it self it suited well enough with the King of Sweden's mind, yet in such alterations there is commonly one man more active than the rest; who in such alterations of Religion becomes an instrument of altering the Government. And such an one the Lubeckers had fitted for the purpose: His name was Woolweaver, a man whose education was answerable to his name: Him they made Consul of the City, and he being gotten up, was blown higher by affecting popularity, and undertaking to be a Protector to the poor, who were now much encreased in the City, the principal cause whereof, he alledged to be the King of Sweden's abridging them in their priviledges, contrary to his agreement made with them, when they assisted him in his Wars, as also that he had countenanced trade from, and with the Hollanders, and other Nations; for a remedy, whereof Woolweaver counselled them to endeavour to draw the Danes to joyn with the Lubeckers against all trading with Sweden from without the Baltick Sea.

But the Danes told them that they thought it not meet to conclude in things of that nature till they were better settled in their Government, and were agreed about the party that should be their King: And finding it more necessary to keep good Correspondence with Sweden (because of the endeavours of a party amongst themselves to advance Christian to the Throne again) they acquainted the King of Sweden with the designs of the Lubeckers. Woolweaver stormed at this, and without blushing, faces about, and propounds to the King of Sweden to joyn with him against the Hollanders: But Gustavus his counsel was rather to manage well the matter concerning Denmark, than to enter into new Engagements. For (saith he) the Danish affairs are as a Sea of many currents, wherein if you steer not an even course, and keep not constant watch, you may be in danger of Shipwrack; and therefore as embarked in one, and the same Ship with Denmark, let us bend our whole counsel in the speedy settlement of the Government thereof, so as may best conduce to the concurrent interest of both Nations.

Woolweaver finding himself thus disappointed in both these places, grew angry, and like one lifted up from below, lifted up his thoughts higher than his wits served him, and in his career Vaunteth, that as he had advanced Gustavus to the Throne, so he would pull him down again, and thereupon entertained Correspondency with the Runnegadoes of Sweden: which Gustavus being quickly sensible of, he seized upon the persons, goods, and priviledges of the Lubeckers in Sweden. The Lubeckers also dealt in the like manner with the Swedes in Lubeck.

Woolweaver in the mean time aiming at no less than the Crown of Sweden, held private intelligence in Sweden, and stirred them up to civil broils that might busie the King at home; and first, he prevailed with the Earle of Hoy, who who had married the Kings sister, and being a person of great interest, he prevailed with the people, especially with those of Smalland, to disaffect them towards the King, which done, the Earl withdraws himself, his wife, and children to Lubeck, under pretence for his health sake, but being there arrived, he was made Commander in chief of all the disaffected Swedes who repaired unto him. Its the usual fate of great men seldome to be contented with their present state; they think that either their own merits are not rewarded enough, or their inferiours too much, and so through discontent, striving to be higher, they fall lower.

Pride goes before a fall

The Earl of Hoy thought it not enough to be the Kings Brother by marriage, and Lord Lieutenant under Gustavus in Sweden, but he must become General of a party of Discontents under Woolweaver against his King, his Brother, his Kindred, and Country, and what he gained thereby, will afterwards appear.

In the meantime many retire to him out of Sweden, principally by reason of the disturbances in Smalland, which himself had kindled before his departure thence, and which afterwards were fomented by a company of lawless persons who had combined themselves against the Kings Justices there, and carried themselves with so high an hand, that it came to Blood, even to the slaughter of the Kings Lieutenant in that Country; and when the King had suppressed them by force of Arms, yet they maintained a kinde of theevish War till they could retire themselves to the Earl of Hoy, whose party being thus increased, waited all advantages, which occasioned the King of Sweden to stand rather upon his watch, than upon his defence; for they did him no harm, God having provided other means to clip their wings without the labour of the King of Sweden.

For Woolweaver, according to his design, being strengthened by these aides, soon employed it about his principal work, which was to settle his Neighbours, the Danes, in a fitting posture for his purpose. For the present condition of Denmark was this: The Nobles were divided (as was said before) about the election of a King, divers were for Fohn, the son of the former King, though a childe, and that principally upon the account of Religion, which his Father had changed into the Lutheran way, and they hoped the Sonne would the rather uphold it. This the Bishops smelt out, and sought the advancement of the Papish Religion, and therefore would have the Government managed by Administratorship, and in their own names they published Injunctions, wherein they required all the Lutheran Preachers to depart out of the Country by a day prefixed. This being like to fall heavy upon the Cities of Hafnia, and Malmogia, who yet were loath to make a breach, they prevailed to have the Government by Administratorship advanced, and with all invited Christian Duke of Holst to be Administrator for Fohn, the former Kings son, but he disclaimed it. Then they had recourse to, and prevailed with the Duke of Aldenburg (who professed the Doctrine of Luther) to accept thereof, who thereupon came to Hafnia with a party; and when he was there, perceiving many Whisperings about the Restoring of their desposed King, the Duke, to gain the greater party, declared his willingness for the resettlement of him, whereby he won much upon the common people. For Christian Drove on the same Trade in Denmark as he had formerly done in Sweden, flattering the people into a party against the Lords, which (as an Historian saith) is the ready way to Tyranny. Woolweaver, though he was more passionate, than wife, takes this opportunity, and sides with the Duke of Aldenburg, and prevails with him to engage against the Duke of Holst, who had divers of the Lords of Denmark that joyned with him to make him King; but in this the Duke of Aldenburgs expectation was frustrated; For he lost the day, and was beaten out of the Field by the Duke of Holst.

And now was the Duke of Holst brought upon the stage to Act his part for the Crown of Denmark, thereby to procure his own rest and safety; and observing that the King of Sweden was left out of the Play, he invites him to bear a part in the Game for Woolweavers sake. The King of Sweden well knowing his own interest, made little difficulty of the matter; and though Woolweaver endeavoured to stop that muse by a fair Message, yet the King would not so be perswaded, but told the Messengers of their Masters entertainment of the Swedish Runnegadoes, and so dismissed them; and being informed that the people in Denmark sided with the Duke of Aldenburg, for their deposed King, he thought it not fit to dally any longer, but forthwith falls with an Army into the Danish Territories, and possessed himself of divers places for the use of the Duke of Holst. The Danish Lords also seeing which way the current ran; and themselves deserted by the people, joyned with the Duke of Holst, and engaged him for the Crown in good earnest.

In the mean time the Duke of Aldenburg, seeing what interest he had with the common people, thought all safe, and therefore took his ease, and enjoyed his pleasure. But the Duke of Holst, did not so; he sent the Danish Lords into Fusland with an Army, who soon settled that Country, and from thence marched into Fionia, where, in one Battel, all the Duke of Aldenburgs hopes were dashed, and the Earl of Hoy was sacrificed to the King of Swedens pleasure; the Archbishop of Upsal also, and diver others disaffected Swedes were slain in the Battel.

The news hereof coming to Lubeck, made Woolweaver once more tack about, and hearing that Suanto, the son of Steno Stur, sometimes Governour of Sweden, was in the Duke of Saxonies Court, he suborned a messenger to him as from his Mother, to meet her at Malla, where (it was said) she waited with Convenience for him: Hereupon he repaired to Malla, where instead of meeting with his Mother, he was met with by a Troop of Horse from Lubeck, who offered him in the name of the City, great honours if he will be advised by them; and so by surprisal, they conveyed him to Lubeck, where he was saluted by Woolweaver the Consul, with great expressions of joy, who minded him of the unsettled state of the Northern Kingdomes, and of the private disaffection of the Swedes to their King. Adding, that now there was a fair opportunity offered to him to recover the Government of Sweden, which place was so famously managed by his Ancestors. That Lubeck had an Army in readiness, wanting onely his consent to be their Leader. That it was expected that he should now shew himself worthy of such Progenitors: But Suanto had sworn Allegiance to Gustavus, and meant to observe it, and therefore refused the proffers, and demanded liberty to depart, or else that Woolweaver would shew cause why he was detained Prisoner. Woolweaver seeing no good was to be done, told him that he was no prisoner, and that it was free for him to go when, and whither he pleased, only earnestly desiring that where ever he went, he would retain a favourable opinion of the City.

The King of Sweden being informed of these passages, was thereby sharpened in the pursuit of the Duke of Holsts interest upon the main land of Schoonen, and in a short time brought all the Country to submit to him, onely the City of Malmogia, and some other neighbouring Castles held out for the Duke of Aldenburg, from whom they expected relief; and accordingly the Duke, with the Duke of Oldenburg, and the Duke of Mecklenburgh, joyning all their strength together, resolve to adventure all upon the issue of one Battel with the King of Sweden, wherein their Army was utterly and irrecoverably overthrown; so that within a few dayes, all the Country was wholly for the Duke of Holst, which but a week before was quite of another temper.

Haffnia had now been besieged above half a year by the Duke of Holf, which City was only left as the gleanings of the War, and wherein the last strength of the Dukes of Aldenburg, Oldenburg, Mecklenburg, and of the City of Lubeck was now contracted. All this while Christian the deposed King had time enough to try the Courtesy of the House of Burgundy; but none of that house would sit in his behalf, and which was more unhappy for the besieged, the affairs of Lubeck were faced about to the Rear. For the Hanf-Towns in their general meeting, perceiving that the affairs of Lubeck had for these five years last past been wholly swayed by Woolweaver: under a pretence of Religion, and that the City by that means was brought into such difficulties that they knew not how to come off, either with credit or safety; they thereupon concluded (according to the Counsel sent by the Emperor to the City) that the former Government should be restored at Lubeck, not at all meddling with the matter of Religion; and because they would save the Credit of Woolweaver, they commended him to the Government of Bergeridoffe. Woolweaver was not therewith contented, and therefore at his departure out of the City, Vowed Revenge; and the Senate at Lubeck, being now changed, Considering the Restless Spirit of Woolweaver, were as little satisfied as he, and therefore sent Messengers after him, who finding him upon his journey, in the Territories of a Prince, who owed him no good will, they procured him to be imprisoned, and afterwards Charging him with Treason against the State of Lubeck, he was put to death, and quartered. And now Lubeck was settled upon its old basis, and flourished again, leaving this Lesson to such as would be States-men, That Miscarriages in Government, are not reformed by altering, but by establishing the Government.

Woolweaver is hanged, and quartered.

Haffnia now after a years siege, being tired out with the miseries of War, was surrendered upon terms, not altogether so honourable for the Duke of Holf, as might have been expected: Whereupon the King of Sweden told the Duke, that being privy to his one Engagement in the Dukes behalf, he little expected that such an agreement should ever have been made by the Duke without his knowledge, and in one thing, not without his consent. For (said he) Why should I be excluded out of this agreement, and you thereby, to engage your self not to aid me in case I should not agree with the Lubeckers upon just terms. The Duke pleaded, that he was necessitated to it, to gain the present surrender of the City; as also, that the importunity of the Lords, and his Neighbour-Princes drew him thereto: Nevertheless he assured the King, that if he would send Ambassadors, he should find that he should not receive any damage thereby. And accordingly the King did send Ambassadors; but the Lubeckers could never prevail to have a settlement of their privileges in Sweden as they desired: so that in conclusion, there was only a bare truce concluded betwixt them, and the King of Sweden, for five years.

Haffnia surrendered.

The King makes a truce with Lubeck.

Thus are the three Northern Kingdoms brought once more into a settlement, and turbulent Lubeck was calmed, and the Captive King in a manner twice Captivated; and now if not quite hopeless, yet less hopeful than ever formerly. England indeed was allied, and had done what it thought meet, and possibly more than was meet. For Ambassadors were sent from hence to draw the Lords to a Treaty; But they liked not to adventure their necks upon purposes and promises. The Emperor did less, either judging Christians person despicable, by reason of his unworthy carriage to his Queen, and Lords; or the Lords were more wise and wary than to adventure upon a second trial of their late Kings courtesy, unless they were compelled thereto by force: To do which, the Emperor had neither time, nor money to spare, though the Opportunity lay as fair, to do his Brother a good turn as he could desire, if he had intended it. And Lastly, though the common people did what they could, yet they effected nothing, its many times seen, that Providence doth advance some particular persons of the meanest rank, to be instrumental strumental in the Publick Government, but never puts the Government into the power of such, which would be the speedy way to confusion, as appeared in those very times by the Earthquakes in Government, raised by the Anabaptists in Germany, wherein though the issue was abortive, yet it came to that growth as made the greater Powers to tremble.

Note

The King of Swedens
Prudence.

And now the time of Swedens rest was come, where both King and people might have leisure to enjoy their several lots. The King had hitherto acted the Souldiers part very well, and now he must try his skill in a peaceable Government, wherein I shall onely set down the brief Contents of many Laws, and Acts of State, which shew rather the disposition of the Government, than the several actions thereof.

Prudence.

The King now at leisure, taking into Consideration that the Fewel which maintained the Civil War was now spent, and that the people who had been trained up to the toyl of War, were fitter for labour than leisure; and considering also that a time must come when a Common wealth, reduced by War, must be governed and maintained by peace; He now applied himself to acquaint his people with matters of profit, drawing them to Mining, Husbandry, Fishing, and Merchandize; all which were much advanced by the Kings own ingenuous Contrivances; and by encouraging the laborious, banishing idleness, punishing Vagabonds, and wanderers, he found a way to make the Sea to serve the Land, the Land to serve Men, Men to serve the Nation, the Nation to observe their King, and both Nation and King to serve God; and thereby he laid a far better building of Sweden than Augustus did of Rome of whom it was said, That he found it of earth, and left it of stone.

The Crown of Sweden is made successive, and why.

The people likewise soon found the sweetness of this Government, and were not far behind in requital of the Kings favour to them. They had now lived twenty years under his Government, and in a good measure found the benefit of peace, though bought with their Sweat and Blood in a long War; But how sad would it be, if the last breath of the King should put an end to their happiness? The Council therefore at their meeting, taking this into consideration, that the Government of Sweden by Election was alwayes uncertain, seldom effected without deceit, and discord, and oft-times at the price of the peoples Blood; that it is of short continuance, depending upon the life of one man, and prejudicial to the publick good. For that in such cases, Kings will deplume their subjects to feather their own nests, to keep their young ones warm, when themselves are gone; and that it were far better for the people to be sucked by one Leech, which in time might be satisfied, than by the change of many, who will but increase the pain, and suck without satiety. That the advancement of one Family to the Throne would be a Cure to all this, and a preparative to a winning aspect from it upon the people, and of a due respect from them to it, and so of a kind of Conjugal affection between both, against the Marriage day. That it is a means to suppress the turbulent aims of ambitious men, who croud into the Throne, though of all others they be most unworthy: Besides, that it secureth the present Government in the peaceable possession of him that enjoys it. And that upon these, and such like grounds, Augustus, and other Roman Emperours, who wanting issue, used in their life-times to adopt, and declare their successors in the Government, and trained them up for that service; nor did they find it dangerous either for themselves, or their successors so to do: That the people at the siege of Stockholme offered to settle the Government upon the King, and his children, when at that time he neither had any, nor was married: But now that he is married, and have Children, and hath given such large experience of his love, industry, and faithfulness in adventuring all that he had, even to his own life, to vindicate the honour of his Country: What acknowledgement can be sufficient for so great a merit, less than the settlement of the Crown of Sweden upon him, and his posterity for ever?

This

This was the result of their debates, and thus it was resolved unanimously at the Council held at Orebro, that it should be propounded by them to the Convention of States that it might be confirmed for future ages. All which by an Instrument under their hands they professed to be done by them freely, and of their own accord without any constraint. Indeed the Kings Enemies Scoffed hereat, as if he had suffered a Crown to be forced upon his Family against his will. Others pretended Religion against it, as if God liked not that men should contrive perpetuities; which is true, yet doth he like that men should be provident in establishing Justice, Truth, and Peace in a Nation; For which end himself did settle the Crown upon the Family of David, and hath blessed the same Rule in the Government of most Kingdomes with prosperous success, though not alwayes precisely fixing upon the same person that men design thereto.

But whatsoever was said, its clear, that the Kings desire was not very eager upon it, for that he summoned not a Convention of States of four years after; And then at Westerafs the point was debated anew, the result whereof was this Act; That after the death of Gustavus Ericson, his Son shall succeed in the Government, and his eldest Son, and the Heirs male of his Body; and for want of such, his second Brother, and his Heirs male of his Body; and for want of such, John, the second Son of Gustavus, and his Heirs male of his Body shall succeed, and so the rest of the Sons of Gustavus, and their Heirs male of their Bodies: And in case of want of Heirs males of the Sons of Gustavus, the eldest of the Blood, and Family of Gustavus shall succeed, and his issue male; And for want of such, then shall such person succeed as the Council of the Kingdom of Sweden shall elect, provided he be no Forreigner, and that he shall provide Portions for the issue female of Gustavus. The Council of States did herein as wise men, that steer their course by Rule, and yet still leave to God his supream controle, who also in this case over-ruled their rule as to the succession of the posterity in Ericus his line, which was afterwards laid aside by the people (Ericus being found false to the Principles of Government established by his Father, and the Convention of States) and yet God owned Gustavus his Family so far as to build him a sure house (who had built Gods house) by raising from thence many brave men both for War and Peace, and made it the brightest Constellation of all the Northern Hemisphere, to have an influence, not onely within the Kingdom of Sweden, but into the general affairs of Europe.

The Crown is entailed upon Gustavus his Family.

Note.

Gods Blessing upon his Family.

But as Gustavus his House grows in their hopes, so Christian, the deposed King loseth in his. The Emperour being intent upon his Wars with France, found it necessary to quiet his affairs in Germany; and therefore amongst other things at the Convention at Spire, the difference between him and Christian the third, King of Denmark, came under debate, and was settled; And Christian the second, the Emperours Brother-in-Law, was after fourteen years of imprisonment, left still to be a Prisoner, who seeing himself now quite neglected by his chief Friends, bethought himself how he might make his Captivity (seeing it must be his condition) as easie as he could; And for that end he actually surrendered all his right, and the right of all his posterity in the Crown of Denmark, and the Dukedomes of Holst, and Stewick, in as ample manner as could be devised, and thereby indeed he obtained, though not a release from, yet more liberty in his prison.

Christian resigns his Crown.

The Title of Sweden was not at all mentioned, neither did the Svedes require any resignation, nor would acknowledge any Title. Yet the Emperour was willing enough to countenance any quarrel that was picked against the King of Sweden, as appeared in the business of the Elector Palatine, and the Duke of Lorain touching their Nieces Dowry (which, as they pretended, the Kingdom of Sweden ought to take care of) but the matter went no further than words. The claim was published in Print, and so was the King of Swedens answer alio, who denied the matter of fact, and alledged that if any thing had been formerly due, it was made null by that inhumane Tyranny, whereby Christian forfeited all his rights in Sweden, for himself and posterity: declaring also that now the publick Revenues of the Crown of Sweden, were otherwise settled, and could not be altered.

Gustavus
his Posterity.

A while after, the King of Swedens second wife dyed, leaving three sons, and four daughters. Her Eldest Son [John] was afterwards King of Sweden, when his eldest brother Ericus was deposed by the people for his misgovernment. Her second Son [Magnus] was Duke of East-Gothland. Her third Son [Charles] was Duke of Sudermania, who afterwards was King upon the deposing of his Nephew Sigismund, first King of Poland, and after Crowned also King of Sweden, but after a while was ejected by the People, because he would not maintain the Liberties of Sweden, but sought to advance the Polish interest. After the Death of this Charles, his Son Gustavus Adolphus succeeded in the Kingdome (whose Life I have also written) and after him, his Daughter Christina, who resigning the Government, Charles Gustavus, Son of Katherine, daughter to Charles, and half sister to Gustavus Adolphus, married to one of the house of Casimire, succeeded, who lately dying, left an Infant in the Throne, since when, Christina would willingly have reassumed the Government, but was rejected by the States, the rather because she was turned Papist, who reserve the Kingdome for the Son of Charles. A brave posterity doubtless; Yet the King, though now stricken in years, could not live unmarried, but took a third Wife, Katherine, Daughter to Gustavus, Governour of West-Gothland.

Gustavus
grows famous.

The Wisdome, Courage, and prosperous success of Gustavus, being now Famous amongst other Nations, occasioned sundry applications to be made to him for assistance; but he was ever wary of moving out of his own sphere.

Note.

Its an excellent point of skill in a Commander to know when his strength hath attained its just bounds of Conquest, and there, stopping his desires of gaining more, to fix upon the good Government of what he hath already gotten. It was one of the last counsels given by Augustus to Tyberius, that he should not endeavour to enlarge the bounds of the Empire, lest he should meet with more difficulty in keeping, and less in losing what was gained. For the larger the borders are, the more opportunity is given for invasion from abroad, and for rebellion at home. The wisdome, and moderation therefore of Gustavus is to be commended; For though he wanted not men of War, nor hope of success in further undertakings, yet having adventured for the delivery of his Country from Tyranny, and accomplished it, he desired no further happiness upon earth, than to maintain what he had gotten; yet was he once over-reached by the Livonians, who proffered to commit themselves to his protection, which he refused; yet when they were much endangered by the Muscovites, he sent aid unto them, who engaging too far, and the Livonians hanging behinde, the whole burden was left upon the Swedes, who finding the Muscovite too heavy for them, and the Livonians heartless, or faithless, withdrew their assistance betimes, and made their own peace.

Policy of Princes.

Its a usual policy amongst Princes to be slow in advancing their eldest Sons (who are to succeed them) into places of Government, and not without cause; For in such cases, especially in times, and places of darkness, their designed successors, if well gifted by nature, or education, may prove Heads of Parties, and Factions, and thereby put the present Governours to much trouble, the one being looked upon as the rising, the other but as the setting sun. Yet it seems more prejudicial to the people to have a raw and unexperienced Governour set over them, who knows not how to govern himself. And therefore if Ericus had been more exprienced in Government,
he

he might have proved, either more advised by the over-ruling direction of his Father, or else he would have discovered himself so far, as that he would never have been trusted, and so many troubles might have been prevented, which ensued afterwards.

But it is vain to call back things which are already past, the time draws on a pace which must determine the work of this great King: He had now governed the Kingdome of Sweden long, and had seen many changes in other Nations as well as his own, and yet must out-live one more in Denmark before he leaves the world. For about this time died Christian the third, King of Denmark, by whose decease the Kingdome was put to the hazard of an other Election, which concerned Sweden not a little; For Christian, the captive King was yet alive, and had another fair opportunity to try the curtesie of the Lords of Denmark: But they being unanimous for the choice of Frederick, the Son of the Duke of Holst, him they Crowned, and Christian was still set aside. Unhappy man, that having lived a prisoner seven and twenty years in his own Nation, could not in all that time, by his carriage gain a better Opinion amongst the Nobility of Denmark, but that still he remained under the note of an impenitent, and obstinate Tyrant.

The King of Denmark dies.

Another chosen.

Note.

It is the Opinion of Wise Men, that the breach between a King, and his People is like the Divorce between a Man, and his Wife, never to be made up again; And yet the difficulty lyes not in any determinate judgement, or Rule upon the Case, as that of Divorce doth (and therefore comes not within the compass of impossibility) but in the distemper of the parties, by ambition on the one side, and jealousy on the other, both hard to be cured: yet the first, leading the way to the second, if that be first allayed, the second may be cured. And this Christian might have observed in the example of Carolus Canutus, his corival in the Swedish Throne, who having been Crowned King, and fought successfully against the Danes and Norwegians, ruled somewhat too imperiously, for which he was ejected out of his Throne, and yet afterwards, being re-admitted, he ruled in that manner, that he dyed satisfied with Honour, and the love of his People. But Christian was of another temper, he would fain come again into the Government, but not under restraint, nor with submission, nor by leave, nor with the love of his Nation; But still depending upon a forreign interest, and the power of the Emperour, he was looked upon as an enemy, and his return, as that of the unclean spirit, that would render the latter condition of the Nation sevenfold worse than the former. For he that is a King indeed, though wrongfully rejected, will still bear the minde of a King to desire the Peoples good, and will endeavour to deserve their love: But he that depends upon the forreign interest of such as are professed enemies to a peoples Religion and Liberties, disowneth interest in his people, and therefore cannot rationally expect any re-acceptance (if that Nations Religion be right) either by the leave of God, or liking of the people.

Note.

Now whether Christian took conceit at this Election; seeing no hope of ever gaining a better condition than for the present he was in, Writers mention not; But he dyed presently after, even within one moneth of the death of Christian the third, and in the Seventy eight year of his age. And Gustavus outlived him, and all these changes well-nigh two years, seeing his people in a settled condition for Justice, Religion and Peace amongst themselves, and with all their Neighbours, thriving in Trade, industrious in Husbandry: Skillfull in improving the benefit of their Mines: Potent both at Sea and Land: And himself blessed with repute, and Honour, both from his own people, and strangers: Successfull in all his affairs; and leaving a numerous posterity behind him. And having lived seventy years, and thereof reigned thirty eight years, he gave in charge to his children to endeavour the peace, and to maintain the liberties of their Country; But especially to preserve the purity of Religion without the mixture of humane inventions; and to live as brethren in unity among themselves. All which also he left as a memorial, sealed up in his last Will, and so he resigned up his spirit to God Anno Christi 1562.

Christian the Tyrant dies.

Gustavus
dieth.

His Character.

So lived Gustavus, or Augustus, for the name is the same, which perhaps, minding him of imitation, made him exceed his pattern. His aims out-reached the Roman Empire, and were higher than the world: His difficulties and dangers greater: His enemies more desperate by conjuncture of the Devils: His labour and industry not unlike: His success beyond all, even to wonderment. If he came short of Augustus in his time of Government (wherein the difference was not much) yet he exceeded him in the manner: It being with such an excellent temper of Monarchy with Popularity: He preserved the peoples liberty with the honour of a King, and common security without Pride of Tyranny. The people living as well under the King without servitude, as in a popular estate without sedition, and yet he tempered all, with just liberty of conscience, and the true worship and service of God, which he owned as the chief Diamond in his Crown, and conveyed all to his successors by a better, and more enduring settlement than Augustus did, or could attain unto: His worst enemies never publicly taxed him with any crime but covetousness: And Thuanus (a Writer of credit in those times) gives no countenance thereto: Nor did the Patrimony left by him to his children, hold forth any such thing; and therefore if any such thing were, it was for the service of the state of Sweden, wherein, if he spared not others, its confessed by all, that he spared not his own estate. His infirmities were common to other men, and must be acknowledged vitia natura, non animi, as infirmities of nature, not of purpose of mind. If his Fame rather mounted upwards, than spread abroad, we may thank the subtilty of those times, who liked not that the splendor of his Religion should dazzle their own, and we may pity the distempers of those dawns that knew not how to value that Morning Star till it was set. It was Augustus his lot, after a long and Honourable Reign, to dye, and yet Tum quidem pauci luxerant, postea temporis omnes: Few mourned at his death, but a while after, all. For Tiberius succeeded him, who was as wicked, as Augustus was good: And whatever the people thought of Gustavus whilst he lived, a while after when Ericus came to Reign, they knew what it was to want their Gustavus: Of whom it may truly be said, that he dyed a King, a Patriot, a Knight, a Christian, true and unconquered, and yet lives a monument of the truth of that Golden Sentence, uttered by the God of Truth, Him that honours me, will I honour.

The Life, and Death of Mrs. Jane Ratcliffe, who dyed Anno Christi 1638.

Ms. Jane Ratcliffe was born of good Parents, who were Her parentage.

morally Civil, and moderately Religious, according to the temper of the times wherein they lived: Her Uncle was Master Edward Brerewood, a learned Professor in Gresham College London. In her younger years she was rather Civil than Religious, and sometimes rather merry than Civil; yet lightsome without lightness, or immodesty: Though too much delighted with dancing, Stage-plays, and other publick vanities, according to the fashion of young folkes, especially in those times when these things were so well thought of, that they were admitted to be acted in the Churches. But it pleased God, according to the election of Grace, in due time to call her by the Ministry of Master Nicholas Byfield, who was a powerfull, and a profitable Preacher of Gods Word at that time in the City of Chester; which also was seconded by the afflicting hand of God, who took away her first Child (which she much took to Heart) but God made it an occasion to make her his own Child by Adoption, and Grace. For from that time the meanes of Grace had a more kindly operation upon her, which made her ever after more to mind her Father in Heaven, than any Child she had upon earth.

Her conversion.

Yet at first, she rather feared God than loved him, whence were engendred many perplexing scruples in her soul, which for the present were very grievous unto her: For her Spirit was sore wounded, and A wounded spirit, who can bear? Prov. 18. 14. The truth is, the pangs of her New Birth were so painfull, and bitter, and sometimes so terrible, that it was a difficult thing to fasten any comfort upon her. But after the Lord had chastened her soul with his severe Discipline, and thereby had prepared her for a Cure, he shewed himself her most favourable and effectual Physician, according to that Job 5. 18. He maketh sore, and bindeth up; He wounds, and his hands make whole. For he quieted her troubled spirit, and settled it in the assurance of his love.

The manner of it.

Being thus, through Gods goodness, converted, and comforted, it pleased him to bestow many excellent endowments upon her, both Intellectual, and Morall. For by her frequent, and attentive hearing of Sermons, and reading good Books, the Bible especially (unto which she was addicted with an incredible desire, and delight) and by moving Questions to such as she thought best able to answer them, she became an excellent proficient in the most sound, and usefull points of Religion: yet took she not upon her to teach reach any but her own children, and servants, though an Apollos might not have disdained to learn of such a Priscilla, Act. 18. 22.

Her excellent parts.

Heavenliness.

She medled but little in worldly matters, and when she did, she little minded them: yet (shadowing her self from acquaintance with the world) she shined gloriously in her knowledge of God, and Heavenly matters.

Her prudence.

As she had occasion to converse with others, she shewed her self a very prudent Abigail: The Word of God as St Paul prescribeth) dwelt richly in her in all wisdom, which appeared in her speech, in her silence, in her carriage, and in her actions.

In her speech.

In her speech: For (as the some Apostle requireth) being enriched both in knowledge, and utterance, 1 Cor. 1. 5. She opened her mouth with wisdom, as that rare Woman, Prov. 31. 26. having (as St. Jerome dictated to Celantha) thought beforehand what she should speak: and while she was yet silent, forecasting that she might say nothing which afterwards she would wish to be unsaid again; And so she was fitted, and well prepared either to counsell, or to comfort: to reprove, or to plead for, as there was occasion.

In her silence.

Yet was she not (as some women would have been, with her abilities, and some without them have been) obstreperously talkative, nor affected by her words to make any ostentation of her wit, or other good parts: But very sparing of her speech, so that she was as much observed for her silence, as for her discreet discourse when there was just occasion, and opportunity. For she had learned, That In multitude of words there wants not sin, Prov. 10. 19. That Whosoever keeps his mouth, and his Tongue, keeps his soul, Prov. 22. 23. That Death and life are in the power of the Tongue, Prov. 18. 21. That Tatling women are condemned by the Apostle, 1 Tim. 5. 13. That Of every idle word account must be given at the day of judgement, Mat 12. 36. And that they who profess Religion, and refrain not their Tongues, their Religion is vain, Jam. 1. 26. This moved her, with David, to resolve, that her mouth should not offend, Psalme 17. 3.

Her Prudence.

Certainly such silence as she used (in those that know how to speak) is an argument of wisdom: For a wise man (saith Solomon) and it is as true of a woman) holdeth his peace, Prov. 11. 12. And he that refrains his lips is wise, Prov. 10. 19. And so far was she from speaking ill, especially of the absent, or of her betters, that St. Jeroms precept to Celantha, was set forth in her practice, which was, rather to look to her own life, than to carp at anothers. And she well knew, that where corrupt communication is restrained, there that which is good to the use of edifying is required: Yet was she so wise, and wary, even in the use of good words, as to observe when, and where, and before whom to use them, and the season when to give over, as well as when to begin her discourse.

Her holy communication.

Her wife demeanour.

She gave father proof of her prudence in her carriage, and behaviour: And Bishop Hall in his Contemplations makes this a very good proof of wisdom. There are some (saith he) whose speeches are witty, while their carriage is weak; whose deeds are incongruities, whilest their words are Apothegmes. It is not worth the name of wisdom that may be heard only, and not seen. Good discourse is but the froth of wisdom: The pure, and solid substance of it is, well-framed actions. And according to this we may commend her conversation for prudence in practice, above that which she shewed either in the use, or restraint of her Tongue: For as St. Jerom saith, She taught others more by her example than by her speech, much more then by her silence. She was a woman of a well composed spirit, discreetly advised, framing her affairs by good direction of grace, and reason, without any direction of humour or passion, which bare no sway over her at all, and very seldome had any shew or appearance in her, but when her discretion told her it was fit to make use of

of them for due advertisement to others; and then she would order it with such moderation, as that neither her words, nor her looks, nor her gestures, carried any colour of contradiction to her prudence and piety: So that her wisdom was a protection to the reputation of her piety against all scornful reproaches: Yea, it was a promotion of the Christian profession to more estimation in her person, and for her sake.

And though she was singularly gifted, yet was she far from their disposition who think they do nothing well unless they be singular: And though she had less to do with worldly matters than most would have had in her condition, yet therein also she gave that proof of prudence which Solomon observeth, Prov. 14. 1. A wise woman (saith he) builds her house: For she was very provident in managing her Family affairs both whilst she was married, and when she was a widow also.

Now from her Intellectual parts, let us pass to her Moral, and we shall find, that though she had a very good Head, richly stored with ingenious and religious Notions, yet she had a far better Heart, more abundantly furnished with excellent graces, whereof we will single out some.

1. For her Faith, which is the hand that turneth the key to unlock the store-house of divine Beneficence: This appeared by a Paper written with her own hand, wherein, she did set down the Articles of her faith in full, plain, and perspicuous terms, with pertinent proofs of Scripture to every point, and then she maketh particular application thereof to her self, as thus:

Her Faith.

"I do believe the Scriptures to be the very Word of God, 2 Tim. 3. 16.
 "2 Pet. 1. 21. and I have found them so to me by the witness of Gods
 "Spirit, which I have felt testifying of them, and by the unutterable com"fort which I have received by them, wonderfully refreshing my Heart
 "when it was in the deepest distress, whereby God hath made them so good "unto me that I account them better than Thousands of gold, and silver,
 "Psal. 119. 72.

The confession of her faith.

"I do believe that God made man at first after his own Image, Gen. 1.
 "26. which Image did chiefly consist in Knowledge and Holiness, Eccles. 7.
 "29. Eph. 4. 24. and out of admiration of this Image, I do long for that "time when I shall be satisfied with it Psal. 17. 15.

"I do believe that all mankind hath sinned, 1 King. 8. 46. and that the "nature of man is stained with sin from the Birth, Psal. 51. 5. I know, and "must acknowledge that the cause of all the afflictions which do befall me
 "in this life, is in my self, and I know no cause to murmur at my crosses
 "when I look upon my sin.

"I do believe that Jesus Christ is God, and my God, Psal. 68. 20. and "in that he is a God, and my God, it doth exceedingly comfort me: For "he is full of grace to supply my wants; A Counsellor to direct me in "my doubts; Almighty to defend me; And an everlasting Father to love,
 "pitty, and bear with mine infirmities, and to spare me; A Prince of peace
 "to perform reconciliation with his Father for me, and to fill me with the "peace which passeth all understanding, and that he will establish, and order
 "me henceforth and for ever.

"I do believe that the Passion of Christ was by the eternal decree, and "appointment of God, Act. 2. 23. and that his sorrows were sustained for "our sins, and for our sakes, so as he bore all our iniquities, 1 Pet. 2. 24.
 "And that in his own person, he fulfilled and finished all sufferings need-"full for our salvation, 1 Pet. 3. 18. And that his Passion (so grievous as "cannot be imagined) is a sufficient price for the sins of the world, Jeb. 2.
 "29. Therefore why should not I be willing to suffer any thing for his "sake, that hath suffered so great things for me: And say (with St. Paul)
 "God forbid that I should rejoyce in any thing but in the Cross of Christ, I "will for ever trust in him; And rely upon him as the life of my life, and

"as to me both in life and death advantage: And having such a proof of "the infinite love of God to me in not sparing his own Son, but giving him "up to death for me, shall I ever doubt of my freedom from condemna"tion, such a price being paid for the discharge of my debts by such a "surety?"

"I do believe that Christ overcame sin, death, the grave, and Hell, and "rose again from the dead, ascended into Heaven, and sitteth on the Right hand of "God in Majesty, Rom. 1. 4. And that he hath purchased his Church by "his blood, and that he is a Lawgiver to his Church, Jam. 4. 12. which "is gathered by his voice, Joh. 17. 9. separated from sinfull society with "the world: For she is an holy Church, Eph. 5. 25. yet dispersed over the "world; For she is Catholick, Eph. 1. 10. And though Catholick, and dis"persed, yet but one, Eph. 4. 4. Knit unto Christ, by an indissoluble uni"on, Col. 1. 18. And I am sure that I am a member of this Church. For "I am called out of sinfull communion with the world by the voice of the "Ministers of Christ, who are in his stead, and separated from it by the power "of the Word; And I do rely upon Christ's merits for righteousness, and "salvation. I do not delight in the society of the wicked, but in theirs
 "who fear him, whom I love with sincere affections, as the most worthy
 "people of the world; And whatsoever I want of an holy life, yet I do "not live after my old evil conversation; But I constantly endeavour to be "more and more holy. What thanks shall I give unto God, who hath "called me out of darkness into his marvellous light, and saved me from the "common condemnation of the world? O the depth of the love of Christ "unto me!

"I do believe that there shall be a generall Judgement, Psal. 9. 8. That "Christ shall be the Judge, A visible Judge in his humane nature, Act. 17.
 "13. That it shall be at the last day; But the precise day and hour "is not known to any man, or Angel, Mat. 24. 36. That then every man "shall be judged, Jude 15. and every secret thing shall be brought to light,
 "Rom. 2. 16. And that the judgement will be most just, and so confessed
 "by all, Rom. 2. 5, 6. why then should I fear the last Judgement, seeing he "shall be my Judge who is my Brother, Advocate, and Redeemer? He
 "that was willingly judged for me, will give no hard sentence against me; yea
 "he hath already absolved me from my sins, and given me the earnest of "his Spirit, and the seal of the Sacraments, and I have judged my self that "I may not be condemned with the world, 1 Cor. 11. 32.

"I do beleieve that the glory of Heaven is unspeakable, and incompre-
 "hensible by us here on earth, 1 Cor. 2. 9. That it is eternal, Math. 25.
 "45. And that it is the gift of God proceeding onely from his free Grace, "not our merit, Luke 12. 32. His free gift bestowed onely upon the Elect,
 "Rev. 21. 27. O that I could by the effectualness of contemplation behold
 "the greatness of this felicity which is provided for me! yet as I can con"ceive it, I cannot choose but long to be absent from hence, that I may be "present with the Lord, 2 Cor. 5. 8. whose admirable beauty I shall clearly
 "see, and know as I am known, and that with a perfection both of holiness "and happiness; such holiness as will not onely free me from all sin, but
 "from all possibility of sinning; such happiness, as that ceasing from all
 "labour and sorrow, I shall enjoy an eternal Sabbath, and shall be free to all "the treasures of Heaven; And (with the fruition of Gods glorious pre"sence) shall enjoy the sweet society of all the glorified Saints and Angels.
 "And all this, as it is unutterable, so it is unalterable: For as I cannot be "disappointed of it, because it is certain, so I cannot be deprived of it "because it is eternal. How then should the hope of the future life, but "swallow up the afflictions of the life present? And why should I fear Death,
 "when being dead I shall be so blessed?"

Yet was not her Faith elevated so high, but that she could readily apply it to promises of an inferiour degree: For as she trusted in God at all times, as David teacheth, Psal. 62. 8. so did she in all things, whether temporal or eternal. In straits and difficulties for the affairs of this life, she had that ready at hand: Commit thy way unto the Lord, trust also in him, and he shall bring it to pass, Psal. 37. 5. If at any time she was sinisterly Censured by any one, her faith applied that promise to her heart, He shall bring forth thy righteousness as the light, and thy judgement as the noon day, Psal. 35. 6. And whatsoever it were that came upon her as a Cross, her Faith was either as a wreath betwixt her shoulders and it, that it did not pinch her, or a remover of it from her self to him, who was best able to bear it, by vertue of that Warrant, Psal. 55. 22. Cast thy burthen upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee; And that done, her Faith, which teacheth to keep an Even pace with the promises, not making haste, Isa. 28. 16. by anticipating the time of accomplishment, taught her soul to wait upon God, as Davids did, Psal. 62. 1. to effect his own work at his own time, in his own way and manner, wherein she would not prescribe any thing at all.

Her Faith.

By this daily exercise of her Faith, she gained a great deal of freedom, and lightsonness of Spirit, which admirably appeared in her deportment upon great disappointments of that which was her own due, and unexpected payments unto others: when she hath seen no way of supply for the present occasions she hath believed that Gods Providence would effect what her forecast could not, when she was not wanting in the use of means, and that he could furnish her with that which should be sufficient, albeit for the present she saw not how, nor by what means it would come to pass; and therefore when she had done what belonged to her duty, in the affiance of her Faith, she rested quiet, and remained cheerfull, and slept neither the less, nor the worse for it; And that which confirmed her Confidence the more, was, that she still found by Experience, that God was most worthy to be trusted.

Her Comfort.

That her Faith was good as it was great, appeared by the effect of it in her Devotion and Piety, which was suitable to her knowledge of God, and her Faith in him; by both which, as she had a clear apprehension of him, so none had more dear, and devout affections to him, or more assured signs of such, than she, as appeared in these particulars:

She was frequently, and fervently conversant with God (besides the publick) in her private Supplications, and therein was he most favourably familiar with her; For he sent forth his Spirit into her heart, whereby she cried, Abba Father, Gal. 4. 6. The Spirit of Grace and Supplication, Zach. 12. 10. which enabled her in an extraordinary manner and measure to pour out her soul into his Bosome; And though she duely esteemed of the solemn Prayers of the sacred Assemblies (whereof a learned and pious Divine said, that never any one prayed well privately, who contemned, or neglected the publick prayers of the Church) and never sleighted, or censured set-forms of Prayer, yet could she, and that excellently well, conceive Prayer, and vary her Petitions as the present occasion did require.

Her frequent Prayers.

Yea in this Devotion she was so abundant in apt and pertinent expressions, that indeed it was admirable, that one so silent in her common Conversation with the world, should be so fluent, and eloquent in her entercourse with God. Nor was she more copious in speech, than fervent in Spirit: For such was her holy violence in Prayer, as that she seemed not to knock at Heaven Gate for an other to open it, but to make a battery upon it her self, and to break in by the powerful importunity of her supplications.

Her fervent Prayers.

Her service also of God in this kinde, was no dry Devotion, but steeped, and drenched in showres of tears: And though her prudence used as much privacy as might be herein, yet such a singular gift could not be hid from her servants, and some secret female Friends, who sometimes, when they were sick, or possessed with fears, or pains of child-birth, they would move her with importunity to pray with them, and when she yeilded to them, and God to her, by answering her request, they were apt (as there was cause) to impute the good effect to her fervent supplications. A female friend of hers (who was her bed-fellow in London for many weeks together) and thereby was a partaker of her daily Devotions, professed, that she was so plentifully furnished for utterance of her requests to God, that she never wanted variety of meet words to be presented unto him, but when a surcharge of sighs and tears put her Prayers to a pause.

Her private Prayers.

Her holy Speech.

When the heart is full of love, the mouth is filled with praise of a person most deservedly, and most dearly beloved, whereof, we have an example in this Vertuous Gentlewoman, who when time, company, and occasion did invite her, to communicate to others the good matter which her heart indited of God, she used her Tongue as the pen of a ready writer, Psal. 45. 1. And when she had that great King for the subject of her speech, she spake of him with such hearty and savoury Relishes of Sacred delight and Reverence, and with such an affectionate force, as if her Soul were ready to leap out at her lips into the ears of others, to kindle the same holy fire in their hearts, who heard her, which burned in her own bosome, Longing (as David did) that others might taste, and see the goodness of the Lord, Psal. 34. 8. That they might be Rivals with her in her Religious Love; and glad she was when any sinner was converted, or any already called, better enabled to promote the glory of God, and that was the end which she principally aimed at in her godly discourse of him.

Her Humility.

In giving vent to her heart in this duty, she could spend her spirits with great delight, both to herself, and to those choice Friends who had opportunity to hear her, when just occasion was Ministred unto her; and yet when she had spoken best, she found matter of complaint in her own expressions, as being too faint, and too flat, and so far below that which was meet for the Majesty of the great God, inasmuch as all the Acceptation which she desired of him, was but to pardon her presumption (as the Errour of her love) for taking upon her to speak of his Excellency, and the weakness of her spirit and speech, which made her fall infinitely short of doing him right in the publication of his praise.

Her love to Gods children.

Another evidence of her dear affection unto God, was the great love, which for his sake, she bore to whom, or whatsoever had any near Relation to him, according to that 1 Joh. 4. 21. He that loves God must love his Brother also: And he must love him rather in a direct, than in a collateral line, as Gods childe, rather than as his Brother, more for Gods sake than for his own: The dearest degree of love belongs to those persons and things which are nearest to him, and to such she bore a sincere, and singular good will: As to his Saints with David, Psal. 16. 3. and to his true Religion, and worship, both at home, and abroad, the happy progress and prosperity whereof was with her (as Jerusalem with David) preferred above her chiefest joy, Psal. 137. 6. And it was a great affliction to her heart, to hear any ill tidings of any good man, or any good cause.

And to the Church of Christ.

Her love to the Word & Sacrament.

She highly prized Gods word, and in the blessed Sacrament of the Lords Supper, she felt such a sweet refreshing as might make amends for the severity of her frequent Fasting, so that for her part and portion of it, in respect of the common sort of Communicants, she might say, I have meat that ye know not of, Joh. 4. 32. Dainties, which infinitely exceed whatsoever delighteth, or pleaseth a sensual palate: For the House of God, she shewed her self just of Dauids minde, when he said, I have loved the habitation of thy house, the place where thine honour dwelleth, Psal. 29. 8. And How amiable are thy Tabernacles, bernacles, O Lord of Hosts, my soul longeth, yea even fainteth for the Courts of the Lord, Psal. 84. 1, 2.

If by any imperious impediment she were kept from the Church (as by sickness in her body, &c.) her soul was love-sick by her longings to be there; and House of God. And whereas many women take a little occasion to absent themselves from it, she would many times force her feeble body to carry her soul to the Sanctuary, though the day before she were confined not only to her chamber, but to her Bed; whereby, though she hazarded her health, yet it pleased God so graciously to accept of her zeal to his House, that she was never the worse for those pious adventures.

She kept a great distance from doting on the world, which St. James condemns as enmity to God, Jam 4. 4. Though, while she lived, she could not choose but be in the world, yet did she so love her dear Lord Jesus Christ, that for his sake she was exceedingly estranged from the world; which appeared.

1. By her estrangement from sensual delights, which she shewed by her frequent Fasting from meats and drinks: By her abstinence from such sports and pastimes as before her Conversion she had been too immoderately addicted unto, And by her firm resolution to forbear Marriage after her widowhood, and to rest in that condition wherein she might best attend upon the service of God.

Indeed her love, and delight in communion with God, made her mindless of meat, and careless of provision for the flesh. Well she knew, that though Fasting makes the Body weak (as David saith, My knees are weak through fasting, and my flesh faileth of fatness, Psal. 109. 20.) yet it strengthneth the spirit, and maketh it vigorous in Conflict, and Victorious in the Event; yea Fasting and prayer make a potent combination, which is able to drive the strongest Devil out of his usurped possession, as Matth. 17. 21. These two she used, not onely as weapons against the Devil, but as wings to elevate her soul God-ward and Heaven-ward; yet herein was she observant of our Saviours Rule, Mat. 17. 18. that she fasted without an appearance of Fasting, onely the next day it might be discerned by her faintness, she having spent her Spirits in spiritual exercises the day before.

For those Sports and pastimes wherein formerly she had taken too much contentment, she not onely abstained from them, but much complained of her vanity in them: Her eyes (which before were used to behold them with delight) now shed tears of shame and sorrow, that formerly she had set her mind so much upon them, and now she employed them in the more frequent and affectionate reading of the holy Scriptures, wherein she took more delight than she had done before in the most pompous Spectacles, set out to take the eyes with gazing, and the mind with wonder.

And as for Marriage, her heart was so devoted to her Lord Christ, that though she had divers fair invitations to it, by such as both for profit, and credit, and other considerable respects, were worthy rather to be desired, than denied, yet she resolved not to change her condition in that kind, and that not onely in love, and Loyalty to her former Husband, but that she might be more free to serve God according to that of St. Paul, 1 Cor. 7. 34. The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy both in body and spirit, but she that is married careth for the things of the world how she may please her Husband.

2. She had so chosen God for her portion, and set up her rest in the riches of his love, that she had but little mind of the worlds riches. She knew, that riches may be had, and well used of the Religious; and that poverty alone commends no man unto God, as St. Jerome speaks, yet did she not dote upon them; But though she was competently careful and frugal, as Christ prescribeth, Joh. 6. 12. Gather up the broken meat that nothing be lost; and though she was provident as the Apostle requires, 1 Tim. 5. 8. If any provide vide not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an Infidel; yet withall, believing that of the Prophet David, Psal. 37. 16. A little that the righteous hath is better than the riches of many wicked; and as conforming her self to that of St. John, Love not the world, nor the things of the world, 1 Joh. 2. 15. She often besought of Almighty God rather to make, and keep her poor, than to suffer her heart in any sort to sink down from her Maker, to dote upon Mammon.

Her bounty
to the Ministry

She was one that could very well find in her heart to honour God with her substance, as Prov. 3. 9. She was as cheerful in her layings out for him, as any Miser could be in his layings up for himself; and when she heard of the irreligious Parsimony of some towards the maintenance of the publick Ministry in that City of Chester, she hath professed that she had rather be at all the charge of all the common Contributions her self (if her estate would bear it) than that God should be Grumbled at, or his service poorly prized, or the wages of his work unwillingly paid.

Her desire to dye.

Another undoubted testimony of her true love to God, was, in that she so much desired to dye out of a fervent affection to him, insomuch that she feared a long a life would keep her too long from the enjoyment of him; being therein like unto David in those ardent Aspirations of his. As the Hart panteth after the water Brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God: my soul thirsteth for God, for the living God, when shall I come, and appear before him, Psal. 42. 1, 2.

That which worldlings are most afraid of, that she so much wished for, that her Friends were fain to plead with her to be pleased with life, though she, not being contented with their Arguments, contended against them by contrary reason, shewing first why she did desire to dye. Secondly, why she was not afraid of Death, and hoping that it would not tarry long, she had in readinesse some special matters to be remembred at her Death, which she left in writing under her own hand, and are as followeth:

First, Why I desire to dye:

Why she desired
Death.

"I desire to dye, because I want while I live, here, the glorious presence of God, which I love and long for, and that sweet fellowship of Angels, and Saints who would be glad of me as I am of them, and would entertain me with unwearied delight.

"I desire to dye, because while I live, I shall want the perfection of my nature, and be as an estranged, and banished person from my Fathers house.

"I desire to dye, because I would not live to offend so good a God, nor to grieve his holy Spirit: For his loving kindness is better than life it self: And he is abundant in mercy to me, and it doth lye as an heavy load upon my heart many times, to think of displeasing him.

"I desire to dye, because this world is generally infected with the plague of sin, and some have this Plague-sore running upon them, and I my self am tainted with the same disease, so as whilst I live here, I can be in no place, nor in any company, but I am still in danger of being infected, or to infect others, and if this world doth hate me because I endeavour to follow goodness, how will it rejoyce if my foot do but slip? Therefore how woful would my life be unto me, if I should give occasion to the world to triumph, or blaspheme in respect of me? I cannot choose but desire to dye, when I consider that sin, like a Leprosie hath so corrupted me, that there is no soundness in me, my Minde, my Memory, my Will, and Affections, yea my very Conscience is still impure; In every faculty of my soul there is a miserable mixture of vile infection which makes me aweary of my life; And all this is the worse, because it is incurable; and an inseparable companion of my life, so that I can go no whither to avoid it; there is no business that I can dispatch that concerns my happiness without a muteny in mine heart;

Though

"Though Gods works be all fair works, yet there are in my nature many defects, insufficiencies, mistakings and transgressions; So that I may say with David, Innumerable evils have compassed me about; mine iniquities have taken hold on me, so that I am not able to look up, Psal. 40. 12. I therefore desire Heaven for holiness, rather than for happiness, that I might sin no more. I desire that condition wherein I may most glorifie God.

"I desire to dye, because of the Devils malignant, and uncessant assaults: I can stand no where before the Lord on earth, but one Devil or other, is at my right hand, and must of necessity enter into conflict with them, and their temptations, and be buffeted and gored by them, which a Thousand fold worse than Death: More easie it is to wrestle with flesh and blood, than with those Principalities and Powers, and spiritual wickednesses, and great Rulers of the world: For they are subtle and cruel; and like roaring Lions they go about seeking whom they may devour, 1 Pet. 5. 8.

"I desire to dye, because by Death I shall rest from the hard labours of this life.

"I desire to dye, because nothing in this world can give me solid, and durable contentment: I am less in liking of life, and have more desire of death when I consider the misery that may come both on my Body and Estate, and fearful alterations may come, and wars may come, and all the desolations and terrours which accompany them, and I may be left in the hands of the sons of violence: Besides, I daily suffer the loss of my Friends who were the companions of my life, and means of much contentment unto me; And those whom I lose by my life, I shall find by my death, and enjoy in another world unto all eternity: And for my children it doth not trouble me; For that God which hath given life and breath, and all they have, while I am living, can, without me, provide for them when I am dead; my God will be their God, if they be his, if they be not, what comfort would it be for me to live? my life would be exceeding bitter unto me if I should see them dishonour God whom I so much love.

When she enjoyed the greatest portion of temporal or spiritual comfort, yet would she never say, Master, it is good to be here, as Matth. 17. 4, but making that but a step for an higher ascent, she rather inferred, It is good going hence: For if on earth there be so much good, how pleasant and desirable is Heaven; The joyes on earth to those that are there, are but as the earth is to Heaven, little, and low, dark, and heavy.

Why I do not fear Death.

"I fear not Death, because it is but the separation of the body from the soul, and that it is but a shadow of the body of death, Rom. 7. 24, where as the separation of the soul from God by sin, Isa. 59. 2, and of soul and body for sin, is death indeed. Why she feared not death.

"I fear not Death, because Death is such an enemy as hath been often vanquished, and because I am armed for it, and the weapons of my Warfare are mighty through God, and I am assured of victory.

"I do not fear Death for the pain of it; For I am perswaded I have endured as great pains in life, as I shall finde in Death, and Death will cure me of all sorts of pains; And because Christ dyed a terrible and cursed Death, that any kinde of Death might be blessed to me; And that God, who hath greatly loved me in life, will not neglect me in death; But his Spirit will succour and strengthen me all the time of the combate.

"I do not fear Death for any loss: For I shall but lose my Body by it, and that is but a prison to my soul, an old rotten House, or ragged garment; nay, I shall not lose that neither: For, I shall have it restored again at my Saviours second coming, made much better than now it is: For this wile body shall be like the Body of Christ, and by death I shall obtain a far better life.

And

And as an incentive of Divine love, she prepared a breviary of God's principal benefits to her self for meditation on her Death-bed, and for thanksgiving to God, which was this:

Her thankfulness.

"How shall I praise God, 1. For my Conversion. 2. For his Word; both in respect of my affections to it, and the wonderful comforts I have had by it: 3. For hearing of my prayers: 4. For godly sorrow. 5. For fellowship with the godly. 6. For joy in the Holy Ghost: 7. For the desire of death. 8. For contempt of the world. 9. For private helps and comforts. 10. For giving me some strength against my sin. 11. For preserving me from gross evils both before, and after my calling, &c.

Her universal obedience.

She shewed her holy love to God, by conforming her practice to his Precepts, according to that Joh. 14. 15. If you love me, keep my Commandments. She thought nothing too much that she should stick at (if God commanded, or forbade it) nothing so small, but his Word was able to give it weight enough to bow down her neck to the obedience of it. If it was a greater matter that he required of her, she considered, that he was a God infinitely, both great and good, and that unto her, who had and would do for her ten Thousand times more and greater things than she could do for him: If it were a little thing, she conceived that the contempt or neglect of it would aggravate her guilt, as Naamans servants said to their Master, If the Prophet had bidden thee do some great matter, wouldst thou not have done it? How much rather when he saith unto thee, wash, and be clean? 2 King. 5. 18. The less the duty is, the more is the disobedience if we do it not; For thereby we extenuate the Authority of the Almighty, and such as slight it in a little thing, will not regard it in a greater: She was therefore very precise in every point which God required the performance of.

Her love to God.

By this means she still increased in holiness and sanctification, and kept a greater distance from great offences, according to that of St. Jerom, Non cito ad majora progreditur, qui parva formidet, who so is afraid of a small sin, will not easily grow bold on those that are greater. Her love to God was strong as death, Cant. 8. 4. yea, and much stronger, so that Death could not affright her; For she desired daily to look death in the face, nor could it hurt her more than she was content to endure: For though it was not likely that she should go through the narrow wicket of Death, and not be pinched in her passage, yet was she well contented with it, seeing it was the ready way to come to God, whom she so much longed to behold.

Her Charity.

Her Charity was very chary of the credit of the absent, towards whom she would not suffer either her Tongue, or her Ears to be guilty of any wrong or robbery of their reputations. She never imposed false crimes, or feigned faults upon others: She never discovered their secret sins, or aggravated those that were known: She never denied, dissembled, nor diminished the vertue or good parts of any. Though her hatred of sin was such as became a sincere Christian, yet knew she how to distinguish betwixt sin, and the sinner, and setting a severe dislike on the one, she reserved (as charity required) love, or compassion for the other.

Her Charity was regular according to the Rules of Scripture, which she set down in a paper with quotations of Texts for her direction in four particulars, 1st. I must give readily, Job 31. 16. Prov. 3. 28. 1 Tim. 6. 18. 2ly. I must give secretly, Matth. 6. 3. 3ly. I must give liberally, 2 Cor. 8. 12. & 9. 6. 4ly. I must give cheerfully, 2 Cor. 8. 12. It was answerable also according to her own ability, and others necessities: She had rather give a little to many (since the number of the needy is very great) than a great deal to a few; And she so ordered her charity, that she might still be able to exercise her hand that way; And not as some, who give so much, that after a while they can give no more. And upon extraordinary occasions, if she were not magnificent, the let was not in her minde, but in her means.

Her Charity was vigorous, and so cordial, that what she gave was alwayes without grudging, knowing that God loves a cheerful giver, 2 Cor. 9. 7. yea she was so cheerful herein, that she bestowed nothing upon her self with more readines, than she did upon others, whether it were towards the maintenance of the Ministry, or in giving Almes to the poor; And yet herein did she follow the rule of our Saviour, Matth. 6. 3. Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doth; For she was many times as close in giving her own, as a Thief would be in taking away from others; So that none did more good deeds with less shew, or sound of words than she.

For the object of her charity, she took her direction from the Apostles precept, Gal. 6. 10. Do good unto all, but especially to the household of faith. She indeed shut up her charity from none that had need of it, but she enlarged it chiefly to such as were of the faithfull.

Her love and charity was very intire and great to her Friends, yet not so confined to them, but that she reserved a competent measure for them that dealt unfriendly with her, or that were enemies to her. If there was any unkinde difference between her, and any one, though she enjoyed the freedom of her judgement to think as there was cause, yet would she not suffer her affections to be estranged from them, but was ready to do them good, if power, and opportunity did furnish her for it. She requited love for hatred, pity for spight, friendly offices for offensive usages. She bare ill will to none. She hated nothing, but that which is worse than nothing [sin] and that she hated in all, and most of all in her own soul.

As her Charity was evidenced by doing, so also by suffering: If any tribulation were upon others, or imminent over them, she was like minded with her Lord and Master, according to that of the Prophet, Isa. 63. 9. In all their afflictions he was afflicted. She did passionately sympathize in the sufferings of her fellow-members: If it was ill with the Church, or any particular Saints, it was no better with her. Charity made her suffer as much by inward affection, as they did of their enemies, by outward affliction.

Her Patience also was very remarkable: For though her apprehensions were quick enough to conceive any thing tending to the disturbance of peace and patience; yet she enjoyed such a calmness of spirit as could hardly be turned to a storm. If any were injurious towards her, her tongue could more readily pray, and her eyes weep for them, than with looks, or words of indignation, or disdain set upon them. If she were angry at others, which was very seldome, it was sin, their sin that was the cause of it. If news came to her of any losses in her estate, as sometimes there did of great ones, yet was she never put out of temper with those ill tidings, having these considerations ready at hand to quiet her heart: It is that God that gave all, that now taketh away some, why should I take it ill? He would not have me to be in love with, nor relye upon uncertain riches, which were never true to any that trusted them, but upon himself; and I willingly renounce them to rest upon him. He can, if he see it good, recompence the loss in the like, or some better kinde. If he take more, there will yet be many poorer than my self; And if he take away all my goods, he can give me content without them, for he is All-sufficient; and so though I have nothing, I may be as possessing all things, 2 Cor. 6. 10. The world and I must part, and whether we be unstiched by parcels, or torn asunder by taking all at once, all is one to me; that which he chooseth is best for us both, for his own glory, and my good, if I grudge not against him, but willingly (as I pray) give way to his will.

Patience
how tryed.

By bodily sufferings her patience was exceedingly tried both for the truth and strength of it: For of some of her children she had long, painful, and very perilous labour; But that which exceeded all, was, a long, and sore sickness, to which were applied very rough and irksome remedies; so that she suffered not onely the anguish of her disease, but many things also of the Physicians, as that woman in the Gospel, Mark 5. 28. And had it onely been pain and torment, it had been more tolerable; But it was accompanied with a strange infirmity and deformity: Her jaw being faln, she could not bring it up towards her upper jaw: Her mouth was drawn awry towards her ears, so that with much difficulty both to her self and others, her food was conveyed through so crooked a passage to her throat, Which might have caused the greater discontent to her minde, because it was the shipwrack of much beauty and comeliness, which until then was seated in her countenance, and whereof she kept remarkable impressions to her dying day; yet shewed she admirable patience under this great affliction, to which her Heart was brought meekly to submit; and concerning which, she said, that if it pleased the Lord still to continue her a spectacle of deformed misery, she would not repine at his doing, or her own suffering, but would willingly, abide it untill he freed her Body from the disease by health, or her soul from her Body by death.

Her Modesty.

Her Modesty also manifested it self by her shamefaced estrangement from sin and vanity, concerning which vertue in her it may be said, that it was rather sometimes too much, than any time too little, and it shewed it self divers wayes.

1. In her looks, which was habitually composed to a modest and gracious gravity, so that against any thing that was unseemly to be said, or done, she carried a severe rebuke in her very countenance; or if any were so immodest as to speak, or do any thing before her, not becoming Christianity, her modesty made some supply to their want of it, she would blush for them.

2. In her Speech, whereas some would have vaunted themselves, or made some vain-glorious shew of such sufficiency as was in her, she rather shadowed her own light with a dark Lanthorn: and therefore in that wherein she was a teacher, she carried her self as in the person of a learner, rather asking Questions, than making Resolutions, or giving rule, and directions unto others.

3. By her silence: For as St. Ambrose saith, Though silence be a rest to other vertues, yet is it a chief act, and exercise of Modesty; yea, her pace, her habit, and her whole behaviour was a lesson of modesty, which, together with her other vertues, wrought a kinde of awfulness in her person, so that those that had not grace to do well in private, were more afraid and ashamed of an appearance of evil in her presence, than in the sight of many a Magistrate.

Her Humility.

As for Humility, she made great account of it; she studied it seriously, and got it so by heart, that there was no need of Art to make profession or ostentation of it. Solomon makes contention the proper effect of pride, Prov. 13. 10. So peaceableness is a sure sign of Humility; and this she shewed in that she could endure Contradiction, Reproaches, and other trials of Humility without a quarrel, or breach of peace with any, being still ready to deny her self, and to yeeld to others so far as with a safe conscience she could. Once a new Gown being brought her to put on, and presented as a gift from her Husband, wherein his kindness had put him to more cost than she wished, to make her more fine than she desired to be, she humbly besought him with tears that it might not come upon her back; she said indeed little with her Tongue, but her eyes spoke much, because she was loath to contradict him whom she

she was bound to obey; and at last she submitted to his will, though against her own, not onely because that habit was no better than others of her rank did wear, but because it was a testimony of her Husbands love, and of her own loyal subjection to his will; wherein she followed the advice of Bishop Hall in his Contemplations. It is not (saith he) for a good wife to judge of her Husbands will, but to execute it; neither wit, nor stomach, may carry her into a curious inquisition into the reasons of an enjoined charge, much less to a resistance, but in an hood-winckt simplicity she must follow whithersoever she is led, as one that holds her chief praise to consist in subjection, following her Husband, as the Israelites did the cloudy Pillar, which when it stood, they stood; when it went, they followed. And indeed it was no marvel that she was so obsequious to her Husband, for amongst her papers were found special directions, which she had drawn out of the Scripture, for her conjugal affection, and behaviour towards her Husband, which were these which follow, under this Title;

Duties which concern me in particular.

"I must submit my self to my Husband, as to the Lord, Eph. 5. 22.

"I must account him my Head, Eph. 5. 23.

"I must be in subjection to him in all things, as the Church unto Christ, Eph.

5. 24.

"I must get his consent even for those times that I set apart for Religious duties, 1 Cor. 7. 5, 10.

"I must walk pleasingly towards him, 1 Cor. 7. 34.

When by his death she was loosed from the Law of her Husband, she would have returned to a meaner habit; but because it was suitable to the place which she held in the City (as having been wife to him who had been twice Mayor of Chester, and divers times a Burgess of Parliament) and for that God made such good things neither onely, nor principally for the use, and wearing of the wicked, but for his children; And that it might not be imputed either to singularity nor Nigardize, she made no remarkable change in her attire; and indeed, to keep down pride, she would not eat the bread of idleness, Prov. 31. 27. but willingly wrought with her hands, as that vertuous woman did, vers. 13. and readily descended to such homely offices as were meet for the meanest of her servants.

Notwithstanding such excellent gifts and graces, wherewith God had enriched her soul, her mind was not lifted up to Vaunting or Vanity, nor to the undervaluing or envying Gods gifts in others, but in Lowliness of minde, she esteemed others better than her self, Phil. 2. 3. disavowing her own praise, though those that gave it, thought it much less than her due, and advancing others far before her self, though in gifts they were far below her; and no marvel, for she was not as those who are far more curious to know the faults of others than to correct their own, but an exact enquirer into her own life, a severe Censurer of her own imperfections and failings; and as for others, she observed them most for that which was best in them, to make her self more holy by imitating them therein, and more humble for that wherein she fell short of them.

Her preferring others before her self.

She often presented, and arraigned her self before Gods Tribunal, to bring her self down in submission as guilty before him, begging pardon on her knees at his hands, and she came the lower by comparing her own faultiness, infirmity, and misery, with his infinite Purity, Power, and Majesty, in comparison of whom, All Nations are but as the drop of the Bucket, or the small dust in the Ballance, Isa. 40. 15. which made her to think of him with admiration and love, and of her self with detestation and loathing, and when she took notice of any good thing in her self, she boasted not of it, even because she had received it, and that of Gods free gift, making it a Memento of thankfulness to him that gave it her, knowing that he might have passed by her, and given it to another, and that he might be provoked to take it away from her, if she should take any of that glory to her self which was due unto him alone.

Her self-denial.

Her Sincerity.

She alwayes held this for a Maxime, that if it be good to be esteemed vertuous (and most desire to be so esteemed) than to be so indeed, is much better; For the substance of a good thing is alwayes better than the semblance of it; therefore she was so sincere in her whole course, that she hated the least appearance of Hypocrisie: She was one of those whom David blesteth for their integrity, Blessed are they who keep his Testimonies, and seek him with their whole heart, Psal. 119. 2. Her love was without dissimulation, Rom. 12. 9. She loved not in word, or in Tongue onely, but indeed, and in truth, 1 Joh. 3. 18. and this appeared in that she made her deeds of charity and good will alwayes better than her words, whereof she was so chary, that some blamed her for want of affability, which being objected to her, she said, I like not the lavish language of some, who have their mouths full of complemental curtesie to every one, though their hearts be shut and Contracted, when their mouths are so enlarged; and if they have love enough within to maintain such liberality of words without, I like my own heart the worse, that it is not so ready to attend upon my tongue, as on the sudden to Minister Cordial affections meet for such frank and friendly expressions. She used rather to let her Friends see her love by her works, than to hear it by her words.

Her Constancy.

Her Constancy also was very remarkable, by which her spirit was stedfast with God, and her Heart stedfast in his Covenant, as the Israelites should have been, but were not, Psal. 78. 8, 37. Her Faith was grounded and settled, Col. 1. 23. So that she was not carried away with divers and strange Doctrines, Heb. 13. 9. much less with every wind of Doctrine, Eph. 4. 14. But what she was for Faith and godliness from her first Conversion, the same she was in all places, at all times, and in all companies: But for the measure or degree of Grace, she was not, as a stake in an hedge, which grows not, but as a plant in the Garden that springeth up, no dwarf in Gods House, but one that by Spiritual Nourishment, and daily exercise of her graces, grew up apace towards the stature of Christ, and as its said of the path of the just, Prov. 4. 18. She shined more, and more unto the perfect day: So that she was best at last, and most heavenly minded when she had the least time to tarry on the earth.

Her growth in Grace.

She was a Loyal, and obedient Wife; A careful, and kind, though not a fond Mother; A gentle and beneficent Mistres; A good and a charitable neighbour, and a true and constant Friend.

Her sickness

Towards her latter end she fell into some Bodily distempers, wherein she had fits or trances, like the embrions of death, which (by a Gradual failing of her spirits) left her at last unable to speak or move, yet without any great alteration in her countenance, which by some, was conceived to be a spice of the Mother; It was short, and not sharp, for she felt no pain; yet when she returned to her self, she found that she was commonly more feeble than before.

Upon the Munday seven-night before she dyed, was the first assault given, which set Deaths pale colour upon her face and fingers from the middle joynts towards the ends; Her nails turned to a blewish black, which being rubbed a while, returned again to their former complexion, and she remained that night indifferent well; the next day her disease appeared in the form and quality of a kindly ague, and so continued mostly till within three or four dayes before her end, and then it turned from an intermitting Ague to a continual Fever, that afflicted her with extream burning, and other pains which commonly accompany such a disease, especially when it rageth most as it doth towards the latter end.

During her sickness, having the free use of all her faculties, her soul, no doubt, was was exercised in holy meditations; For which she had kept in store many particulars of importance to be remembred at her departure out of this world. Her desires were strong for a speedy dissolution, so that she implored God with the request of David, Psal. 38. 22. Make haste to help me, O Lord my salvation: and Psal. 40. 13. Be pleased O Lord, to deliver me; O Lord, make haste to help me: And this she desired that she might have a joyfull meeting with him, and fruition of him, after whom her soul longed, even then when her life was most lightsome, and her condition most comfortable: And now the time drew near that her desire was to be granted in that kinde which she most desired, by the power of death, to pass to the Authour of life, which she did in such a calm manner, that when she was thought to be but asleep, she was found to be dead, on Friday, August the 17. Anno Christi 1638. Her Death.

The Life, and Death of Mr. Ignatius Furdaine, who dyed Anno Christi 1640.

Ignatius Furdaine was born at Lime-Regis in the County of Dorset, Anno Christi 1561. And when he was yet young, he was sent by his Friends to the City of Exeter, to be brought up in the profession of a Merchant; and from thence, being about fifteen years old, he was sent into the Isle of Garnsey; And God by his good providence having brought him to that place, did also there effectually call, and convert him by his Grace: So that from that time he resolved to be like that wise Merchant in the Gospel, Mar. 13. 46. to part with all for that Pearl of great price; whereas others did make it their great work, and highest design to get the Pelf of the world, and to load themselves with thick clay, Hab. 2. 6. And in testimony of his thankfulness to God, he left by Will a considerable Legacy to the poor of Lime where he was born; and to the poor of Garnsey, where he was new-born. His Birth and Education.

God seasoning his heart with Grace in his younger years, the general course of his life, did for the future relish of it, according to that of Solomon, Prov. 22. 6. Train up a childe in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it. For as he was trained up in Religion from his youth, so he continued not only in the form and profession, but in the life and power of it, until his old age, and death. His Conversion.

In the whole tenour of his life, his piety was most eminent; and indeed, there have been few observed to hold such constant, and close communion with God, as Master Furdaine did. It was his constant practice for many years together, even to his old age, to arise between two and three of the clock in the morning, and that even in the coldest seasons of the year, and His holy life.

His early rising to converse with God.

Time precious.

to spend the time in secret Meditation, and Prayer, until, fix a clock, which was the appointed time for his Morning-sacrifice in the Family; At which time he was called from his secret devotions to the exercise of Religious Family-duties. And if at any time he had over-slept himself (as he accounted it) and did not rise until four a clock, he would much bemoan himself, for the loss of so much precious time, wherein he might have enjoyed sweet, and comfortable communion with God: Surely, had he not experimentally, found much sweetness in this his spiritual converse with God, as David did Psal. 104. 34. he could not have continued so constantly therein. And having thus awaked with God in the morning, and renewed his acquaintance with him day by day, its no marvel that he did walk with him all the day long after.

He is slandered and vindicated.

In all his affairs and dealings, his care was to walk very exactly, and sincerely, according to St. Pauls direction, Eph. 5. 16. But though in all things he studied to approve himself to God, and to walk as in the sight of God, 2 Cor. 2. 17. yet could he not escape the malicious censures of men, who charged him to do all in Hypocrisie. He well knew that he had the imputations of dissembling, and Hypocrisie cast upon him, by men void of charity and sincerity; But the testimony of his own conscience did more comfort him, than the uncharitable censures of men dejected him; And he used upon that occasion to take up the words of Job, Till I die, I will not remove mine integrity from me, Job 27. 5. Many have oft heard him to profess, that he would not willingly commit a sin to get a world, though the evil which he would not do, that did he, as Rom. 7. 25. (as it is incident to the best of men) yet did he bewail it with grief of heart.

The sincerity indeed both of his intentions and actions hath been questioned by some, who were not ashamed to say, that under colour of doing Justice (when he was a publick Magistrate) and providing for the poor, he robbed the poor, and helpt to keep his own house by that which was due to the poor: But for that fals-hood that was thus charged upon him, there were none that could ever better clear him from it than himself, not onely his conscience witnessing for him before God, but his Books (wherein he kept an exact Record of all the money which he received by way of mulct from Swearers, Drunkards, &c. according to the Law) and the Officers that distributed the money, testifying his integrity before men; So that he might truly say with Jacob, Gen. 30. 33. My righteousness shall answer for me; and so it did herein both before God and men.

Nay, he was so far from depriving the poor of their right, that he added much of his own, distributing six-pences and shillings even when he had no money in bank.

He had not onely the testimony of his own conscience, and of good men, for his upright and just dealing, but even of such who had little goodness in them. A prophane Gentleman jeering at his heavenly discourses; Another of good quality, though of little piety, replied, Well, Gentlemen, you may laugh at him, but on my conscience, he meaneth well, and whosoever of us goeth to Heaven, shall meet Master Jurdaine there.

His heavenly Conversation.

He was a man that made conscience of all the duties and exercises of Religion both in private, and in publick: His frequent discourses of Heaven, and the way thereunto, and assurance of his interest therein, did declare that his Heart and conversation were much in Heaven. He used to take occasion to confer of Spiritual and Heavenly things with all sorts of men that he conversed with. One should feldome hear him speak but of Heaven and heavenly things. His heart was so full of Heaven that he could not but utter, and breath it forth in his discourses with men, and especially with those whose hearts and faces were towards Heaven: When he was at Table receiving his dayly food, he did usually minister occasion of holy discourses courses, and diverted vain, and unprofitable talk, to such edifying speeches, as might minister grace to the hearers, according to that exhortation, Eph. 4. 29. He took occasion from earthly things to speak of Heavenly; as from the sweetness of the creatures, to speak of the infinite sweetness which is in God; From feasting on earth, to the sitting down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the Kingdome of Heaven, Matth. 8. 11. and feasting with God and his blessed Saints there. And when the Table-cloath was taken away, he would often say, In heaven there is no taking away, here we are soon satisfied, and cloyed, but there will be such a feast, that we shall be continually delighting our souls with it, without any cloying, And his manner was to close his meals with singing some short Psalm.

He delighted much in reading good, and holy Books, and especially that Book of books, the sacred Scriptures, wherein he most delighted, and thereby shewed that he had the property of a godly man, set down Psal. 1. 2. & 119. 97. The word of God was his meditation all the day long, yea both day and night. He did not onely read the Bible above twenty times over, but he read it with special observation (as appeareth by the Asterisks, and marks in the Bible which he used) making particular application to himself. The like course he took in reading over that usefull Book of Master Rogers his seven Treatises, and other practical Books, wherein he was very conversant, and his collections out of several Authours do abundantly testifie. And he took so much delight in reading that voluminous and excellent Book of the Acts and Monuments of the Church, that upon occasion he told a Friend that he had read it seven times over.

His zeal for God, and his glory, and against Idolatry, prophaneness, and other evils, whereby God was highly dishonoured, was most eminent, and remarkable. He was a man of an Anti-Laodicean temper; He had well learned the Apostles direction, Rom 12. 11. To be fervent in spirit, serving the Lord, and not the time. He was far unlike Ignatius Loiola, the Founder of the Order of Jesuits, who was a man of fire that was set on fire by Hell to promote the cause of the Prince of darkness; But he had an holy fire kindled in his heart from Heaven, whereby he did burn with zeal for the advancement of Gods glory, and an holy indignation against sin, and errour. He would (if it had been possible) have burnt up all the dross, and filth, that corrupted the Truths of God, and that was contrary to the wayes of holiness; and therein he was very like to Ignatius the Martyr.

Neither did his zeal carry him beyond knowledge, like that of the Jews, Rom. 10. 2. when in his zeal he used often to cry out Fie upon discretion; For he condemned only that counterfeited pretence of discretion, which was taken up, and pleaded against true and regular zeal: And truly, if carnal discretion be set up, and cried up, like the worldlings Idol, it is the part of true Christian zeal to cry it down.

He was a very strict and conscientious observer and sanctifier of the Christian Sabbath, or Lords Day. He did then rise very early as on other dayes (if not earlier) and called upon those in his Family to rise early on that day, saying, This is Gods day, and as we do expect that our servants should rise early to go about our work on our dayes, so God expects our early rising on his Day, to go about his work and service. And he used carefully to attend upon Gods holy Ordinances. The feet of them that dispenced the Gospel, were beautiful in his eyes, as Rom 10. 5. more beautiful than their Faces to many other. He was one of those Saints, that sat down at Gods feet to receive his word, Deut. 33. 3. as Disciples used at the feet of their Teacher, implied, Act. 22. 3. and he was very desirous, and willing, to learn of any that came with the Lords message unto him. He was a Mnason, an old Disciple, Act. 21. 16. yea a Disciple when he was old: It never came into his heart to cast off Ordinances, no, not when he had attained to an high measure towards perfection.

perfection. He was a constant writer of Sermons, even when he was old, and that, not for his own benefit alone, but for the good of his Family, to whom he did constantly repeat the Sermons. And if he found himself overtaken with drowsiness in hearing the word (an infirmity incident to age) his manner was to stand up, and to rouse up himself that he might hear the more attentively. He knew that Religion consisted not in hearing, repetition, and profession, but in practice; and therefore his care was to digest his hearing, and knowledge into an holy conversation.

His love to Ministers. His love was so great to the Ministry of the word, and the Lords holy Ordinances, that he did intirely love, and affect all faithfull and painfull Ministers, though their gifts were but mean; But he could not away with a lazie Minister, though he was never so learned. Where fidelity, and learning meet together in one Minister, Oh! how highly would he reverence him.

His desire to have others saved. And being desirous not to go to Heaven alone, but to draw others with him, his usuall course was, when he went with his Family to Gods House, to make an exhortation to his children and servants, that they should consider into whose presence they were going, and whom they were to hear, even that great God, to whom they were to give an account of every word, which they should hear; And therefore he required them carefully to store it up for their practice, and not to say, My Father, or my Master would not afford me time; For if they did, he would protest against them in the day of Judgement. And as he was going to the Congregation on the week-dayes, he would often finde some of the Country people that were come early to the Market, and then would ask them where they did live; and when they answered five or six, or more miles off, he would thence take occasion to shew them how vain a thing it was to pursue the world, and to neglect the care of their precious and immortal souls; And would ask them, how they could rise so early to get the world, and not rise as early to get interest in Jesus Christ, and to attain the favour of God, and assurance of eternal happiness. And then looking back upon his Family, he would say to them, You see here how these people can rise betimes to get a little part of the world, and you will hardly rise early to get the assurance of the favour of God, which is far better than the whole world.

As he returned from Sermons, he would be speaking to them that went with him of what they had heard, exhorting them to be mindfull of it, and to put it in practice; And when one of the company was troubled, hearing him to press such things upon them, he told him, that he had heard many good Sermons at St. Peters [the Cathedral] but never heard one at the great Conduit before; He presently replied, Sirs, are ye troubled to be put in minde of the word of God? I pray God the time come not, when you are in hell, that you wish you had not onely practised the Sermons which you heard at St. Peters, but had received good counsel from the Word, at the great Conduit also.

His Assurance. Thus by his diligent attending upon, and carefull applying the means of Grace, and Gods blessing upon them, he attained a very great measure of assurance, even to a kinde of Plerophory, such as the Apostle speaks of, 1 Thess. 1. 5. Much assurance, and Col. 2. 2. Full assurance of understanding, by which he was carried as with full sails, to Holy Duties. And truly, if we consider the measure, continuance, and constancy of it, there are few Christians that have attained the like. Assurance was much in his Tongue, and in his Heart; It was that which he earnestly laboured for, and obtained by fervent prayer, and diligent use of the means. God gave him the Testimony and Seal of the Spirit, and so assured him of his eternal love in Christ, as also of his Adoption, and eternal happiness in Heaven, God gave it him as part of his reward for his sincere and faithfull service.

At sometimes he had more than ordinary comforts, and incomes of the Spirit for the strengthening of his Assurance: As for instance, At a time, he being at a Sermon, and attending heedfully to those discerning and differencing marks of uprightness, which were then laid down, and one mark being more powerfully pressed, and coming fully home to his condition, he being in a deep and serious meditation, and reflecting upon himself, and finding it to be truly in him, it seemed to him as if one struck him upon the shoulder, encouraging, and saying, Be of good cheer, thou art the man: upon which he had presently such inward joyes, and ravishings of spirit as were unexpressible.

His joy unspeakable.

And as by diligence he obtained, so he carefully kept his assurance by frequent trial of himself, and his spiritual estate towards God; He used to try himself by all the marks of sincerity which he found in the Scriptures, heard by the Ministry of the word, or read in the Books of godly Divines, and thereby he did clear up his evidences for Heaven; And he did not only try his estate by some marks, but he kept a narrow watch over his Heart and wayes, and thereby his assurance was preserved; and he kept it for a long time together, even for thirty years, and more: And being asked whether he never met with any temptations of doubting of his estate towards God, he gave this answer, That he had been, and often was sorely assaulted by Satans temptations, which were set against his Faith and Assurance, and that he had been foiled in respect of the application of some particular promises; But he was not thereby driven from his holdfast of Christ, or from the assurance of his interest in the Covenant of Grace; yet still he acknowledged that his assurance, and all his ability in spiritual things, was through Christ that strengthened him, as Paul, Phil. 4. 13.

How he maintained his Assurance.

As he had this assurance himself, so he was alwayes forward to stir up others to labour for it; There were scarce any that he met with, if he supposed that their Faces were Heaven-ward, but he would be questioning with them about their assurance; blaming them if they did not diligently seek after it, and encouraging them to labour for it. And when some did ask him how they should get it, he gave them this answer, That they should importunately seek it of God, and not give him any rest till he granted it unto them; I would (said he) lock, or bolt my Chamber door, and beg it of God, and never give him rest till I had obtained it; and then he advised them that they should daily try themselves by some marks, and he often mentioned three that he used to try himself by, 1. A sincere desire to fear the name of God, as Nehem. 1. 11. 2. A sincere endeavour to do the will of God in all things required, as Psal. 119. 6. 3. A full purpose of heart to cleave to the Lord, as Act. 11. 23. and these he did not onely speak of, but pressed them with much earnestness, as longing that others should partake of that high privilege, and heavenly gift with himself.

He stirred up others to labour for it.

If he met with any Schollar, and such an one especially as applied himself to the study of Divinity, his usual question to such was, What evidence have you for Heaven? You Schollars have the best opportunities of all men for the getting of assurance; You are still looking into Gods Book, and into others good Books, and should acquaint your selves with your spiritual estate towards God, and so have a greater measure of Assurance than others.

The like course he took when he met with any others, as occasion was offered; or if he found none, he would take it of himself: Once when he was a Parliament man, being at London, and coming accidentally into the shop of an intimate acquaintance, a man of great estate and imployment, and an Alderman of the City, he expressed his wondring at so great trading for the things of the world, and thereupon demanded how he could in the midst of such worldly business attend the weighty affairs of Heaven? His Friend

Friend answered, that he hoped he looked after the good of his soul. Mr. Furdaine replied, How can you attend upon the worship of God every morning? His Friend answered, that though he could not attend upon it every morning, yet he failed not of it in the evening; Well Sir, said Master Furdaine, I will tell you in plain terms what I would have you to do; I would take all these goods, and throw them out into the street, and let them rather be cast away, and perish; then that they should be a means to ruine my soul unto all eternity.

His desire of death.

From this Assurance it was that he was so fearless of Death, He knew that Death was an enemy, as the Apostle saith, 1 Cor. 15. 26. But that through Christ, it was become a Friend to open the Gate of Heaven. Whereas Death in it self is as Bildad saith, Job 18. 14. The King of Terrors, or as the Heathen said, Of all Terribles the most terrible; yet he, being assured of his interest in Christ, found it not so to him; For he looked upon it as having lost its sting through Christ. Indeed, he made it so familiar to him by his continuall meditation of it, that he was so far from fearing it, that he did delight to speak of it, yea, earnestly desired it, and with joy expected it, whereby he discovered his great proficiency in the School of Christ. It was his usuall saying, That if Death were offered him on the one hand, and the Kings Crown on the other, he would take the Crown, and throw it into the Kennel, and choose Death far before it: He knew that he should be a great gainer by Death, and thereby obtain the Crown of life and glory, Jam. 1. 12. 1 Pet. 5. 4. and that he feared not, but rather hoped for Death. And this was further manifested, in that, when the Plague was very hot in the City of Exeter, and he being in the highest place of Authority there at that time, when the poor flocked about his house for relief, though he would not causelessly expose himself to danger, yet being in the discharge of his Duty, he feared not the infection; But often professed, that if by Gods disposing, the Plague should seize on him, he would kiss, and welcome it as the messenger of Death.

Nor was the meditation of Death then in his mind onely in times of danger, but at all times; There was not a day wherein he did not speak of it, and not onely when there was occasion offered to talk of it, but he would take occasion to discourse of that subject: As when he was invited to a Feast, he would tell the messenger that he would come if he did live so long: And when he went out of his house upon publick or private businesses, he would (as it were) take a solemn leave of his wife, telling her, that he knew not whether he should return to his House again.

Yet carefull of life.

Yet did he not so much desire Death as to undervalue the blessing of life, or to neglect the means for the preservation of it; For he acknowledged it to be a great blessing, and he was willing to live as long as the longest-lived man, if it were Gods good pleasure, and if he might do him service. And when he was sick, or in any danger, he would carefully make use of the means, that he might thereby serve Gods good providence for his recovery or deliverance, saying, That though he must trust in God, yet he must not tempt him by seeming to trust in him.

His heavenly minded-
ness.

His minde was not so much upon Earth, and Death, as upon Heaven, to which he was assured Death would be a passage for him: Sure his Heart was much upon Heaven, or Heaven was much in his Heart, as appeared by his frequent discourse of it both day and night; And our Saviour Christ tells us, Mat. 12. 34. That out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks. All that knew him, and looked upon him without a prejudiced eye, would say, That he was a most Heavenly minded man; A man that lived in Heaven as much as most that lived upon earth. When in the night he looked upon those glistering lights of Heaven, Ezek. 32. 8. the Firmament adorned with those Stars of light, Psal. 148. 3. he used to raise up his thoughts and speech much higher, even to the glory of the highest Heaven, saying, If these visible Heavens be so glorious, how doth the Heaven above them exceed in glory, where God alone shall be the light, and yet the Righteous shall shine forth as the Sun in the Kingdome of their Father, Mat. 13. 43. There was scarce any occasion administred, or any special act of Gods providence that did occur, but it would draw out some speech of Heaven from him; As when any cross, or loss befell him in his affairs, he would say no more, but, Heaven will pay for all. And when in a journey he fell from his Horse, and lay for a while in a swoon, as soon as he recovered, his first words were, Well, I see that I am now deceived, I thought that my horse would have cast me into Heaven.

These are some few heads of the breathings of his piety, to which much more might be added; and truly they which knew him will marvell, not that so much is said of him, but rather that there is so little.

He was as eminent for Justice as for Piety; when he was advanced to the chiefest place of Government in that City, to be Mayor of that honourable Corporation: He was an eminent Magistrate, and that not onely in the year of his Mayoralty; but ever after as long as he lived. He looked upon it, not as a place of honour onely, but as an office of trust, wherein he might honour God, and execute justice amongst men, and reform those evils which abounded in those times in that place: He did not glory so much in having the Sword carried before him (though it was a singular badge of honour to that City, that the Kings sword should be taken from his side, and delivered to the Mayor to be carried before him, as a signall testimony of his favour, and their Loyalty, and courage in the insurrection of Perkin Warbeck) as he was desirous to draw forth the sword of Justice against evil doers, and not to carry it in vain, Rom. 13. 4.

His Justice

He was observed to be an impartial Adminiftrator of Justice, and one that without respect of persons did punish evildoers, of what quality, or condition soever they were that did transgress the Law; whether they were Citizens or strangers that came thither, if complaint were made to him, they should not escape such condign punishment, as the Laws of the Land; or custome of the place did award. As for instance;

His Impartiality.

There was a Gentleman of quality that was complained of to him for swearing five Oaths, and for some other mildemeanours: Master Furdaine thereupon sent a Constable with a Warrant to fetch him before him: But the Gentleman gave the Constable threatening Language, so that he durst not execute his Office: Whereupon Master Furdaine sent one Constable more for him, who brought the Gentleman before him: And he being in his Court when he came, after divers good Admonitions given him, he told him, that though he was never so great a Gentleman, he could no more go to Heaven whilest he took such Courses, than he could eat that stone (pointing to a great stone in his Court); and then required him to pay five shillings for his Oaths, which he did: Then he told him that he must put in sureties for his good behaviour: This the Gentleman refused to do, alleadging that he was a stranger: Whereupon Master Furdaine commanded the Constables to carry him away to prison till he would find sureties, which accordingly they did; and as he was going into the prison door, he desired that he might return back again, and he would give Bail: When he came to Master Furdaine to do it, he again gave him many good instructions, and the Gentleman (though he was a man of a very high spirit) gave him many hearty thanks for his good counsell, and promised amendment for the time to come.

Examples of it.

The Master of Bridewell could witness how many disorderly persons were sent thither by Master Furdaine's Warrants, more than be any other Justices in his time.

The Stocks, and Whipping-post could testify what swearers, drunkards, unclean persons, and such like notorious offenders were punished, principally by his indifferent execution of justice. And if any of the offenders that were liable to the Censure, and penalty of the Law, desired to be spared, he would tell them, Here be my children whom I dearly love, and yet if any of them should commit such offences, they should suffer as you must do: and therefore I cannot remit of the penalty of the Law.

What excuses, or fair pretences soever they made, he caused the Law to be executed upon them; yea, and that the more severely, because of the greatness of the crime, and the greater dishonour that redounded to the Name of the most high God thereby.

When some scandalous offenders, for the gross sin of uncleanness were accused, and questioned before the Court, and some present (for by-respects) pleaded for them, desiring to have them spared, he wished the Watchmen that were at the Gates to keep out the Plague (it being a time wherein some neighbour-Towns were infected) should be called home: For (saith he) the Plague is in the Guild-Hall of the City: Adding further, that if they did not execute the Law upon them, he would complain of them to the Council Table: And thereupon, after much contest, there was Order taken for their severe, and just punishment.

He was ever very Vigilant, especially in the year of Mayoralty, when the government of the City lay upon him, both to prevent, and remove disorders: Inasmuch, as he would go himself with the Constables to search for idle, and disorderly persons on Sabbath dayes at night, and at the end of the Assizes, and Sessions, and in Fair weeks, &c.

A great re-formation wrought by him. Yea, he did not only execute justice, but he shewed himself zealous therein, manifesting the greatest indignation against those evils whereby God was most highly dishonoured, as swearing, and Sabbath-breaking. Indeed, swearing was most odious unto him, and had there been a greater penalty than was at that time appointed by the Law of the Land, he would most readily have inflicted it. But by his punishing as many as were brought before him, it struck such an awe into the generality, as that some that lived at that time in the City, and near the place of the greatest concourse of people, the Corn-market, observed that they did not hear an Oath sworn for many years together.

He did not only maintain his zeal against swearing, and swearers of the ordinary sort, and rank of men, but even of the highest that came within the Verge of his Authority. As for example;

His Courage.

A Gentleman of great quality, and much favoured at Court, was heard to swear five or six times in the City. Master Furdaine having notice of it, sent some Constables to demand the penalty for swearing. The Gentleman was of an high spirit, and at this time accompanied with the chiefest of the County of Devonshire, and there were divers hot spirits about him. The Constables pressed towards the room where he was, saying, that Master Furdaine had sent them to demand the aforementioned penalty: and it was like to have broken forth into a great, and dangerous contest; but a prudent Gentleman, of a more moderate temper, and one that feared an Oath, stepped forth to them, and told the Constables that this Gentleman was of an high, and impatient spirit, and had great company about him: I fear therefore (said he) that the event may be of sad Consequence if you pursue your intentions at this time; yet the Constables seemed unwilling to depart till they had what they came for; The Gentleman seeing this, said, I will now pay the six shillings to you for him, and I promise you faithfully, that I will take a convenient time to admonish the Knight when it shall do him more good than the Rigorous exaction of the penalty of the Law can at this time, and so they departed.

It

It is credibly Related that Master Furdaine being summoned to appear in the Star chamber, for an act of Justice, wherein it was supposed that he went some-what beyond the strict letter of the Law, being there in the presence of some of his Judges, who were Noble-men, and hearing them to swear divers Oaths, he told them, that they must pay for every Oath that they had sworn, or otherwise he would make it farther known.

He reforms the prophanation of the Sabbath.

When he was Mayor of Exeter, he did much reform the open prophana- tion of the Sabbaths. For whereas the Hulleis had wont to set their Mills a going on the Sabbaths; he put a stop upon them for that whole day, know- ing that that whole day was to be dedicated to God, and his worship, and ser- vice; and whereas it was usuall to sell Fruit and Herbs, and other things on the Lords holy-day; as also Bowling, Cudgel-playing, and other prophane pastimes were then much used, by his Zeal and Vigilancy, and by the care of other Officers under him, they were wholly left off, though not without much Reluctancy, opposition, and some danger at the first; For there were commo- tions and tumults, and great resistance made against him; but by his constant zeal for God, and his Day, and Gods blessing upon the same, they were at last suppressed and quelled.

And not onely when he was Mayor, but everafter, being a Justice of Peace, in which Office he continued for twenty and four years, he was much taken up in the execution of Justice, yea, sometimes for the whole day from morning till night: So that he did not onely execute Judgement in the morning, as Jer. 21. 12. after he had been with God in the Mount of heavenly meditation, but all the day long, as Moses sate to judge the people, and the people stood before Moses from the Morning untill the Evening, Exod. 18. 13.

His zeal, and cou- rage.

And when he was out of power as a Justice, he discovered his zeal as a Christian, against prophane swearing, and for the strict observation of the Sabbath, wherein there is a remarkable instance of both at once; and it was this; Master Furdaine returning from the Parliament in the company of a person of Honour, he was invited by him to stay at his house that night, being Sa- turday, and the Sabbath following, he (having observed that Noble personage to swear, as they travelled together) told him, that he would not go into his house, for that he was a Swearer, and he feared that the house would fall upon his head: Answer was returned, that he need not fear that, for the House was newly built, a fair, and strong house: To this he replied, yea but the flying Rowl of Curses shall enter into the house of Swearers, & shall consume the timber, and stones of it. But to obtain his company, the Lord pressed the inconveniencies of his Lodging in an Inne on the Sabbath day: Master Fur- daine replied, But I will never go into your house, unless you will engage your self, that no Oath shall be sworn, nor cursing uttered by you, your Lady, nor none of your Servants or Family: This was faithfully promised; Yea but then (said Master Furdaine) how shall the Sabbath be kept? The answer was, That he should have an honest Sermon in the forenoon. And what in the afternoon, said he? Except we shall have a good Sermon in the afternoon also, I will not go in. That likewise was granted, and (as it is said) all was faithfully perform- ed.

His mercy to souls.

He was not for judgement only, but for mercy also: And he shewed mer- cy to the souls of them that were brought before him, as transgressors of the Law, and to be punished according to their demerits: For he would labour to convince them of the hainousness of their offences, that so he might bring them to a sight of their sins, and to repentance for the same.

He did much encourage the Officers under him to a diligent, and faithfull discharge of their duty: And indeed they stood in much need of it, meeting with many Discouragements from some others: And when he found them some-what backward, through Timerousness, or other by respects, to execute his Warrants upon persons of high place, he would exhort them to be active, and forward in doing their duty, telling them, in good earnest (for that was his usually word) that if he had as good a Warrant from God, as they had from him to apprehend offenders, if he were required to apprehend the Devil himself, he would not be backward to put it in execution.

His justice.

His zeal was not only in distributive justice as a Magistrate: But he was conscientiously carefull as a Christian, in commutative justice, in his commerce, and dealings with men, wherein he made the Word the Rule of his practice: and if he found at any time that he had swerved from that Rule, he would Retract it, that so neither his own conscience, nor other men might reproach him for walking disorderly, and besides the Rule: and that appeared, not only by his avoiding all usurious Contracts, but also in making restitution of all that had been gotten thereby.

He restores use money.

He had sometimes taken usury for Money Lent to a person about Time, which he had received for divers years: For at that time he held it Lawfull, by reason of the practice which he had observed in some forreign States, and the Concurrent judgements of some Divines of Note, who spake in favour thereof: But upon his perusall of the Writings of other godly Divines of our Nation, and by conference with some worthy Ministers of his acquaintance, he was so convinced of the unlawfulness of usury, that he did not only forbear the practice of it for the future, but restored the interest formerly taken: and took no more for the Loan of Money, than the party borrowing would Voluntarily give him.

He did much bewail the common course of too many, who sin against God, both in getting, and spending their worldly estates. For (said he) as they get it unjustly, and by indirect means, so for the most part, they spend it lewdly, and lavishly in satisfying their sinfull lusts.

His Charity

Neither was he more famous for justice, than he was for charity, and that both in his life, and at his death: In his life-time he was a free-hearted man, and open-handed. He was a great patron of the poor: Another Job in that respect: He could truly say with him, as Job 30. 25. Was not my soul grieved for the poor? No doubt it was; and the bowels of his compassion did yearn towards them: He was an Advocate, and did earnestly plead for them, and especially for Gods poor; honest poor persons, whose hearts, and faces were set God-ward, and Heaven-ward, and his hands were very open to relieve them: He did that for them, which many of far greater estates had not hearts to do.

He would often say, that he wondered what rich men meant, that they gave so little to the poor, and raked so much together for their children. Do you not see (quoth he) what becomes of it? and would reckon up divers examples of such as heaped up much for their children, and they, within a short time had scattered, and consumed all: And on the other side, he often spake of such as had small beginnings, and afterwards became rich, or of a competent estate: giving a particular instance in himself: I came (said he) but with a groat, or six pence in my purse to this City: had I had a shilling in my purse, I had never been Mayor of Exeter. And therefore leave children but a little, and they (by Gods blessing on their labour, and industry) may become rich: But leave them a great deal, and they are in danger to be Beggars.

His care for the poor was most remarkable in the time of the great Plague in that City, which was Anno Christi 1625. For in the Mayors absence he was chosen his Lieutenant, or Deputy, and he, seeing the deplorable condition of the City, accepted of it, and then he wrote divers Letters to many Towns in Devonshire, and to some in Dorset, and Somersetshire, by which means he procured severall summes of Moneys, for the suppliall of the wants of the many Hundreds of poor, that at that time were in a very distressed estate:

estate: One that was an eye-witness related, that he had seen morning after morning coming to his door, sometimes thirty, sometimes forty, yea fifty, or sixty, or more, wringing their hands; some crying that their Husbands were dead: Others that their wives were dead: Others that their children were dead, and that they had not any thing wherewithall to bury them. Some again cried that their Families were sick, and they had not wherewithall to relieve them. Others that they had divers children, but they neither had Bread, nor Money to buy it for them. Some cried for Bread: Some for Physick: Others for Shroudes for their dead: And he not only heard them patiently; but his bowels yearned towards them, and his Hands were stretched out for their relief. For, standing within his own Shop, with his own Hands he ministred supplies unto them all, and so dismissed them for the present. And the next morning when there was a renewall of their sad complaints, his charitable care of them was renewed also: And thus he continued morning by morning, even for the space of near three moneths, till the return of the Mayor into the City.

Besides his great care of supplying the wants of such poor as came unto him, he had a speciall respect to poor House-keepers, and Tradesmen, such as were ashamed, and unwilling to make their sad, and necessitous condition known; And a peculiar care of the godly poor, concerning whom he used to advise with the Constables, and Church-wardens of every Parish, and according to their need, would proportion some relief and help unto them, and send it by the hands of the said Constables, or Church-wardens.

And his care for the poor was not only in that extraordinary season (as their exigents did require) but so long as he continued in the land of the living: And he was so constantly exercised in this great work of charity, that he did it, as it were, naturally: As the Apostle speaks of Timothy, Phil. 2.20.

But though he did well, yet heard he ill even for this, and by some it was cast in his teeth, that he made Beggars: And when he was asked by a man of place, and estate, what he would give to keep the poor from begging? (supposing that he would not be so forward therein, as he was in relieving them) he freely offered a great part of his estate, upon condition that the other would do the like: But when he saw his forwardness, the other pulled back his shoulder, and would not joyn with him therein.

He was given much to Hospitality: He would not eat his morsels alone by himself, as Job 31. 17. He well remembered the Apostles direction, Heb. 13. 2. Be not forgetfull to entertain strangers. He was most loving, and friendly to them, and especially to such as did suffer for conscience sake: As those godly Ministers who were silenced for Non-Conformity (although his own judgement was well satisfied in that point.) To him they did continually resort, and by him they were kindly entertained: Insomuch as by the profaner sort, he was cried out on as an Arch-Puritan: But by those that took Religion to heart, he was honoured with the title of Gains mine Hoste, and of the whole Church, as Rom. 16. 23.

If we consider his last Will, and Testament, we shall find in it very great and unparalleled acts of charity: As he gave one third part of his temporall estate to his wife, and another third part to his children, according to the custome of the City; so out of the other third part, he left very large Legacies, especially to the poor.

We will here omit many Legacies given to Ministers, and others, and point only at some that were more remarkeable; And take them in his own words in his Will; First, I give to all the poor of this City, and County, that receive pay of Parishes, and also to those that dwell in Almes-houses, I give five shillings to each, to be paid at my Buriall. I give to one hundred more poor people ten shillings to each, to be given to such as my Overseers shall think to have most need, the honest poor to be chiefly looked unto. Also I give 10 the poor of Lime, where I was born, and to the poor of Garnsey, where I was new born, five pounds to each place. Also, I forgive all the Moneys owing to me, if it be under the value of twenty shillings to each. (These smaller sums which he had lent to the poor were very many:) Also my Will is, and I give now more to fifty poor people of this City and County, twenty shillings to each, by my Overseers, or the major part of them. Thus out of that estate which God had given him, he gave again by way of gratitude to God, viz. to the poor, who are Gods receivers. God gave him, and left him a competent estate (after his many, and great losses) and which is more, he gave him an heart to honour him with his substance, Prov. 3. 9. and to lay it forth as became a faithfull Steward, in the service, and for the honour of his Lord, who had intrusted him with it.

It's true, some did wonder, and others did sharply censure him for his extraordinary charity and liberality, and especially for that he left no greater a part of his estate to his wife: But this may be said in his defence: That the strait, and close hearts of others, are no fit pattern to measure his large heart by. And besides, God had opened his hand in giving very liberally unto him blessings, both spirituall, and temporall, and especially spirituall, even the graces, and comforts of his Spirit: And he enjoying such sweet communion with God even above most other men, what marvel is it if he did more for God than other men use to do? And as for his wife, as he left her the third part of his estate, so likewise he made her Executrix of his Will, and thereby much more had come to her than there did, had not some Debts (which he accounted good) failed and come short both of his, and her expectation: Besides, he did assure himself, that her Brother, who was then living, and a man of great estate, would be ready to supply any of her wants.

Thus we have heard what Master Jurdaine did for God: In the next place let us see also what God did for him. Besides all those graces, which were eminently in him, and whereby he was enabled to act so zealously, and vigorously for God, which all were Gods free-gift: And that comfortable Assurance that he had, which was part of his reward: The Lord also advanced him from a mean, and low estate, to the highest place of honour and dignity in that City. His beginnings were but small, as appears by his answer to some that threatned to follow him with Suits, and not to give over till they had not left him worth a groat: To whom he chearfully replied: That he should be then but two pence poorer than when he came first to Exeter: For (said he) I brought but six pence with me hither; and yet, through Gods blessing on his labours, he gat a competent, and comfortable estate, whereby he maintained a large Family of children, and servants; kept Hospitality: was liberall to the poor, and open-handed to any pious use, even far beyond many who yet had larger estates. But when he had the greatest temporall estate, he set no great estimate upon these fading, perishing things: He set them not up in his Heart (as worldlings use to do) but trod them under his feet: And usually also he set them very low in his ordinary discourse of them, and especially when he was speaking of Heaven, and Heavenly things. And yet he did not forget to acknowledge Gods goodness in bestowing any of these outward things upon him. He found by experience that they were but uncertain riches, 1 Tim. 6. 17. And that they had wings, and would fly away, Prov. 23. 5. But he did not run crying after them, as they use to do who set their hearts upon them: Whereas he saw, and acknowledged Gods hand as well in taking away, as in giving: As Job did, Job 1. 21. and therefore was quiet, and content, having experimentally learned, in some good measure, that excellent lesson with St. Paul: I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content, Phil. 4. 11. By vicissitudes, and changes of estates, God did exercise his faith, patience, and contentation.

How God honoured him.

Having

Having passed through the severall inferior Offices, he at last ascended to the highest place of honour in the City, to be Mayor there, wherein (as hath been shewed) he demeaned himself as became a Christian-Magistrate, and his ambition therein was highly to honour God, who had thus honoured him. And afterwards he was twice chosen to be a Burgeſs of Parliament, wherein his zeal for God, and against the corruptions of the times, was abundantly manifested. He was a great stickler to have the Bill passed for the punishment of Adultery with death: But those times would not beare it: Surely some of the Law-makers knew some speciall Reason for it.

He is chosen Mayor, and Burgeſs of Parliament

When he made a motion for the passing of that Bill; One, or more of the Members in the House, cried out, Commit it Master Furdaine, Commit it; Upon which a great laughter was occasioned; whereupon he presently said unto them (in a zealous manner like himself) Do you laugh when a man speaks for Gods honour, and glory? Upon which there was a more than ordinary silence in the House. The Bill was at that time laid aside, but in a following Parliament, it was called upon by the name of Master Furdaine's Bill. He was also (as it's said) the first man that promoted the Bills for the more strict sanctification of the Sabbaths, and against Swearing.

His courage

Yea, God did not only advance him to places of honour, and dignity in the eye of the world: But gave him an high place also in the Hearts of his people; and therein God made good his promise, 1 Sam. 2.30. Such as honour me, I will honour. His name was very precious in the esteem of those that knew his worth, both whilest he lived, and since his death.

Indeed it is confessed that he was a by-word unto many, and that his name was taken up by way of reproach, but it was by such as were upbraided, and reprov'd by his holy, and gracious conversation: And he valued not their reproaches, knowing that his Lord and Master did suffer much more in this kind, and that this was but a Chip of that Cross, which, as he was commanded, he was willing to bear: Yea, he was well content to drink of this bitter Cup after his Master, and with him, he dispiſed the shame; Heb. 12. 2. which the men of the world cast upon him: Nay, he accounted it his honour to suffer shame for the Name of Christ, as the Apostles did, Act. 5.4. But some there were that brought shame upon themselves, whilest they thought to cast contempt, and scorn upon him. Amongst other instances, this one was remarkable: That being chosen Burgeſs for the Parliament, not without much opposition, and going up to London to clear the Election, at which time, there was an accusation sent up against him by a man of no mean place, and power, That he was the Host of the Schismaticks: Whereupon some presumed that he would have been sent back with disgrace: And accordingly there was a Sermon prepared by one to jeer him at his return; This being his Text, Psal. 114.5. What ailed thee—thou Jordan that thou wast driven back? Thus men of prophane spirits will dare to make the sacred Word of God to serve their own base lusts and ends. But Master Furdaine, instead of being driven back, was confirmed in the place to which he was chosen, and so shame was cast into the face of this wicked scorner. And his Sermon, or Invective rather, proved abortive.

He is reproached by the wicked.

And as Master Furdaine stood up boldly for God, so did God stand by; and for him, and assisted him, and carried him through many troubles, and dangers that did threaten, and even compass him about. One act of Gods providence, amongst many others, was most notable, in delivering him out of trouble. He having done an act of justice (as was hinted before) in punishing an unclean person, whose offence was aggravated by some hainous circumstances, being moved with an holy indignation against the offence, he went (as it seems) besides the letter of the Law in some circumstance:

Whereupon

of prayer.

Whereupon some Friends of the person punished (being stirred up with fury for the disgrace that reflected upon them; without weighing the dishonour that was done to God, and the foul blot that was cast upon Religion) resolved to prosecute him to the uttermost for it, wherein they put him to great charge, and trouble, by prosecuting him in the Star-Chamber: And when the cause was to come to a finall determination, it was much feared by many of his Friends, and through the boastings of his Adversaries, that some heavy censure would have passed upon him, to his crushing, if not to his utter undoing. But when his Friends on earth failed, he flees to Heaven for succour, and defence, and cried unto God in  Davids words, Psal. 22. 11, 19. Be not far from me, O Lord, for trouble is near: For there is none to help: O my strength, hast thou to help me. And he set apart the evening, and a great part of the night, by Fasting, and Prayer, to engage God on his side, who hath the Hearts of all men, even of the greatest in his Hands, to turn them as he pleaseth, Prov. 21. 1. And behold, the next morning he received a reall, and gracious answer from Heaven, being not only acquitted, but commended by the Lord Keeper, God stirring up the Hearts of divers in that high, and arbitrary Court, to speak for him. Thus the Lord was a very present help to him in the time of trouble, Psalm 46. 1.

His Prudence.

After he was thus (through Gods mercy) freed, and returned to his house, he piled up the Books, and Papers of all the proceedings in that troublesome, and vexatious business, under his Cupboard in his Parlour, which was the place to which he did often resort, and where he had that daily sweet, and heavenly communion with God aforementioned; and being asked the reason why he left so many Books, and Papers to lie in that manner? His answer was; These I keep in my sight as memorials, and monuments of Gods mercy in freeing me from my troubles.

Many other particulars might be instanced in: But by that little which hath been said, you may guess at the great worth of this holy man. Only give me leave to adde the observations, and testimony of Master Thomas Manton, who knew him well, who speaks thus of him:

"Master Ignatius Furdaine may in some sense be stiled the wonder, and "Phoenix of his age and place of abode: concerning whose piety, and frequent communion with God, his constant heavenliness, his charity in giving, lending and entertaining: His doing justice with impartiality, and diligence, we have already heard: And therefore give me leave only to suggest a few other passages, and observations.

"1. That for his temper, he was a man of a raised zeal, and heroicall spirit, one of those rare examples which the Lord giveth the world now and then, and therefore his actions are not to be measured by an ordinary standard.

"2. Seldome or never did any come in to his company, but he would discourse with them about holy things, asking the younger sort, how they did hope to be saved? The more grown, if they professed Religion, whether they had any assurance? which if they denied, he would tell them, that he was even ashamed of them. In good earnest (would he say) I would study the Promises, and go into my Clofets, and lock the door, and there plead them to God, and say, that I would not go forth till he gave me some sense of his love.

"3. His entertainment at his Table was free, and sufficient, but frugall, and sober: If his Wife at any time excused the slenderness of it, he would say, Brown bread, and Kennel water is good fare with the Gospel. I have oft heard him say so: There is somewhat a like saying of Master Greenhams, and possibly Master Furdaine might borrow it thence, it suiting so well with the temper of his spirit.

"4. A formall man had once preached a Sermon at the Cathedral, about "Heaven

"Heaven: The discourse was for the most part frothy, and bepeath the "dignity, and worth of such an Argument. Master Furdaine was present as "well as my self: After Sermon I went to his house (being to receive a "Letter from him to Oxford) and after many good instructions, he asked "me, if I had been at the Sermon that morning? I told him, yea, And did "you (said he) hear those wonderfull things which God hath provided for them
 "that love him? And so he readily picked out all those passages which were "any way subservient to use, and profit. It was wonderfull to me to see "how an holy Heart could draw comfort out of any thing. The Sermon
 "as Master Furdaine repeated to me, was another kind of Sermon, and seem"ed to be savoury, and spirituall. I remember with what warmth, and vi"gour he spake of it, even till this day, and hope that I shall never forget
 "it.

"5. This is not to be forgotten, his sending a Letter to the late King,
 "and expostulating with him about setting forth the Book concerning sports,
 "and recreations on the Lords dayes, which was inclosed in another to the "Bishop of Exeter, to desire him to convey it: And notice being given to "the Bishop that Copies of it were divulged (possibly by the Transcriber)
 "he thought he could not conceal it with safety, and therefore carried it to "the King, who when he had read it, in a great anger said, He would hang "him. But the Bishop (a pious man) fell upon his knees, and besought his "Majesties pardon, alleadging, That God had not a better servant, nor his "Majesty a better Subject in the whole Land. When the Bishop returned from "his moneths attendance, Master Furdaine went to visit him, and after civili-"ties past, the Bishop said, Ah, Master Furdaine, would you put me upon so "hot a service? You know there are many eyes upon me (meaning the Arch"bishops party, who suspected him as a favourer of Puritans) Yea, my Lord
 "(said Master Furdaine) there are eyes upon you, the eyes of God; and his "holy Angels, to see how you discharge your duty, and office as the Kings
 "Chaplain, and Bishop of the Church.

"6. Now and then, when he had leasure, he would usually go to his "Neighbours shops, and admonish them to take heed that the cares of the "world did not deaden their Spirits to Heavenly things; telling them, if "they had many Thousands, it would not still the cry of Conscience, pur"chase the least Favour from God, nor so much as ease the pain of the "Teeth, or keep off one fit of an Ague; yea, if money were thrown to "the Dogs, they would not so much as smell at it.

"7. He would often perswade his Fellow-Magistrates to a liberal "Provision for the Poor, and when they would ask him, where they should "have money? He would answer, God will provide; Rather than the poor "shall want, let us sell our Gowns.

"8. When he did distribute money to the Poor with his own hands
 "in a time of great Infection, and some asked him if he were not afraid of the "Plague? What (said he) afraid of Gods Visitation? Let us rather fear the "Plague-sore of our own hearts.

"9. In his troubles in the Star-Chamber, when one told him, he was "sorry that the Lord-Keeper was against him: He answered, I have a "greater Lord-Keeper than him: The Lord is my Keeper, I shall not be a- "fraid.

"It is not amiss to set down what others thought of him: I remember a "godly man observed him, that in every business (though he adven-
 "tured far) the Lord carried him through with Reputation, and so
 "compared him with another of great parts, who, though godly, was "alwayes Foiled in every undertaking. Drunkards, and frequenters "of Ale-houses, were afraid of him: He was their usual bug-"bear.

"bear; Their memento in the middle of their excess was; Its time to be gone, Mr. Furdaine will come by and by.

"The ordinary sort of men were convinced of his Integrity, insomuch as carnal and vicious men, at a time of Election of Burgesses for Parliament would say one to another; If you choose any, choose Furdaine, he will be right for the Common-wealth, and will do the City service. He was twice chosen Burgess for the Parliament, and once Mayor of the City, and once Deputy-Mayor in a time of great Infection by the Pestilence.

"The Reverend Minister that preached his Funeral Sermon, amongst others, had this Expression: Look upon his Will, and you will think him the richest man in the City. Though many exceeded him in estate, but few or none in making provision for the Poor. Delinquents seldom went from him without Conviction. A Noble mans Servant that had scorned him, being brought before him, and convicted for having sworn rashly three times, Mr. Furdaine demanded his Fine, and shewed him the hainousness of the sin, with which the man was calmed, and though he came from his companions braving, yet he returned with the acknowledgment that he was a good Justice; and when they asked him, what Furdaine did to him, he answered, He gave me good Law, and fair Words.

I have heard above thirty years ago, that some godly persons in Exeter were Convented before the Bishops Court for keeping some private days of Humiliation; whereupon Mr. Furdaine went to the Bishop (who was a godly man) to intercede for them. The Bishop told him that such Conventicles were forbidden by the Law, the state being jealous lest the seeds of Sedition or Heresie might be sown in them: To whom Mr. Furdaine replied, My Lord, Do you think that the Lord Jesus Christ, when he comes to Judgment, will say concerning these, and such like poor Christians, take them Devil, take them, because though they sought me by Fasting and Prayer, yet they did not observe every Circumstance with so much Prudence as they might have done. Whereupon the Bishop dismissed them.

His Sickness.

His Patience.

I am now come to the last Act of his Life, his sickness, and the Period of that, his Death. In his sickness, which was very painful, he being sorely afflicted with the Stone, and Cholick, yet did he manifest more than ordinary Patience, not opening his mouth in any word that might savour of repining, or discontent at his present Condition; but meekly and patiently submitting to Gods afflicting Hand, and waiting for his long-expected, and much desired Dissolution. He did then much act faith in Jesus Christ and his gracious Promises; And his assurance remained unshaken, though Satan was then busie with him by his Temptations: But being Strong in the Lord, and in the Power of his Might, he did resist him. Some of his nearest Friends that observed his confident Assurance in the course of his Life, and of his happy estate in Heaven after Death, did suppose that Satan would have set upon him with so much Violence, as to have shaken his Assurance, as no doubt he had will enough to do; but God who had him in Chains, would not permit him to do it: But he went out of the world as a Conquerour out of the Field, being through Christ, Victorious over all his spiritual enemies. One particular in his sickness may not be omitted which was, his taking all occasions of exhorting and encouraging others to constancy in the Faith, Zeal for God, and making sure of Heaven; and when his Spirits began to fail him, he would say, I cannot speak much more to you now; Remember what you have heard from me in my health. He was willing also to incite others that were absent to the discharge of their Duties; The Mayor of the City that then was, sending to see how he did, he called the messenger unto him, and said, Remember me to Mr. Mayor, and tell him from me, that he

he have a special care of these three things: To do Justice: To provide carefully for the poor; and to make sure of Heaven. His gracious Speeches in the time of his sickness, were many, and more than can be here expressed.

Having fought the good Fight of Faith, and finished his course, he sweetly, and quietly resigned up his Soul into the Hands of his blessed Saviour and Redeemer. He departed this Life, July the 13, Anno Christi 1640. being the sabbath Day.

His Death.

The sabbath was his Delight on Earth, and on that day God gave him to enjoy an Eternal sabbath with him in Heaven. As he had sweet Communion with God in the use of Ordinances for many years on that day, so he went to enjoy an immediate Communion with God on that Holy day; and after all his Labours he entred into Rest, even that glorious Rest in Heaven, Heb. 4. 11. His Departure hence was in the Seventy ninth year of his Age, and, according to his Account for the New-Birth, in the Sixty fifth year. For so long he reckoned since the time of his effectual Calling: At the Celebration of his Funerals, there hath not been known any man to be more lamented than he was, the loss being so great, not to the City alone, but to all those Western parts, the influence of his Example, as a Zealous Magistrate and Christian, reaching far and near.

His Funerals

After he had served his own Generation by the Will of God, he fell in sleep, Acts. 13. 36.

Her Father of Mrs. Margaret Duche was Master Henry Southworth, a Gentleman of a good Family: Her Mother was a virtuous and Religious Matron. He was a Merchant and Customer of London, by which means having acquired a plentiful estate, he contented himself with it, and with-drew from thence to a more quiet, and retired (that is a more happy) life at Wells, where he lived plentifully, and having onely two Daughters, his Co heirs, he gave them liberal, and pious education in all those wayes which commend, and accomplish well-bred Gentlewomen:

Her Marriage.

This Gentlewoman, who was the younger of his Daughters, was deservedly dear to both her Parents, and lived with them till their deaths, which fell out to be shortly one after another: For as they were lovely and pleasant in their lives (if I may so use the words of Dauids Lamentation over Saul and Jonathan, 2 Sam. 1.) so in their Deaths they were not divided. She was then about the one and twentyeth year of her age, at which time she was desired in marriage by many younger in years, and higher in means and lands than the Gentleman was, unto whom (with her great contentment even to her dying day) she yeilded her self, and her affections, resolving (as the virtuous Marcella in St. Jerom answered her young Woer, Cereallis, who was of a Noble, and Consular race, Si nubere vellem, utique maritum quarerem, non hereditatem) that when she married, she would marry an Husband, not an estate, though yet God had blessed her Husband with a competency of these outward things.

Her Charity

Their Marriage was Celebrated by that incomparable, and even (in this age) famous Prelate, Bishop Lake, in the City of Wells (who never married any Persons besides themselves) where, for some years, they lived together, and the Town to this day gives an ample testimony to their piety and charity. For her part, they say, as Gregory Nyssen said of Placilla, that if she prevented him not in any work of charity, yet she was sure to concur with him therein; And when she departed from thence, they soon complained, and Lamented the want of her charity. The Blinde complained that they wanted an eye, the Lame a staffe, the Mourners one to comfort them, the Languishing one to visit them, as St. Jerom said of Nepotian. For indeed, she was eyes to the Blinde, feet to the Lame; she was a Mother to the Poor and Distressed, and to those who had nothing to help them, The blessing of those (as Job saith of himself) that were ready to perish came upon her, and she caused the widows hearts to sing for joy.

From

From Wells they removed to Blackfryers in London, where she lived long under the powerful Ministry of the thrice worthy and learned Doctor Gouge, a man, famous for his pains in the Church of Christ. What her Life, Faith, Charity, Patience was, during her abode there, was well known to all in general, and particularly observed by that Reverend Doctor, and abundantly testified at her Funerals by him, so that nothing needs to be added to his full, and faithful testimony. One thing was well observed by him, and is very remarkable, that notwithstanding the many opportunities she had to see Playes, to which the neighbour-hood, and Vicinity of the Play-house there, and the frequent throngs of Gentlewomen which prest thither, might have been forcible and prevailing invitations, yet she could never whilst she lived there, nor indeed all the time of her being in London, be induced to see any of them; And being sometimes advised by her dearest Friend, to go thither, as other Gentlewomen did, to avoid too much retiredness, she answered, it is hard to say whether with more discretion, or Religion, that she liked it not, and that, next to Gods house, she could best spend her time in her own. In Gods House (if I may with reverence use Tertullians expression) she saw enough of the Scena Scenica Doctrina delectantur; Sat nobis sententiarum, sat versuum, sat etiam Canticorum, &c. Sentences, Verses, and Songs enough to delight her soul. Would she see a Tragedy? There she could see before her eyes Jesus Christ, evidently set forth, crucified amongst them; Gal. 3. 1. What a sight is Christs coming to Judgement? Kings throwing down their Crowns and Scepters, and themselves before him? In her own house she could (as Solomon describes the excellent Huswife, Prov. 31. 27, 28.) imploy her self in looking well to the wages of her Household, and not eating the bread of idleness, that so her children might rise up, and call her blessed; Her Husband also, and he might praise her.

She removed to Blackfryers.

Her Piety.

Her love to Gods House

Her Huswifery.

Her retiredness.

She was so far from the gadding disposition of other talking, walking women, that she was for the most part as a Snail, Domi parva, within her own shell and Family. And as St. Jerom portrays his never enough admired, and applauded Marcella, Raro procedebat in publicum, & Maxime Nobilium Matronarum domos visitabat, ne Cogeretur videre quod contempserat. She went seldom abroad, and especially chose to decline the houses of Noble and Honourable Ladies, lest she should be tempted to see those vanities which she resolved to contemn, and so be unwillingly wrought and brought to desire what she so willingly despised.

Her weakness.

Her holy Life.

This retiredness (as usually it doth) drew on her a decrease of Health; which occasioned, for the enjoyment of a better Air, and recovery of health, her removal to Cheswick, where she lived to her dying day, exceedingly beloved, and dyed extremely Lamented, and desired of all.

While she enjoyed her health, which yet was much interrupted, her constant, and unfailing practice was, besides daily prayers in the Family, to betake her self in the morning, and at other convenient times to her constant private devotions in her Closet; And then allotting some time (for being a wife and prudent woman, she made a little time reach far) in the education, and oversight of her children, and disposing and dispensing the affairs of the Family; The residue of the day she spent in reading Books of Piety and Devotion, and most willingly those of Doctor Gouge, by which means she made her heart, Bibliothecam Christi, a Library of Christ, and furnished her self with such a stock of Christian knowledge, and devotion, as carried her on, with much comfort and cheerfulness through all her afflictions, till she arrived at her long, and much longed for home.

Her Meekness.

Both in her health, and sickness, she was of so meek and mild a comportment, and behaviour towards all, that she conquered by it, as Ignatius advised Polycarp to do, those that had (if at least any had) any Venemous sting, or spleen against her. For her meekness she seemed indeed like that Dove in the Prophet Hosea, chap. 7. 11. that had no heart, none certainly to do any harm or injury to any. And as Solomon saith, Prov. 15. 1. A soft answer turns away wrath; so without doubt her soft and milde disposition in these rough and blustering times, kept off many an impetuous storm and shower from her. This mildness was eminently conspicuous in her sickness. One night her Husband perswaded her to use an Electuary that was sent her, she refused it twice, but in milde terms; yet the next morning she told him, that she had been too blame (it might be) in her words the night before. Often she desired all the world to forgive her if she had offended any, as she heartily forgave them all that had offended her. Her Husband told her, that he thought she had no enemies; Yea (said she) some have wronged me, but I forgive them from my heart, and desire God to forgive them.

Her Sick-
ness.

In all the time of her sickness she was never heard to use any impatient word to any, or of any, Quis unquam ab hac muliere quod displiceret audivit? That I may use St. Jeroms Question concerning another on her behalf, Who ever heard any thing from this good woman that might displease him? Or believed any thing against her, and condemned not himself of too much credulity or Malignity in believing it? Cheerful she was, yet she tempered it with such a becoming severity; severe she was, yet she allayed it with such a decent cheerfulness, that it may be truly said of her, what was said by St. Jerom of a virtuous woman, Nothing was more severe than her cheerfulness, nor cheerfull than her severity. Such a concurrence and Constellation of virtues and sweetness, such a Mirror of Charity, such a Treasury and Magazine of Chastity and Sobriety was in her. In short, she had such an eminency in single Vertues, as if she had had no more, and yet such a worthiness in all, as if she had been singular in none.

Her Patience.

Since the troubles of these bleeding times she suffered many afflictions with a Masculine patience, though much imbittered to her by a long, and tedious sickness, and the necessary, and indispensable absence of her dearest Consort, which yet she professed, that it never bred in her the least ill thought of him, saying often, that she did but desire to see him again, and to speak with him, and then she was ready, if God so pleased, the next day to sing old Simeons, Nunc dimittis, Luke 2. 29. Lord now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace. And God heard her prayer, and his also (for in this they were joynt and mutual Orators) and to her great comfort, she saw him, and spake, with, and for three weeks space they mutually enjoyed each other abroad in the house. But then the first-born of Death began to devour her strength (as Bildad speaks, Job 1. 13, 14.) and threatened to bring her to the King of Terrors; for so indeed Death is to them that have not made their peace with God: But to her, however in regard of the dissolution, and parting of those dear friends, body and soul (which had been now for two and forty years sweet, and loving inmates) a valley of Achor, Hos. 2. 15. (that is, bitterness, as the word imports) yet was it to her a door of hope to open her a passage into that better world, which she so much longed after, often professing, that there was nothing that could tempt her to wish for life, but the breeding up of her little ones; which yet now she was the less solicitous about, because she could leave them in the hands of their tender, and careful Father, not doubting (as old dying Jacob said when he was blessing the two Sons of Joseph, Gen. 48. 15, 16.) That that God which had fed her all her life long untill that day, and the Angel which had redeemed her from all evil, would bless them. And now finding her self arrested by the messenger of Death, and her body (like the house of Saul) growing weaker, and weaker, but her Soul (like the house of David) waxed stronger and stronger, took higher flights, and made nearer approaches to God that gave it.

Her Sick-
ness.

When her Husband came to her (as he did frequently) he continually admonished, and minded her of the gracious Promises of mercy in Christ, and of faith in him; and desired her to be strengthened, and comforted in them:

Her

Her answer was, she was comforted in them, she found the comfort of Gods Spirit in her, and verily believed she should see the goodness of the Lord in the Land of the living, Psal 45. 13, Ever and anon saying, I am comforted: Gods Spirit is in me which makes me endure my sickness, and more paines than you can think of, so comfortably as I do. Her Comforts.

When she knew of none by, her usual prayer was, Lord look down upon me in thy Mercy; Lord forgive me my sins; Lord assist me with thy holy Spirit; Lord thou hast assured me of the forgiveness of my sins; Lord assist me still with thy holy Spirit. And many times passing the whole Night without Sleep, she spent that time in these, and the like Heavenly Prayers, and Ejaculations, in which her Husband, and those which attend her continually, still found her when they came to her.

Never man had a more faithful, dear and loving Wife, or more careful of what concerned him than himself, and more tender of any thing said, or done against him, than if it had been said, or done against her self. And when he seemed to lament the loss he should have if God took her from him: She meekly answered, We came not into the World together, and therefore may not look to go out together. When he replied, that it would be much better for their Children if he went first, as by the course of Nature was most likely; she said, that he could do much better for the Children than she could, and thanked God for that she could now leave them with him. A loving Wife.

For the space of three weeks she kept her bed, and about a fortnight before her death, being surprized with a fainting fit, in which she was like to depart, and thereby perceiving that Earth would suddenly return to the Earth, whence it came, that her soul might be the better Winged, and prepared for a return to God that gave it, she desired that all the Family might be called up, and joyn in prayers with, and for her. At which time, observing the Grief and Passion of her Husband, and those that were present, expressed plentifully by Tears from their Eyes, she besought him, and them, not to grieve and lament for her Happiness.

About that time a Reverend Person coming to visit her Husband, he solicited him to enlarge that great Act of Favour unto him, by a greater Act of Charity to his Wife, by visiting her also whom God now visited with sickness, as also to pray with, and administer some Comfort unto her, which he most willingly condescended unto, and having taken a strict account of her Faith in Christ, and hopes of a better Life, he left her with his Fatherly Benediction, top full of Comfort; and when she was afterwards told that he came out of respect and kindness to visit her Husband, she said No, but God had sent him for her Comfort, often acknowledging the consolations which she had found by him.

When any came to visit her in the time of her sickness, at the parting, she desired them to pray for her, and often sent Messengers, and caused Letters to be directed to her Friends in London to pray for her, for that she now was preparing for another World. Prayers desired.

When she was sometimes desired for her Childrens sake to cheer up her self, her answer was, that to leave them did not trouble her, because she was assured that God would provide for them, adding, that she would willingly leave Husband, Children, and all, to go to Christ, which was just the mind of that blessed Martyr Ignatius, Befal me (said he) what will, or can, so I may enjoy Jesus Christ, my Love, my Life, that was Crucified for me; or rather St. Pauls case, expressed in that most elegant Barbarisme, Phil. 1. 23. Desiring to be with Christ, which is much more magis melius, much more better. Her Faith.

And now finding the day of her life wasted to the evening, and ready to die into Nighr, on the Lords Day before her Death, she desired the prayers. She begs Prayers.

Her Afflictions.

Prayers of the Congregation in the Parish where she lived, being well assured (as she said) that many good people would pray heartily for her. After which, some coming to visit her, and exhorting her to Patience, and to remember the Afflictions of Job, she answered, that she had had her part in his Afflictions, God having given her Luctuosam fecunditatem, as St. Jerom said of Lata, a sad, and sorrowful Fruitfulness, taking away seven of her Children in their Minority, so that she (as Hanna spake in her Song, 1 Sam. 2. 5.) that had born seven, waxed feeble, yet she comforted her self with this hope, that they were in Heaven before her, and hoped that they would be Lamps to lead her to Heaven; For she assured her self, that they followed the Lamb whithersoever He goeth; and for those two which were yet alive, she thanked God, for that she saw no ill Qualities in them. Besides (she said) that God had taken away her goods from her, but had given her Patience, which to her was of more value; and she esteemed it above them all, knowing that God was able to restore all when he pleased.

She often acknowledged Gods goodness to her in sending her a milde sickness, and not taking her away with some suddain stroke (as he did the Wife of Ezekiel, Chap. 24. 16.) or by some tormenting Disease, as he is pleased to visit some of his Dear Ones, acknowledging the wonderful Mercy of God to her therein.

She bleffeth her Children.

A week before her Death, she called her eldest Daughter to her, being to go from her to School at Putney, and putting her hand on her shoulder, she said to her, I give you that Blessing which my Mother gave me at her Death; The God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob blefs you (and then added the blessing which Aaron by Gods own appointment was to give the Children of Israel) The Lord blefs thee and keep thee; The Lord make his Face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee; The Lord lift up his Countenance upon thee, and give thee Peace. And bad her serve God, and pray duly to him both morning and evening, and fear his Name, and then (said she) I doubt not but God will blefs you, as he hath blessed me. In the evening of the same day, she commanded her younger Daughter to be brought her, and to be put upon the Bed in a kneeling posture, and then putting her Hand on her shoulder, she gave her also the same blessing as she had given to her Sister.

Her Comfort.

Four days before her death she grew a little better, which put her Friends in some hope of her Recovery; but the day following her sickness seized on her again, and so continued upon her, that she slept no more till she slept the sleep of Death; and together with her Sickness, her Piety, Devotions, and Comforts increased in her.

Her Devotion.

In the last Night of her Life, presently after midnight, feeling Death now approaching, she sent for her Husband, and Family out of their Beds, and told him when he came to her, That she was now leaving the World and Him, and expressed in many words her great Devotion, Faith and Assurance of that everlasting Life, which now she was shortly to enjoy; and desired that they might now all pray together, which they did, she still expressing much Devotion and Comfort; And after an hour spent in those Passages, she desired that the Bell might be toled for her, and some Gentlemen of her Neighbours, coming to her, before them she expressed her Comforts, and Assurances of everlasting Life as before, and with increase therein; and in prayers they continued till near the rising of the Sun.

After this she seemed for a while willing to slumber, and closed her Eyes, and so lay for a little while, but then turned her Head to the other side of the Pillow, and after a few restless turnings, she said (what the Prophet Micah had said before her, Micah 2. 10.) There is no Rest in this World, and then opening her Eyes, after some Expressions of the Comfort which she felt, distinctly knowing all that were present, and speaking to them all, she seemed med to slumber again, and after a little time, spake these Words, Come, let us go, let us go, repeating those words several times, which she spake not in a slumber, but being awake, and as perfect in her understanding, and memory, as at any time in her life. And it is a comfortable opinion that Divines teach from Luke 16. 22. That the Angels do attend on Gods children, especially at the time of their dissolution, to conduct their souls from earth to heaven; which opinion she sometimes in her sickness related to her Husband, and added, that she had heard it from the Pulpit, and read it in some Books, and she believed it to be true, and comforted her self with it.

After a little time she called for some drink, and having taken it, it began to alter her, as it seems she felt in her self, for she presently laid her self back on her Pillow, and lifting up her eyes towards Heaven, she said, Lord have mercy upon me; Lord Jesus receive my Soul; and so continued moving her Lips, and her Tongue, but her words were not heard, and then held up one hand, and then joyned both her hands together, holding them up with her Eyes still Heaven-ward, till her strength failing her, she laid down her hands by her, and stretched her self in the bed without any help, and sweetly fell asleep about seven a clock in the morning, August the 15. Anno Christi 1646. Her Death.

And August the 24. she was decently, and solemnly laid in her Bed of Rest; The House (as Job saith) appointed for all the Living, Job 30. 23. where the weary are at Rest; where the wicked cease from troubling, and hear not the Voice of the Oppressor, Job 3. 17, 18.

THE

The Life, and Death of Mrs. Margaret Corbet, who dyed Anno Christi 1656.

Her Paren-
tage.

If we enquire into the Relations of this Gentlewoman, either by Affinity or Consanguinity, or both sides, the Families are ancient, of renown, and good reputation. Concerning the Family from whence she was descended, her Father was Sir Nathaniel Brent, late Warden of Merton Colledge, a learned Knight, whose great pains, and dangerous adventures to procure the History of the Council of Trent (which he translated into English) are to be remembred with an honourable mention, and for his faithful discovery of Jesuitical jugglings, his name will be had in honour, when the names of the Popish party will rot.

Her Mother, the Lady Martha Brent, was a Lady of a Gracious spirit, abounding in Love, Meekness, Humility, love to Gods Ordinances, and Gods Children. Her delight (with David) was in the Society of Saints. She imitated her worthy Father in the sweetness of disposition, who was Doctor Robert Abbot, that learned and godly Bishop of Sarum, who was Malleus Papiismi & Arminianismi, the Hammer of Popery and Arminianisme: His excellent Works are Monuments of his Honourable memory.

Her Education.

To be born of a godly Family, and to be well descended, is a mercy not to be neglected. Master Philpot, a zealous Martyr, being a Knights Son, and an Arch-deacon, told his Adversaries that he was a Gentleman. Anabaptistical parity, and Levelling designs are worthily to be abhorred, and looked upon as a ready way to Confusion, Rapine, and Violence. So then we see that she was a Gentlewoman every way well descended. Her Ancestors were persons of Honour, and from them she had the benefit of an ingenious and liberal Education. This is much, but its more, when I say that she came of a godly stock, and of praying Relations; and indeed, this is that which Ennobles Nobility it self.

Her timely Conversion.

God in mercy began with this Gentlewoman betimes, even about the fourteenth year of her age. Then God gave her a willing minde, and purpose of heart to serve him in the dayes of her youth: Insomuch as she was swift to hear the word of God, she waited diligently at the posts of Wisdomes Gate. She wrote the Sermons which she heard (a practice used by King Edward the sixth, that rare English Josiah) and she left many volumes of Sermons of her own hand-writing, taken with great dexterity, and these are as so many choise Monuments of her Industry. She was much conversant in reading of the holy Scriptures (which can make us wise unto salvation) and she joyned with her reading, prayer, and meditation. Her delight was in the word of God: It

Her Piety.

Mrs. Margaret Corbet.

was (as with Jeremy) the joy and rejoicing of her soul, And with the reading of Scriptures she searched Expositors, and Practical Divines, and attained thereby to such a measure of Divine knowledge, as enabled her to state some Questions of controverſie for her better use, and help of her Memory, and to discourse very soundly upon the most Material points of Religion, and even above her age and sexe, to maintain the truth, as occasion was offered, with strength of Argument against gain-sayers.

Her Knowledge.

She was eminent for the grace of Humility, and when I have said she was of an humble spirit, what can be said more? This the Apostle would have us to be clothed withall, 1 Pet. 5. 7. Humility is the Ornament of all Graces: Its that Salt that seasons the best parts and graces. So humble was the spirit of this excellent Gentlewoman, that the poorest might have free access unto her, and receive courteous language from her mouth, and liberal almes from her Heart and Hand, both being opened wide for their relief. The observation of this humble deportment from her child-hood, gained the heart of her dear Husband unto her, long before she was ripe for her Marriage: Her humble spirit evidently appeared by her condescending to them of low estate. The servants in her Family, the poorest, and meanest in the Parish where she lived, will bear witness to the truth of this particular.

Her humility.

She was of a meek and quiet spirit, which (as the Apostle saith, 1 Pet 3. 3.) is in the sight of God of great price. All her Relations will attest her meek deportment, and how much she hated brawls and contentions: Her very enemies (if they would speak their consciences) can testify her readiness to pass by injuries. So far she was from rendering Reviling for Revilings, that she endeavoured to recompence evil with good, and prayed for such as despitefully used her, professing that it was the desire of her soul to do her very enemies all the Christian offices of love which lay in her power.

Her Meekness.

Special notice ought also to be taken of her Wisdome and Gravity in the ordering of her conversation. Her discourses were savoury, administering Grace to the hearers, and tending to edification. Her behaviour was modest, and grave; though she was of a cheerfull spirit, yet it was without levity: She was no tatter, busie body, no medler in the affairs of others: She was no gadder up and down from house to house, hearing, and telling of news (as too many do to the wounding of the reputations of others.) The vain and frivolous discourse of some who came to visit her, was an heavy burden, and affliction to her spirit. The discourses of such as tended to the defaming and blasting others reputation, were a great grief and trouble unto her; and when she heard such discourses, she would endeavour to turn the stream another way, and move such discourse as might be profitable for the souls good.

Her prudence and gravity.

Her Love was very eminent towards all those feared God: she was with David, a Companion to such, a Lover of their acquaintance, who were the Saints, the excellent ones, Psal. 16. 3. Inſomuch as when she apprehended any thing of God, though in persons inclining to separation, and of a contrary judgement from her, she was so compassionate, as to labour with much sweetness and candour, to convince them of their errors, and to win them to the truth; imitating herein the holy practice of learned Marcus, who gained some Anabaptists, and Seſtaries by kindness, and benefits, and overcame them as much by love as by Arguments.

Her love to the Saints.

Her holy Courage deserves special notice; For though she was humble, meek, and loving, yet she was stout, and courageous in declaring her judgement upon just occasions, before those whom she knew to be contrary minded, hating compliance against conscience, and doubting alwayes the soundness and sincerity of those who durst not own their opinions. She was much of her worthy Fathers temper in that particular, who hath been often heard to say, That a Coward can hardly be an honest man; And much of Esthers resolution, desiring rather to suffer her self than sluggishly, and silently to see the truths of God to suffer.

Her Courage.

Her frequent prayers. She was a praying Christian: She was much in prayers and tears, much in a sacred acquaintance, and holy communion with God: Her gift in prayer was very great: She was much in her Closet alone, and there much upon her knees: An excellent pattern for womens imitation, which by no means should suffer that great duty to be omitted. It was a Character of Paul, when converted, Act. 9. 11. Behold he prays. Praying Christians are the best Christians, they are prevailing Christians; and as Reverend and holy Master Dod was used to say, Never despair of that person who can but pray.

Her Constancy. She was fixed and sted-fast in Religion, having frequently read the Scriptures, and many sound, orthodox, and practical Divines, she became settled, rooted and grounded in the truth. She was one that held fast her profession without wavering. She was not carried about with every wind of Doctrine, Eph. 4. 14. neither was she of their humours, who for politick ends comply with all companies in their opinions. She kept close to the publick Ministry where she lived; There she heard the word faithfully dispensed. She neither was of their opinion, nor practice, who out of, I know not what kinde of singularity, separate from the Ministry of a godly Pastor and Husband. Her delight was very great in Gods Ordinances, and she was glad when they said, Let us go to the house of the Lord in company. She had such an high esteem of, and longing desire unto the house of God, that when her strength failed her, she would be carried thither; By reason of lameness, the feet of her body were weak, but the feet of her soul, her affections, were strong, nimble, and vigorous.

Her Family government. Look upon her in her Relations, as a Wife, a Mother, and Mistress, and you shall see she was mindefull of her duty to God in them all: Her great care and endeavour was to set up God in her Family, In order whereunto she bestowed great pains in Catechising of her children, and other near Relations committed unto her charge. Her great design was to bring them all up in the fear and admonition of the Lord, and to inculcate again and again, that main and needfull Lesson of Remembering their Creator in the dayes of their youth. Much pains she took in Catechising, and instructing her servants, especially before they were to receive the Sacrament of the Lords Supper. She used to examine them of the Sermons they heard, and she customarily read over those Sermon - Notes to them which she had taken at Church, that so they might be the better prepared to give an account thereof to her Husband. God was pleased to give her several Olive branches round about her Table, well bred, well Catechised, and well governed, and of very great hopes. As Eunice and Lois instructed young Timothy, so she instructed those hopeful little ones in the holy Scriptures, and acquainted them with the knowledge of God in their tender years. Thus according to Solomons counsel, they were trained up in the way wherein they should walk, Prov. 21. 6. And that even from their childhood; Infomuch as one of them (though very young) hearing a neighbour using the name of the Lord upon a slight occasion, reproved him for it, alleading the Commandment of God against it, Thou shalt not take the Name of God in vain. And another of them reasoning with his fellows about God and the Devil, professed that he had rather be in Hell with God, than in Heaven with the Devil. And a third, who by reason of her age could not speak distinctly, said in some discourse with her Father, that God Almighty would not bless them who tell Fibbs (meaning Lies) and that she had rather dye than tell a Fibb; so far had their Mothers instructions prevailed with them.

Her Charity. She was eminent for a charitable and bountifull spirit; she was another Dorcas, full of good works, and Alms-Deeds. That high Elogium that Solomon gives a Vertuous Woman, may properly be applied unto her, Many Daughters have done virtuously, but she excelled them all, Prov. 31. 29. Many there are that come far short of her, but very few that went beyond her in the acts of Charity. God gave her a liberal and plentiful estate, and that was a great mercy; But it was a far greater mercy that he gave her a liberal heart to do good, and to distribute: To cast her bread on the waters, and to honour God with her substance. That protestation which Job makes for his own Vindication, may fitly be applied unto her, Job 31. 16, 19. He would not withhold the poor from their desire, nor cause the eyes of the widow to fail. He would not see any to perish for want of cloathing, nor any poor without covering. The whole Country round about where she dwelt, will bear her witness, that she visited and relieved the sick, and cloathed the naked, fed the hungry, and healed the wounded. Her purse, her hand, her heart, were all open for their relief. She bought many precious Drugs, and Cordial waters: She made several precious salves, and gave them all away to such as were in need of them. She spared not her best pains, being never weary of well doing; insomuch that in the extremity of her greatest sickness (such Bowels of compassion yearned in her) she compounded several Medicines with her own hands, and applied them. Thus will her works praise her in the Gate, and being dead, she yet speaketh, Prov. 31. 31. Heb. 11. 4. For her precious name liveth. The Lord will have the name of the Righteous to be in everlasting remembrance, Psal. 112. 6. and the Memory of the just is blessed, Prov. 10. 7. And precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his Saints, Psal. 116. 15. Now this rare Gentlewoman reaps the fruit of her serving of God, and the whole harvest, whereof she received onely the first-fruits in this present world.

The usual saying is, All is well that ends well: Come we therefore to speak of her end. Her life was holy, and therefore her death must needs be happy. It pleased the Lord to exercise her with a long and lingering sickness; and amidst the weakness of the outward man, God gave her great strength in her inward man; Though her limbs and outward strength failed her, yet God was her strength and portion, and he never failed her. A few dayes before her distemper waxed high (her Husband being from home) she sent for all her Family both young and old, to come in unto her chamber, with whom she prayed near two hours, with such pathetical, heavenly, Scripture-Language, as drew admiration and tears from those that were present. She blessed her children, Counsell'd her servants, heartily and affectionately commended her Husband unto God; she wept and prayed, and prayed and wept, and could not easily part with the company, nor yet leave off praying, and sleeping.

Her Sickness.

Her Holiness and Piety.

Upon the encrease of her distemper, her spirit was much disturbed, and some impertinent speeches did fall from her, yet in the midst of all her impertinences, Grace, and the Spirit of God, did eminently declare their Power and Sovereignty in her, by many savoury and choice speeches, and sweet breathings of her soul; some of which are these that follow, I was in the Devils claws, but Jesus Christ, the sweet Bridegroom of my soul, the sweet Bridegroom of my soul (these words she often reiterated) the sweet Bridegroom of my soul hath delivered me. At another time, I am safe, for Jesus Christ is at my heart, and I would not part with him for ten Thousand worlds. Again, Come Lord Jesus the Captain of my salvation, ride on gloriously conquering, and to conquer for me, Satan, Sin, Hell, Death, and all mine enemies. Afterwards again, I was in Hell, but now I am in Heaven; I am in Heaven indeed; indeed I am in Heaven: I am in Heaven eternally; I am in Heaven, the habitation of Gods glory, unto all eternity. Much of this nature she did speak, even when her understanding was so disturbed, that she scarce did know her near Relations, and those who did attend upon her in her Chamber.

Her holy Speeches.

And now all these things are worthy to be transmitted unto Posterity, and to be had in perpetual Remembrance. She was an eminently godly Gentlewoman, being but little above Eight and twenty years of age when she died, which was in the Beginning of March Anno Christi 1656. But though she was young in years, yet was she old in Grace: She had lived long in a little time: She was a Mirror of her Age, and a Renown of her sex, a Pattern worthy of imitation. She was the beloved faithful Wife, of as an intirely loving and faithful Husband. She was a tender affectionate Mother to her own, and no less careful of those Pledges committed to his Charge. She was a most dear Sister, an affectionate Mistress, careful both of the Bodies and Souls of her Servants, that they should neither want corporal, nor spiritual Food. Her profession was with Joshua, Chap. 24. 15. Choose you this day whom you will serve; But as for me, I, and my house, we will serve the Lord. She was not onely a Friend to her Friends, but a friend to her Enemies, even unto such as desepitfully used her. All the Country round about could not but look upon her, whilst living, as a publike gain, and when dead, as a publike loss: She was very useful whilst she lived, and will be much missed now she is dead. Two things were very eminent in her: Settledness in Religion, and Holiness of Conversation. By her death the poor have lost a liberal Almoner; The sick have lost a good Physitian; The wounded have lost a good Chirurgion; The Husband hath lost a faithful Wife; The Children a tender Mother; The Servants a gracious Mistress: And not any that knew her of all her Neighbours and Friends, but they will find a great loss, and miss of her. All that knew her loved her, but onely such whose love is not worth the having. She lived much desired, and dyed much lamented: For her to live was Christ, and to die was gain, Phil. 1. 21. She was honoured in her life, and she was honoured at her death, by a confluence of many persons of quality, of the Gentry, Ministry and Neighbourhood round about, who by their concourse at her Funeral, shewed plainly in what an high estimation she was amongst them, and that her good Name was like a precious Oyntment poured forth. The hope of Glory was that sovereign Cordial which abundantly revived, and satisfied her spirits whilst she lived, and now her hope is turned into Fruition, and her Faith into Vision. All, her sorrows and sighings are turned away and her imployment is without the least tediousness, without interruption, and intermission to sing Hosannahs, and Allelujahs to him that sitteth upon the Throne, and to the Lamb for evermore.

This Life was drawn up by my Reverend and worthy Friend Dr. Henry Wilkinson, principal of Magdalen Hall, Oxon.

The Life and Death of Mrs. Elizabeth Wilkinson, who dyed Anno Christi 1654.

Mrs. Elizabeth Wilkinson was born of godly Parents, of an ancient, and well reputed Family of the Gentry in Devonshire. Her Father was Mr. Anthony Gifford her Mother Mrs. Elizabeth Cottle, and by them she was Religiously educated during her minority: After which she lived with an Aunt (an old Disciple) above twenty yeares together, where she had many prizes put into her hands to get Wisdome, even many spiritual advantages for her eternal good. But considering that no helps of education, nor any means could prove effectually with out divine influence; it pleased the Lord out of the riches of his mercy, in a signal manner to vouchsafe a blessing to all those helps, for the good of her soul, and to crown all endeavours in order thereunto with good success.

She was observed from her childhood to be very docile, very willing to learn, industrious in reading of, and swift to hear the Word of God preached. She was very carefull to remember what she heard, and took much pains in writing Sermons, and Collecting speciall Notes out of practical Divines. She had the Ornament of a meek, and quiet spirit; with that she was eminently adorned: She looked not (as too many do) upon gaudy, and vain dresles as any Ornament: She neither liked them, nor conformed to them, but went in a grave, decent, and sober attire: She was humble, Gentle, tender hearted, and full of bowels of Compassion, remembering such as were in bonds, as if she had been bound with them, Heb. 13. 3. She was of so affable, sweet, and courteous a disposition, that she gained abundance of love, and respect from all those that conversed with her: and by this means she was the greater gainer by all good Conferences. It was her usuall custome to move good discourse, and oft-times she turned the stream of other impertinent talk into something which was solid, and tended unto edification, and that Ministred Grace to the Hearers.

She kept a Diary of Gods dealings with her soul, & of other various dispensations that she met withall. She was much busied in prayer, meditation, & self examination. She would often desire her Husband, and others of her acquaintance to deal plainly, and impartially with her. For (said she) I would not be deceived with a formall profession, nor with a temporary faith. Perhaps through affliction you may judge far better of me than I deserve; wherefore I desire you to sift and search in Grace.

In process of time, after a carefull watching over her heart, and frequent addresses made unto the Throne of grace, she found returns answerable to her prayers, and desires: God gave her a large measure both of parts, and graces: She was able not only to assert the truths of God, but to convince gain-sayers. She abounded in love, faith, meekness, humility, and the rest of the graces of the Spirit, insomuch as she became a Christian of the higher Form, a tall Cedar of Libanus, a grown, solid, and excellent Christian.

Her afflictions sanctified.

It pleased God for the trial of her graces, to exercise her very much in the School of affliction. Insomuch as ten years before her death, she was (one time reckoned with another) at least half the time sick. But God ordered this sickness of her Body to be a medicine for her soul. For the spirit of prayer was much set on work hereby; and her Faith, Love, and patience did appear, and shine the more eminently. Out of the Furnace she came forth as gold purified seven times: so that the rod, and staff, correction, and instruction went together, and by these fatherly chastisements her soul did thrive more abundantly. When she was able, she neglected not the frequenting of the publick Assemblies: They were her delight: and she was a professed Adversary to the withdrawing from the publick Congregations of the Saints. Both them, and the godly, and Reverend Ministers of the Gospel she had in high esteem, and revered them all her dayes: And when she was not able to go to the publick Congregations, she used to spend her time in reading, praying, and meditating at home, and imployed her Friends to read to her, and pray with her. Such as were Stable, and sincere Christians, were her delight: Those she accounted more excellent than their neighbours. She would often say, that She valued no friends like to those who were Friends to her soul.

Concerning her deportment, and carriage to her Relations (for such as are real Saints shew it in their severall Capacities) never was a Wife more full of sincere love, and respect to an Husband, whom she loved entirely, and was as entirely beloved by him. Her affection to her children was very tender:

She was carefull to Catechize, instruct, and to train them up in the fear of God; and upon her Death-bed, amongst many other excellent Counsels, and instructions, she added this charge as from a dying Mother, that they should remember that they had a Mother, who would not allow them in any sin. She was carefull also to instruct her servants, and to teach them the fear of the Lord. Indeed she was ready, and willing (as opportunity was offered) to do good unto all: and as need required, gave unto them, both corporall, and spirituall food. She had a large heart, and improved it to do a great deal of good in a little time: Insomuch as the poor, the sick, the afflicted, and the unexperienced to whom she was very mercifull, and usefull whilst she lived, had a very great miss of her when she was dead. In brief, she was one of those Worthies of whom the world was not worthy: And yet to give a further Character of her, I will here set down a Narrative, Copied exactly out of her own hand-writing, of Gods gracious dealing with her soul, as it follows word for word.

The time,
and manner
of her Conversion.

"It pleased the Lord out of the riches of his grace, to remove me from an ignorant place where I was born, and to bring me very young, into a Religious Family: And when I was about twelve years of age, upon the reading in the Practice of Piety, Concerning the happy estate of the godly, and the miserable condition of the wicked in their death, and so for ever unto all eternity; it pleased the Lord so much to affect my heart with it, as from that time my heart was wrought over to a desire to walk in the wayes of God. But at that time, I fear, I did not go upon a right principle, for I then

"I then did not eye the glory of God in it, but only my own safety, that it might be well with me for ever. But quickly after that I had but begun to set my face towards Sion, I was set upon with many temptations; and perplexities in my thoughts, which were very troublesome to me at all times; but especially when I was alone: The consideration whereof brought an horror upon my conscience, inasmuch as I did not know what to do. That little I had, whether from education, or from the light of Nature, caused a striving in me continually against those thoughts of Atheisme, which were most terrible unto me. I was sensible that it was a fearfull sin to have any such thoughts to Lodge within my Brest: but I desired from my soul to be freed from them, and had continual reasonings within me against them, and yet still for a long time I was troubled, but could not acquaint any with my condition. I did not think that it was so with any other as it was with me.

Satan's malice.

"In this strait, when I knew not which way to turn me, even there did the Lord extend his compassion towards me in my greatest extremity, in directing me to read Calvins Institutions, and especially that part that treats of the Creation: Whereupon the Lord was pleased to give in such satisfaction to my soul, concerning those things about which I was troubled, as that from that time forwards I was not violently assaulted in that kind.

Gods mercy.

"But no sooner was I freed from that trouble, but new ones sprang up: For the very remembrance of that horrid sin of Atheisme, left such a terrour upon my spirit, as made me fear that I had committed that sin against the Holy Ghost: And so my condition seemed to be, not only for the present, but, in my apprehension then, for ever most miserable. All other sins, though never so great, I knew upon true repentance were pardonable: But this sin, that I lay under the fear of, I knew out of the Word of God should never be pardoned: which caused many sad fears upon my spirit known to God alone.

Satan's subtilty.

"For the removall of these fears, the Lord in mercy directed me to the reading of Master Scudders Works, Where are laid down the marks of that sin. Upon perusall whereof the Lord was pleased to satisfy my misgiving heart, by a clear manifestation to my soul, that I had not committed that sin; and so assured me that though my sins were great, yet were they pardonable, which put me more cheerfully upon the use of such means as the Lord had directed me unto. And having satisfaction given in, concerning this particular, there was a great burden taken off from my spirit. Although I found no grace in my heart, nor discovery of the love of God unto my soul, yet, in that there was but a possibility, there was a ground of comfort administred to my heart; which I formerly feared that I should be shut out from. But still my fears remained, that I was not one of those in particular for whom Christ died: The more I looked into mine own heart, the more I saw of Sin, and Satan, discouraging me from having any hope, that the Lord should accept of such a vile sinful wretch as I was, who had entertained such sinfull thoughts.

Gods mercy.

"I likewise thought how small the number was of those that should be saved, in comparison of others; and my Repentance, I feared, came short of that which was required in the Gospel. As for Faith, I could not find the least measure of it in my soul, with many other sad discouraging thoughts. But when I was most perplexed with fears, and doubts, even then did the Lord graciously dart in some beams of his reconciled Countenance, as I was reading something in Master Scudders Christian daily Walk, &c. which the Lord set home upon my soul, and brought into my soul so much joy, and comfort at the present, as neither my tongue, nor Pen can express: But this joy remained not long, for I quickly lost the sense of it: yet the remembrance of it was sweet unto me at all times.

Her fears and doubts.

"But after this, all my former fears returned afresh again upon my heart,
"only I had a door of hope opened, that when God saw it best for me, he "would return, and renew his reconciled countenance unto my soul in the "clear light, and apprehension thereof: and this was when I was about six"teen years of age. After which time the Lord did exercise me with va"rious dispensations: For, for two years space, I was by providence cast up"on a place, where I heard very little powerfull preaching, small helps for "the good of my soul, but what the Lord was pleased to give in by the "use of private means. But his power, and abundant mercy, was much seen "in that time, that, though I had not much comfort, yet the Lord was plea"sed to keep up my spirit in a way of depending upon him; and my fears "were less at that time, than formerly when I had more helps:
"So gracious was the Lord unto me, in keeping me alive in a time of "famine.

"After this, through Gods goodness, I was sometimes under the preaching
"of a powerfull Minister, [Master Bateman of Ockingham] who was Crown"ed with the Conversion, strengthening, and building up of many souls: un"to whose preaching the Lord gave such a blessing, as I seldome, if ever,
"went away from hearing him without comfort. Though I came to hear "him with many doubts upon my spirit, yet the Lord so ruled, and directed "him, as if his Sermons had been only concerning my particular, and he fully "acquainted with the whole condition of my soul. Sometimes the Lord di"rected me to some supporting Promises, upon which I relied: But those "Promises which were made to Believers, though I highly prized them, yet
"I durst not apply them to my self, fearing that I had no interest in them.
"But that Promise, Prov. 28. 13. He that confesseth, and forsaketh his sins, "shall find Mercy. And that 1 Job. 1. 9. If we confess our sins, he is faith-
"full, and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteous-
"ness. And the Promise is 1 Job. 2. 1, 2. If any man sin, we have an Ad- "vocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the Righteous, and he is the propitiati"on for our sins; and not for ours onely, but for the sins of the whole world;
"And the Invitation, Isa. 55. 1. Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the "waters, and he that hath no money, come ye, buy, and eat, yea come, buy wine
"and milk without money, and without price, together with the rest of the "Chapter; all those places the Lord often made a stay unto my soul: And "afterwards the Lord so blessed one means or other unto me, insomuch as I "was kept from sinking, and falling into such horreur as many of the peo"ple of God sometimes fell into.

"But yet my fears and doubts were so many, as that my comfort never "lasted long: If the Lord did but hide his face, I was troubled. No longer could
"I believe (then I found new strength given in) that the Lord would ever "have mercy upon my soul. The sense of Original sin, and Actual trans-
"gressions in their filthiness, and guiltiness, caused my fears yet to remain
"upon my spirit, my faith then seemed very small, if I had any, which I "much questioned: I durst not then say, Lord encrease my Faith, but I could "cry earnestly, Lord work faith in me. I found much dulness and deadness,
"manifest distractions in duties, so that God might justly have withdrawn
"himself from me for ever, yet notwithstanding all my uneven walking "with God, he was graciously pleased to manifest his mercy unto my "soul.

"When I was stricken with such weaknesses, as I apprehended might quick"ly have ended my life, I fell into a great fear: At the first, finding my heart
"to sink, the Lord was pleased to give me so much respite, as to pour out
"my soul before him, desiring strength and support from him to keep up my "spirit, and to make me willing to submit to his dispensations, and the Lord
"graciously

"graciously answered my prayers, in that he removed all my former doubts, Her prayers answered.
 "ings, and fears, all the time of that sickness, which was long, and so dangerous, that neither I, nor others expected my life. The Lord then cleared up my evidences for Heaven, and gave me in so much comfort against the apprehension of death, as I never had in all my life before.

"Other like trials of the Lords love I found still, when I was in the greatest extremity, and stood most in need of help from him, insomuch as at such times, I have hoped that I should never again have questioned the love of God to my soul: But I have found it otherwise by sad experience: For when these impressions were worn of, I have been ready to call all in question again concerning my poor soul. It made me oft to think of that which was laid to Solomons charge, that he forgot the Lord that appeared to him twice. I found it the hardest thing to believe, that ever I went about. But this was a hard thing to believe. A hard thing to believe.
 "vering condition could not satisfy my soul; For the Lord giving me sometimes a glimpse of his love, made me long after fuller enjoyments of it, so that I was carried out with a restless impatience, to beg that the Lord would take away the heart of unbelief from me, which did both dishonour him, and hinder me from that peace which the Lord was willing that his people should enjoy.

"My heart then being brought unto that frame, I was more willing than ever I was before, to impart my condition unto some spiritual Friends, whom She imparts her condition to Christian friends.
 "I desired to deal impartially with me, acquainting them with the whole condition of my soul, how far the Lord had carried me on; and at what I stuck, and still as new objections did arise, I laboured to get satisfaction: Being convinced that I had too much prejudiced my self in that I had not sooner made my condition known, to some who were able to give me advice.

"This way of communicating my condition, I found the Lord blessed unto my soul, insomuch that my hopes were more confirmed, my fears more removed, my faith more strengthened, and by the hearing of such Sermons And finds comfort.
 "and reading such Books as came closest unto the conscience, and were most for trial of ones spiritual condition, I found the greatest benefit by, and received the most comfort from them. Formerly I had many fears that I was not one of them who had an interest in the Election of Grace: But the Lord afterwards put into my heart to enquire whether I had those Graces of his Spirit wrought in me which none but his own elect people could have.

"Upon the strictest searching into mine own heart, the Lord was pleased after many years of fear, at last, to evidence unto my soul that there was a change wrought in my heart, will, and affections; notwithstanding the remainders of sin and corruption, which still encompassed me about. Being Her self-examination.
 "confident that he that had begun this good work, would not leave it unfinished unto the day of Jesus Christ; and the Lord was pleased to set home divers Promises for the strengthening of my Faith; to wit, those which are down the Everlasting Covenant, 2 Sam. 23. 5. The Everlasting Love of God, Jer. 31. 3. Joh. 11. 13. The certainty of the Foundation, 2 Tim. 2. 19. The Certainty of the Promises, 2 Cor. 1. 20. They are all in Christ Yes and Amen; and that the Children of God have eternal life promised unto them, and that none shall be able to pluck them out of Christs hands, Joh. 10. 28. Then for divers years the Lord was pleased to stay me, to lead, and guide me, till he had set my feet upon that Rock which is higher than I, from whence I trust, that I shall never be removed. And now my hearts desire is, to ascribe that measure of hope and comfort which the Lord hath given me at any time, solely unto the Her thankfulness.
 "praise of the Glory of his Grace, who hath made me accepted in his Beloved, which is so great a mercy as I can never be thankfull enough for, nor walk answerable thereunto. I know, when I look into my heart, there is matter

Her Faith. "of fear that the Lord will withdraw the influences of his comforts from me: But that which I rest upon is, the free mercy of God in Christ, expecting performance of his Promises made, Rom. 6. 16. Sin shall not have dominion over you, because you are not under the Law, but under Grace: And Ezek. 36. 25. that he will sprinkle clean water upon me, and that he will give me a new heart, and put a new spirit within me, that he will take away my stony heart, and give me an heart of flesh; Being perswaded that the Lord will keep me by his own Power through faith unto Salvation. And now that I may have all the Graces of the Spirit strengthened, and increased in me, which I find that I stand in continual need of: It is the desire of my soul to be a partaker of the Lords Supper, which, through the blood of Christ onely, I have right unto.

This is the particular account of Gods gracious dealing with this godly Gentlewoman: considering there was no administration of the Sacrament in that Parochial Congregation where she lived, and used formerly to receive it, nor any Pastor at all to Officiate there, she being desirous to enjoy that great Ordinance, and that after a pure way of administration, sent this aforementioned Narrative to the Reverend Doctor Harris, living then in the University, who admitted her to the participation of the Lords Supper in that publick Assembly where he administered it.

Now let us see also a Letter written by Doctor Harris concerning this godly Gentlewoman, whom he highly honoured, upon the occasion of his communicating the aforesaid Letter of hers to a friend: Do not (saith he) think it lost time to read over this Narrative: It was penned by this gracious woman upon a serious occasion, what time she was to give an account of her self at her admission to the Lords Supper. The discourse is plain, but pregnant of instruction. I alter nothing in the thing, I onely take notice of the persons therein mentioned: As 1. God, 2. Satan, 3. The parties self: All which offer matter worthy thy thoughts.

Satan's Method, and Subtily.

First in Satan, thou seest his most ordinary way and Method in tempting. His first attempt is to blow out all light left in the soul, and to quell all thoughts of a Deity if possibly he can, that so no room at all may be left for God: If that cannot be, but the Conscience will be sometimes talking; then his next work is to question and argue the case, whether indeed there be such a person as God, such a thing as the soul, such a book as the Bible, such a place as an Heaven or Hell; and if he cannot gain such a conclusion from the soul, then in the third place the Question is, What manner a one this supposed God is? And first, whilst thou art in thy natural state, he represents God made all of mercy, and when thou art under mercy, all of vengeance and fury; There was no place for fear, and here is none for hope: There sin was an inconsiderable thing, and beneath Gods Cognisance; here sin is unpardonable, and beyond Gods mercy: In both estates he labours the destruction of Faith, now in the threats, then in the Promises. In the first estate you must never yeeld to self-despair; no, spit in his face that shall once question thy belief in God; without the least doubting. What? not believe my Maker with all my soul? What? once doubt or suspect him? I defy him, and the foul fiend that shall say so. On the other side, when once converted, what hast thou to do with the Covenant of Grace and Peace? That is bread for Children, not for Dogs, Hypocrites, for such as have sinned against the Holy Ghost, as thou hast done; and at this bay he holds the soul for some space; and soon recruits his forces, and renews his Interrogatories, thus; Thou within the Promise? Thou a believer? Canst thou say, darest thou say that thou hast faith? It may be thou darest not deny it, but what is that to the point? Thou darest not affirm it, though partial enough to thy self: Be advised by me, who loves plain dealing, and let not thy false heart, and these fawning Preachers befooled thee unto destruction.

Thus.

Thus the Devil, up and down, first and last, thus he proceeded with man at the first, and though sometimes he shifts hands, and finds out new ways, yet here lyes his road for the most part, and this is the first party here named.

Now in the second place, what doth God? It must be granted that he permitteeth these Hellish Scullions to scour his Plate, and to fit the Vessels of honour for their Masters use, and they (as glad of the Office) bestir themselves, they draw their vessels, and render them as foul and ugly as they can; but when they have done their work, God takes his Plate out of their hand to their no small grief; and in the mean while God goes along with the temptations, and in them all supports his poor servants now more immediately by his own hand, prompting their Petitions, darting into their souls some glimpses of comfort, minding them of some Promise; so he sure, yeelding them some secret hope, something or other which draws them along still more or less. 2. Now more immediately by men, and other means; sometimes he directs them to some special Book or Treatise which fits their case, and holds soul and life together at present; sometimes he sends an Interpreter one of a thousand, that shall rip up their misery, and shew them their remedy, and at last fetches off his Captives, even then when Satan began to crow, and cry Victory, that extremity being Gods opportunity; and this is usually, though not ever, Gods way.

Gods Mercy to his own.

Now look upon the third concerned, the party tempted, what doth he? He sticks (often) in the birth, fool as he is; His first work is to keep the Devils counsel, confess and be shamed for ever. The Devil is true to him, and he will be as true, and never peach: He travels with a wofull burden of sin, guilt, horror; but if thou lovest thy self (saith the Devil) keep thy own counsel, trust not God, nor man. But if the Preacher doth force him to a confession, and he can hold no longer, then he makes forth but fair and softly. First, he makes many offers, goes, and comes, and something he would say, but is loath; he begins afar off, and then stops, begins again, and then stops again, takes another day, and then comes again, with a purpose of uttering all; and when he comes to his friend, either all is quice for the present, and the pang euer, or else if he hangs still on tharack, then he drops out somewhat, but reserves the worst, and so is little the better, because he comes not to the bottome quickly; or if he speaks out all, yet there is another tub in the way; how can I tell whether this parties testimony be true or no, his judgement and affection being right. He shews me promises, but knows be or I whether those promises do belong to me? He speaks of a Christ, but what is that to me, if he be none of mine? He talks of believing, seeing is believing: It is a senseless thing to trust to anothers goodness when I have nothing of mine own; To believe mercy when I feel wrath, shall I not believe mine own eyes? And thus after a world of Sermons, Sacraments, Conferences, the poor soul hovers, and findes no rest or satisfaction till God be pleased to work him to these things,

Man's folly

1. To a resolution of imparting himself to some godly friend, and of speaking his whole heart to some one or other.

2. Of resting in Gods bare word, without the assurance of sense.

3. Of accepting of Jesus Christ without any lyes, and Anns, notwithstanding his own unworthiness.

4. Of waiting upon God, and hearkning when he will speak peace; and when he is brought thus far that he will be beholden to a Communion of Saints, and will take Gods word without any further surety, and owe all to Christ, though he can contribute nothing, and in despite of all suggestions and discouragements will stick to the peace of Christ, and look for all his peace in that way, saying, Though he kill me yet will I trust in him, I will wait, and hearken to him; when (I say) he is thus far proceeded, Satan may now go shake his ears, and receive his answer, Its God that justifies, who shall condemn? Oh! Hell, Where is thy power? Oh! Death, Oh! Devil, what is thy Commission? Its not my meaning to prescribe to God any one way of working; but this is the way he often takes takes with his children, and this we may find exemplified in this foregoing Narrative touching the Conversion and procedure of this Saint, so far as she hath commented upon her own life. Now for her death, I will tell thee what my observations were thereabout.

She dyed daily.

1. I find that God began with her quickly, and called her hence before she was aged, and that is mostly his method where an early harvest is intended. a timely seeds-time is promised, They live quickly, and live apace, who ripen betimes; so was it with her who was seldome out of action after her entrance, but gained as much time in so little a time as any I knew.

2. I observe that death came not all at once upon her; she was yearly dying some years before she dyed her last, and thus death was made familiar to her: I have seldome known any of her age that was less amazed at the speech and thoughts of death, so good a thing it is to know experimentally what it is to dye beforehand.

3. Observe how Gods power triumphs in weakest Vessels: It is a thing I have often thought on, that godly women for the most part dye more confidently and comfortably than do good men, the Lord trampling upon Satan in them, and in her very eminently.

Her Patience.

4. Her patience was remarkable in the midst of sore pains, which frequented her in the breeding and bearing of children, yet then her speech was, I fear not pains, I fear my self, lest through impatience I should let fall any unfitting word: It is a blessed frame when pain seems light, and sin heavy.

5. I plainly saw in her the power of Grace beyond nature; 1. When life and death were both laid before her, her speech was this, I am at my Fathers disposal; Howbeit of my self I rather incline to death, than life. 2. Whereas her affections were very strong both to her loving Husband and children, inso-much as it was conceived, that the last farewell would go very near her when she should part with so precious and dear Friends, she was so much taken up with the thoughts of Christ, that she seemed not to stick at any such Relations. Nay thirdly, she seemed wholly to forget her natural self, for being intreated to favour her body and speech in regard of the lowliness of her spirits, after some pause she brake forth into these words: Shall I for this poor carcass be wanting to my souls comfort, and my Saviours praises? Let me have your prayers still, and God his praises; yea, pray not onely for, but with me. Which being done, she overflowed with comfort, and in that condition I left her, and that stream of comfort led her, not long after, to the Fountain where are Rivers of joy for evermore.

Thus lived she a most profitable life: Thus dyed she a most fruitful death. God so turned this his servant, that living, dying, and after death she should be fruitfull. Thus will God honour those that honour him. To him be all honour to Eternity. Amen.

Now it may be usefull to make mention of her last sickness; especially eight weeks before her death.

Her holy speeches.

All her discourses were savoury, tending to edification. Many good Christians came to visit her, who all (if it were not their own fault) might reap some spiritual benefit from those many excellent speeches which proceeded out of her mouth. And the counsels she gave to her Relations, and other Friends, were tempered with gravity, and affection. She accustomed not her self to affectation of high-flown phrases, but held fast the form of sound words. She was an old Disciple, and her grave and sober Language accordingly discovered her so to be.

Her sickness

From the very first of her last sickness, her apprehension was that she should dye shortly, and her longing desire was to be dissolved, and to be with Christ. She often repeated those words of Job, There the weary go to rest; and those words in the close of the Revelations, Come Lord Jesus, come quickly. Upon the approach of her death (whereof she was very sensible) she asked her Husband, what Promises Promises of assurance were a firm ground for her to bottom upon? He named Joh. 10. 28. And I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand. Likewise he added Rom. 8. 33, 34. Who shall lay any thing to the charge of Gods Elect? It is God that justifieth, who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that dyed, yea rather, that is risen again, who is ever at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us. He added veri. 38, 39. For I am perswaded that neither Death, nor Life, nor Angels, nor Principalities, nor Powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. These (said she) are sweet promises.

That morning she dyed, she desired her Husband to read the Seventeenth Chapter of John (which Chapter that eminent holy Scotchman, Master Rollock, caused to be read to him when he was dying,) after that was read, she was ravished with great joy, and expressed herself accordingly. Her Husband, and two other Friends prayed with her. After the last Prayer was ended, she said, My flesh, and my heart faileth: Her Husband answered her, Thou God was the strength of her heart, and her portion for ever: He would never fail her. She returned an answer (which were the last words which ever she spoke to him) He will never fail me. About an hour after she resigned up her spirit unto God who gave it; and her last words were, I have finished my course. She slept in Jesus December the 8. Anno Christi 1654. To her to live was Christ, and to dye was gain. She lived much desired, and dyed much lamented. Her name is like precious Oynment poured forth. She lived holily, and dyed comfortably, and now partakes of those joyes which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither can enter into the heart of man to conceive, even those things which God hath prepared for them that love him.

Her joy
unspeakable.

Her Death

Divers Epitaphs were made at the Death of this rare Gentlewoman: I shall onely insert two, which were made by two Reverend and Learned Doctors.

On

On the truly Vertuous and Religious Mrs. Elizabeth Wilkinson. To Her Husband.

Say, shall I speak or hold my peace?
That seems more due; but this more ease;
Where, what to speak, is hard to say;
For should I utter all I may,
'Twere endless: And to praise a Friend
By halves, is but to discommend.
And would I speak, To whom? and what?
To those that knew? Or knew her not?
Who knew her need it not: For they Know more than I am like to say:
Who knew her not, may think that she Deserv'd but what they hear from me:
And so instead of setting forth
Her praise, I should but wrong her worth.
He that adores with silent view,
Doth not detract from what is due:
But all that while his silence sayes,
He knows not how enough to praise
So, might I choose, I would adore
Her Speaking worth, and say no more.
But since I must (for so you say)
Not hold my peace, I must obey:
Yet 'tis, I say, too hard a task,
To answer fully what you ask:
To know, what first I should commend,
And harder, where to make an end.
Should I begin, where first appear
Her worths, I must begin with Her.
(Higher than so, I need not go,
Tho, whence she came, be worthy too.)
From first, her own deserving merit
Claims more than others do inherit:
Nor is it easie to express,
What age of hers was spent amiss.
Her temper meek; Her carriage such:
Her language good, and not too much:
Her habit comely, more than brave,
Her conversation humbly grave.
What Vertues deck't a single life,
Were doubled, when she was a wife.
How good a Wife, I need not tell
To him who knew her worth so well;
Nor, what was her Maternal care,
To whom her Children were so dear.
Nor was her good confin'd to home,
But challenged a larger room;
To heal the sick, the hungry feed,
And succour those that stood in need;
Good both to soul and body too,
Of those with whom she had to do;
To rich, to poor, to great, and small,
But in her Closet best of all

(Which

(Which was her Christian daily walk)

The

*The Life of Gasper Colinius Great Admirall of France, who was slain in the Parisian Massacre, August 24.
Anno Christi 1572.*

His Paren-
tage.

Aspar Colinius or Coligni, was descended of a very Ancient and Honourable Family; His Predecessors had Kingly Priviledges in their own Country; as the Power of Life and Death, of Coining Money, Imposing Taxes and Tributes, &c. His Father was Gaspar de Colonia or Colinius, who lived under King Francis the first; and had to Wife Ludovica Monmorancy, the Sister of Annas Monmorancy, Great Constable of France.

When in the year 1522. the Admiral Bonivet had taken Fontaraby in the Confines of Spain, as soon as he was returned into France, the Spaniards came and besieged it with a great Army: The siege lasted twelve moneths, whereby the Inhabitants suffered much extremity by Reason of Famine.

His Fathers
death.

King Francis hearing of it, commanded this Gaspar to raise an Army: and relieve Fontaraby, which Army he presently Levied; But in his march he fell sick, and died at Ax, August 4. Anno Christi 1522, leaving three Sons behind him, Odet, Gaspar and Francis.

His Mothers death.
Popes policy.

Ludovica his Widow, was made one of the Ladies of Honour to the Queen of France, and was very careful of the Education of her Sons, and lived a most Chaste and vertuous life all the remainder of her days, dying in Paris, Anno Christi 1547.

His Birth.

His Education.

Pope Clement the seventh, seeking to increase his Authority in France, made the elder Brother [Odet] a Cardinal; knowing that by reason of the Eminency of his Family, he might be very useful to him. By which means the Inheritance fell to this, our Gaspar; the second Brother, who was born Feb. 16. Anno Christi 1517. whose Ingenuity and towardliness appearing in his Child-hood, his Mother was very careful of his Education; And for his Instruction in Learning, she made choice of Nicholas Beraldaus to be his Schoolmaster, a man famous in those days in France. She also provided him Tutors to instruct him in Military Arts; of such as were most skilful therein.

His valour.

This Gaspar being thus furnished both for Peace and War, when he came to the age of twenty four, the Dolphin of France, the Kings eldest Son, besieging Baion at that time, Gaspar went to serve under him, and to put in practice what he had before gotten in the Theory: In which Service he shewed much alacrity and courage and in advancing near to the Enemies Trenches, he was wounded with a Bullet in his throat. The same year also the King He is wounded.

 having intelligence that his, and the enemies Army were ready to joyn bat-tel in Insabria, Gaspar obtaining leave, hastened thither, and in that Bat-tel gave great proof of his Valour and Prudence; so that shortly after King Francis dying, and his Son Henry succeeding to the Crown, he advanced him to great Honour; and whereas his Uncle Annas Monmorancy was Generall of His adthe Horse, he made this Gaspar, Colonel of a Regiment of Foot: In which vancement.
 Office he carried himself so well, that in a little space he gat much repute for his Justice, Valour and Prudence, and thereby became very grateful to the common people: For, whereas the Souldiers formerly by their Rapines and Punderings used much to oppresse them, this new Colonel kept them His militain awe by Military Discipline, especially he severely punished them for incon- ry discipline tinency, swearing, and blasphemy; and his Orders were so generally approved of, that shortly after the King put them amongst His military laws.

The same King also advanced him to greater Honour, taking a great liking to him, making him one of his own Horsemen, which Vulgarly are called of the Kings Order. And whereas contention arose about that time between the King of France, and King Henry the eighth of England about the Town of Bulloine, which a little before upon conditions of peace had been pawned to the English; The King of France, distrusting the English, made this Gaspar Governour of all that Countrey; who presently going into Picardy, His militawhither King Henry of France had sent an Army to besiege Bulloine: ry service.
 He with admirable art and diligence built a Castle near to it, which was such a shelter to the French, and did so hinder the Sallies of the English, that in a short time they were forced to treat about surrendring of the City. For the finishing of which Treaty, the whole businesse was referred by the King of France to our Gaspar, and his Uncle Rupionius; which being ended; and the Town surrendred, Gaspar returned to the King, and was shortly af- He is made ted the greatest honour in the Kingdome, having the command of the Sea, and the Kings Navy. He was also made Governour of Picardy; and of the Isle of France, and Captain of a Troop of men at Arms, and one of the Kings Councel.

Anno Christi 1554. Charles the fifth, Emperour of Germany and Queen
Mary of England, raised great Armies against the King of France, and to resist such potent Adversaries, none was thought so fit by the suffrage of all, He is made as our Gaspar; and therefore he was chosen by the King to that place; who Generall.
 presently raising Forces hastned to the Confines of France, towards the Belgick Provinces to secure them against the approach of their enemies. At this time France was in great fear; considering the conjunction of such potent Adversaries; and the King of France his want, both of Money and Arms to resist them, so that many thought that the ruine of France was approaching.
 Whereupon our Admirall periwaded the King to treat of Peace; which counsell was so gratefull both to the King and his Nobles; that the charge of it was presently committed to the Admirall, which within few daies he effected, to the incredible joy and rejoycing of all the Orders of France; and he was looked upon as an Instrument of saving his Countrey, especially considering upon what honest, honourable and profitable conditions he had concluded the Peace. He makes peace with the Emperour.

About this time it fell out that the Guises, (who were Lorrainers by extradi-on, and pretended a Title to Sicily and Naples, which they said the King of Spain had injuriously taken from their Ancestors) perswaded King Henry of France, that for divers years they had held correspondency with a great part of the Neapolitane Nobility, so that if the King would but assist them with some competent Forces, they doubted not to make an easie conquest of that Kingdom.

His distast of perjury. Kingdome. By this their counsell they violated the Peace which was made a little before with Spain, and solemnly sworn to on both sides, which was a great grief to our Admirall, who sticke not to say, that such perjury proved alwaies, as dishonourable, so farall to Kingdoms; and that God in all ages had been a severe revenger of it: Yet the King would not hearken to him, but commanded him to raise Forces in his Province. This was the first cause of the feud betwixt, him and the Guises. of the feud betwixt, him and the Guises. Iomit.

The Emperour hearing of these preparations in France, thought to be before hand with them, and therefore raises an Army in the Low-Countries to invade France, which the King being informed of, and knowing that the first storm would fall upon Picardy, he presently dispatched away the Admirall for the securing of it; and before he had marched two daies journey, he was informed by his Scouts that the Spaniards intended to besiege San-Quintan in Picardy: He also received Letters from one Captain Brullius, that as soon as the Citizens of San-Quintan heard of the Spaniards intention, they were seized with such a Pannick fear, that many of them left their houses, and fled into the woods with their Wives and Children. Our Admirall hearing these things, dissembled the matter before his Souldiers, as well as he could, and shewing much alacrity, by great journeys hastened to San-Quintans. Whereupon two of his Captains [Gernacus and Lusaricus] endeavoured by all means to dissuade him from it; telling him that the City was not fortified, neither provided with food and other necessaries to sustain a siege, and that the enemies would beleaguer it before he could furnish it with such things, and therefore they told him that it was better, and more for his honour, to disturb the Enemy in the open fields, than, by shutting himself up within the Walls, to expose himself to such danger. But he, considering of what consequence that place was, and what advantage the getting of it would be to the Spaniards, adhered to his first resolutions; And having by the way adjoyned to himself about two Hundred and Forty Souldiers, he hastily flies to the City, and sets all hands on work for the fortifying of it. The Spaniards being informed hereof, presently begirt the City with a siege, and began to draw their Trenches about it, and possessed themselves of the Suburbs, whereby, by rolling Trenches they approached the Walls. This our Admirall taking notice of, Sallied out upon them, and firing the Suburbs, drave the enemies further off; yet when he had thoroughly viewed the City, and found the weaknesse of it, he began to suspect that he could not hold out long against so potent an Adversary. Yet considering that Gods Providence had cast him upon these straits, he resolved rather valiantly to die, then to give the enemy so great an advantage against France, by surrendring that Town to them. And therefore he laid out all his care, labour and industry, for the defending of it; and for the greater encouragement of the Citizens and Souldiers, he laid his own hands to every work that was to be done.

Whilst he was thus busily imployed, a Messenger brought him word, that his Brother Andelot was gotten safe into the City, with about five hundred Souldiers; The remains of a greater Army which the King had sent under the Constable for the Victualling and relieving the City, which Army was encountered by a great party of German Horse and Foot, who in the encounter had routed the French, slain many, and dispersed the rest; only in the time of the medly, Andelot with his five hundred men had slipped into the City.

As soon as this defeat of the French was known to the Souldiers and Citizens, they were possessed with so great a fear that the encouragements of the Admirall were little regarded. Hereupon he calls them all together, makes a Speech to them, and shewed them that the safety of their Countrey should be preferred preferred before their lives; and thereupon caused them all to take an Oath, that if any one spake about the surrender of the City, he should lose his head for it; himself also took the same Oath.

In the mean time the Spaniards being Elated with their former victory, presse upon the City harder than before; and for twenty daies together continue their battery against the Walls, whereby they beat down a great part of them. The City battered.

The Admirall seeing this, and perceiving that they were approaching to give a generall storm, he encouraged his Souldiers stoutly to make resistance; telling them, that if they did but withstand the first stroke, the enemy would not be forward to attempt a second. Where the greatest breach and danger was, there himself stood Armed to resist in the very face of danger: Other places he commended to his Brother, and his other Captains. But whilst he was valiantly fighting in the breach, word was brought him that the enemy was entred in two other places of the City: Whereupon taking some of his trustiest Friends with him, he ran thitherward to oppose them, but before he came he found that that part of the City was filled with his armed enemies, against whom whilst he opposed himself, he was invironed by his Adversaries and taken Prisoner, who presently carried him away to Amwerp. St Quintan taken.
The Admirall taken.

Whilst he was Prisoner there, he fell dangerously sick, and lay fourty daies tormented with a Feaver; and as soon as he began to recover, he called for a Bible, by reading whereof he much eased and refreshed his mind and body; And by the diligent study thereof he began to embrace the reformed Religion, and to have a tast of true Piety, and the right manner of calling upon God. His sickness a means of health to his soul.

Not long after he payed his Ransome, which was fifty Thousand Crowns, and so returned home; and being weary of the Factions and Affairs at Court, and seriously thinking of his change of Religion, he gat leave of the King to turn over his Regiment of Foot to his Brother Andelos, and his Government of the Isle of France to his Brother-in-law, Marshall Monmorancy; And shortly after he sent one of his intimate Friends to the King, humbly to signifie to him that he intended also to lay down his Government of Picardy, and therefore desired him to think of one to succeed him therein: The King answered, that he wondred at his resolution, and scarce thought him wise to divest himself so suddainly of so many places of honour and profit: and from that time, he began generally to be suspected of his change in Religion, shewing a minde so free from Ambition and desire of Rule. He devoted himself of his Offices.
His temperance.

Monfieur Andelos also discovering his Resolution in Religion, the Cardinall of Lorraine (who hated the Family of Coligni with a deadly hatred, as the greatest enemies to the greatnesse of his Family) watched his opportunity, and suggested to the King, that all men took notice, that many great men of France were infected with the poison of Calvinisme, which they scattered amongst the inferiour sort of people, and in particular that Monfieur Andelos had blabbed out many things to the dishonour of the solemn sacrifice of the Masse, &c. The King being incensed hereby, commanded the Cardinall of Chastillon his Brother, and Monmorancy his Cousen, to send for Andelos, and to admonish him to answer modestly to the questions which should be proposed to him. Andelos questioned for Religion.

When he came before the King, he professed his great good, will toward him, and spake many things of his great merits, and then told him, that he was sorry to hear that which was reported, viz. that he thought ill of Religion, and therefore he required him to tell him what he thought of the Masse, which the Calvinists spake so much against: Andelos being a man of great courage, answered confidently according to the truth; which the King being offended His stout Answer.

fended at, exhorted him to look to himself, and to prevent the danger before it were too late. Whereunto Andelot with greater courage answered, That he had hitherto shewed himself obedient in all things to his Majesty, whom he had found alwaies bountifull to himself and his Family, but in the cause of Religion, he could neither daub nor dissemble with God; That his Body, Wealth and Dignity, were in the Kings power, of which he might dispose as he pleased: But his Soul was subject to God only that gave it; to whom therefore in this cause he must needs be obedient, as to his greater Lord.

His imprisonment.

At this the King was so enraged, that snatching up a dist, he therewith hurt his Son the Dolphin, that fate next him; and then he commanded one of his privy Chamber to carry Andelot to the City of Meaux, where he remained a Prisoner in the Bishops house, till he was removed to the Castle of Melodune.

The cause why he left his Offices.

Not long after King Henry the second dying, his Son Francis succeeded him, who was married to Mary Queen of Scotland, the Daughter of the Duke of Guises Sister, by which means the Guises ruled all at Court, and they also boasted often of the Kingdom of England, to which this Mary was Heir apparent, as they said.

The Admiral knowing their cruel, Barbarous and bloody dispositions, who would never be free from turbulent Counsels, and especially from persecuting those of the Religion; he was now, without further delay resolved to lay down his Government of Picardy: and for that end acquainted Lewis of Bourborn, Prince of Conde, concerning his intention, wishing him to beg that place of the King, which accordingly he obtained.

His godly wife encourages him.

Our Admirall being thus eased of these publique Burthens, and the troubles of them which withdrew his mind from Religion, he kept at home in his own Castle, and the rather because of his Wife Carola Lavollia, born of an Illustrious and Ancient Family, which was wonderfully given to the study of Religion, exhorting her Husband also, that casting off the remainders of Idolatry and Superstition, he should wholly betake himself to the true service of Christ. The Admirall having often heard her presse this upon him, dealt seriously with her, telling her, that he never knew any, either in France or Germany which embraced in truth this reformed Religion, but that they were overwhelmed with manifold afflictions, under which they almost perished. He told her also, that by the Laws of France, which were confirmed by all the Parliaments, Whosoever made profession of this Religion, was to be burnt alive, and all his estate to be forfeited to the King. Yet, saith he, if you be so prepared with Faith and courage, that you can be content to undergo the same lott with others, you shall see that I will not be wanting to do my duty. To this she answered, That the condition of the Church at this day, was no other then what it had been in former ages, even from the beginning, and she perswaded her self, that it would be the same to the end of the world. And thus each of them encouraging other, the Admirall began to instruct his Family in the true knowledge and worship of God, and gave them Bibles and other good Books to read for their further edification. Withall he stoutly forbade them those oaths and Blasphemies which were common in France, especially in the Court. He provided also godly Governours and Schoolmasters for his Children, so that in a short time there was a wonderfull change in his Family; yea, by his example, his two Brethren, Odet the Cardinall, and Andelot, were exceedingly stirred up to the study of Religion.

Persecution attends the Gospel.

He instructs and reforms the Family.

The Admiral from his Child-hood had been bred in the Court, which did in those daies exceedingly abound with Luxury and other Vices, from which he was not altogether Free; But so soon as he embraced the true Religion, there there was such a strange alteration in his Life and Deportment, that the powerful work of Gods Spirit did wonderfully appear therein. Before he durst come to the Sacrament of the Lords Supper, he conferred with divers Godly Ministers, both about Transubstantiation and Consubstantiation, for the settling of his judgment in the Truth: and once being present in the Town of Vareuil at a private meeting of the godly, where there was a Sermon, and the Sacrament to be administred; after Sermon he requested those that were present that they would not be offended at his weakness, but that they would pray to the Lord for him, and then requested the Minister that he would a little more explain himself about the Sacrament, which he willingly did; and having by sundry Texts of Scripture shewed that Christ is received only Spiritually and Sacramentally therein, he concluded with that of St. Augustine, Manducare cibum qui non perit sed permanet ad vitam, est credere in Christum. Et Quid paras dentem, & ventrem? crede & manducasti. Item, Nolite parare fauces, sed cor. Christ is to be fed upon not with our mouths, but with our Faith, &c.

The Power of Religion.
His prudent humility.

How Christ is received in the Sacrament.

Our Admirall being much satisfied with this discourse, gave thanks, first to God, then to that Minister and Congregation, and shortly after was himself partaker of that holy Sacrament, the same whereof when it was once spread abroad in France, it cannot be believed what joy and consolation it brought to Churches of Christ; For though till that time the true worshippers of God had many Laws made against them by the Kings and Parliaments, though they were daily dragged to prisons, torments and death, so that they were forced to hold all their meetings in secret, yet was true Religion after a wonderfull manner dispersed through all the Provinces of France, and the Popish party found by Experience that the more they sought to suppress and extinguish the light of Gods Word, and the Professors of it, the more it daily encreased.

He partakes of the Sacrament to the great joy of the Churches.

Persecution the bellows of the Gospel.

Not long after fell out the tumult at Amboise, and the conspiracy of the Nobility against the Guises, whose pride and insolency the Princes of France could no longer bear with. Of this number was the Prince of Conde, and the King of Navarre his Brother. Whereupon the Guises procured an Edict from the King, whereby a meeting of the Nobility was appointed at Fontainebleau, especially to treat about matters of Religion; and when the day came, which was Aug. 24. 1560. the King requested those that were present to deliver their opinions: Whereupon the Admirall rising out of his seat, humbly presented the King with two Supplications under this title, The humble Supplications of those who in severall parts of your Majesties Kingdom, do truly and purely serve God. These Supplications were delivered to Albespine, the Kings Secretary, who publicquely read them. This bold fact of the Admirall was much wondered at, considering the Kings bitter enmity against that Religion, and the great power of the Guises. The summe of those Petitions was this:

A meeting of the Nobility

His zeal & courage.

*They which purely and sincerely serve God, taking this fit opportunity, do humbly beseech your Majesty, that of your Clemency you will be pleased to pity a great number of your Subjects, who unto this day are miserably afflicted, tormented and wasted for the cause of Religion in all your Provinces: We humbly beg of you that you will not be grieved to take Cognisance of our cause, and to appoint that the Scripture may be the judge in these great Controversies, whereby it will easily appear how much we do abhor Heresie, which hitherto hath been laid to our charge: As also how falsely we have been charged with sedition, when we never used force or arms to defend our selves, but ever thought it our duty in our greatest extremities only to have recourse to your Majesties Clemency. Our humble request therefore to your Majesty is, that you would be pleased to restrain our persecutors, by whose means there is no part of your Majesties Kingdom, which in these late years hath not been defiled with the blood of your innocent Subjects. case hath been miserably when we have been forced to plead her cause before the Popes Clients and Pensioners, rather then before equall and indifferent Judges. Our humble request therefore is, that you would be pleased favourably to look upon so many Families who have alwaies acknowledged you for our gracious Lord and King; and, according to Gods command, have honoured and obeyed you, and shall be ready, if accasion be offered, to spend our lives for your dignity and service; and therefore we think it but equal that our lives and welfare should be protected against the rage of our cruel and bloody Adversaries. We further pray, that some publique place may be allowed us where our Ministers may Preach the Word of God sincerely, and Administer the Sacraments truly; That our Religion being no longer concealed, we may be freed from those false calumnies which our Adversaries have hitherto cast upon us; And we shall ever pray, &c.

ness.

A Parliament defini-
ed.

After these Supplications were read, there were great debates, but little about Religion, great complaints being made of the Kings debts, and consideration had how the same might be discharged. Hereupon our Admirall spake freely and boldly against the Forces raised by the Guises, under the pretence of a guard for the King, as if he needed such a guard in the heart of his own Kingdom; Whereas the Authority of the Kings name in France is so sacred and powerfull, that thereby the meanest Countable is able to suppress any tumult whatsoever. This free speech of his extreemly vexed the Guises, who hated him so much the more for it.

Some others propounded that there might be a publique Convention of the States called, as the onely means to cure the distempers of France; which though some had laboured to discredit, and so had caused an intermission of it for eighty seven years, yet it had alwaies been exceeding advantageous to the Kingdome, as the Parliaments in England, consisting of three States, had alwaies been there, whereby the English Kings had been enabled to make such powerfull Invasions of France.

Shortly after King Francis the second dying, his younger Brother Charles the ninth succeeded, and thereupon the former request was renewed for calling a Convention of all the States.

At this time Catherine of Medices was the Queen Mother, a Florentine by birth, to whom the education of the young King, and the care of his person was committed, according to the ancient custom of France; But she was not suffered to have any thing to do with the Government of the Kingdom: And hereupon the Guises, who for a long time had been powerfull at Court, intruded themselves into that Office. And at that time many of the Nobility proceeded cruelly to torment and afflict those of the Reformed Religion; whereupon there was great fear lest some new Commotions should be raised in the Kingdom: But the Queen Mother pretended favour towards them, for which cause our Admirall endeavoured, and at last effected that she should be joyned in Commission with Anthony King of Navarr, who was made Protector during the Kings Minority. This many wise men disliked and opposed, saying, That in the stories of former times it did appear that the Government was never committed to the Queen Mother, especially if she were a stranger, but it redounded to the great hurt of France, and was the cause of many Civil broils.

When the day of the publique Convention of the States came, he which made the Speech in the behalf of the Nobility, about the end of his Oration presented the King with a Supplication, that they of the Reformed Religion might have publique places allowed them for the exercise of the service of God in.

To this one Quintin, a Doctor of the Civil Law, and Professor of Paris, opposed himself, and made a long Oration in the name of the Clergy, which he rather read then pronounced by heart, wherein he took the boldness to affirm,

affirm, That all they that moved for publike places for those of the Religion, were guilty of Treason against the King and Kingdom, the authors of sedition, and bringers in of a new Religion, and therefore ought severely to be punished. Of which when the Admirall in the Kings Counsel afterwards complained, Quintin to excuse himself, professed that he had spoken nothing of his own Head, but only had pronounced that Oration which was penned and put in to his hand by the Clergy, and that he was ready again in the Convention of States, before the King and all the company, to avow that in all that he had said, he had no thoughts of hurt to the Admirall.

In conclusion there was an Edict sent forth in the Kings Name, commanding and requiring all the Judges and Magistrates through France, to release all those of the Religion that were in prison, and it was forbidden them upon great penalties hereafter to meddle with, or to trouble any for their Religion sake. As for the businesse of allowing them publike places for worship, that was put off to the next Generall meeting of the States, which was appointed, but held not, to be at Ponthoise in Piccardy.

The Protestants freed from persecution.

January following, there was a meeting of all the Princes and Nobles of France, appointed to be held at Saint Germans, whither also repaired the Deputies from all the Parliaments, and there it was decreed, that Churches should be allowed to the Protestants in the Suburbs belonging to each City: Upon the publishing of which Edict, the Peace of the Kingdom seemed to be settled, and in the Suburbs of all the greater Cities, yea of Paris it self, those of the Religion met publicly, and had Sermons preached without the least disturbance. But presently after was news brought that the D. of Guise in Campania had basely murdered about two hundred persons who were met together at Vassiac to hear a Sermon, according to the power given them by the Kings Edict, in a barn; and it was conceived that the D. of Guise took this boldnesse, relying upon the friendship of the King of Navarre, whose weak mind he had bowed and bound to himself by promising him the Kingdom of Sardinia, and other favours; and upon this confidence, adjoining his other Brethren to him, with a great Army he went to the Court, and there seized upon the King and Queen Mother (who seemed with many tears to bewail the violence profered to them) and carried them away to Paris.

Churches allowed them

A massacre by the Duke of Guise.

The King seized on by the Duke of Guise.

Hereupon, the Queen Mother sent divers messengers to the Admirall, and writ with her own hand to the Prince of Conde, requesting them to help her, and to deliver the King out of this captivity: This caused the Prince of Conde, with many of the Nobility, upon deliberation, to resolve to raise an Army for the rescue of the King, and to curb the insolency of the Guises, often saying, That he ought not to be deterred with reports, as if he intended to propagate his Religion by Arms, or to offer violence to the Person of the young King. For, said he, After such a publique Decree made by the King, and all the States in favour of those of the Religion, What had the D. of Guise, who is a Lorrainer by extraction, to do in France? Or by what confidence doth he exercise such cruelty against the Kings faithfull Subjects? And therefore he saw that there was no way left but to repell force with force; and that he was not the author of the War, but by War, defended those that were unjustly oppressed by War.

Why the Protestants first took Arms.

There was also a publique report that the D. of Nemours had endeavoured by flatteries to perswade the young Prince Henry, the Kings Brother (who was afterwards chosen King of Poland) to go with him out of the bounds of France, which the young youth had declared to his Mother. There was much speech also of the Massacre at Vassiac, and of their leading the King and Queen Mother as their captives to Paris, where they had a powerfull faction. They had also sent to the German Princes, desiring to be admitted into the league of the Protestants. The Cardnall of Lorraine had also sent to Christopher Duke of Wurzburg, a prudent and valiant Prince, pretending that both he and his Brethren would embrace the Protestant Religion, and desired to be enrolled in the number of the Protestant Princes.

These things being publicly divulged, the resolution of the Prince of Conde to take Arms was generally approved of, and in a few days many Cities sided with and assisted him, as Orleans, Biturg, Roan, Lions, Vienna, Valentia, Mont-alban, &c. And whereas by the common consent of all the Protestants in France, the Prince of Conde was chosen Generall, he prevailed so far with them, that the managing of the War was conferred upon our Admirall, to whom he also delegated his own power and interest, for the opinion which he had of his excellent justice, gravity and prudence. This being generally taken notice of, the Queen Mother interposeth as a Mediatrice for peace, and sends for the Prince of Conde to come to their tents, intreating him, that for the convenient situation of it, he would deliver up into their Hands for a few days, as the fittest place for the Treaty, the City of Boience, where there is a Bridge that passeth over the River Loir, which Bridge she affirmed to be the fittest of all other places for the Parlee. The Prince of Conde upon the perswasions of his Borthor, the King of Navarr, and of the Queen Mother, and upon their faithfull promise that the Town should be delivered back to him again, and that his person should be in safety during the Treaty, without taking any further pledges, delivers up Boience to them, only desiring that whilst the Treaty lasted, the Constable, Guise, and Saint Andrew (who were called the Triumvirate for the ruine of France) might be commanded to withdraw from the Camp.

When these things were done, the Queen Mother and the Guises put a garrison into the Town of Boience, fortifie it strongly, and keep the Prince of Conde prisoner.

The Admirall being justly incensed by this perfidiousnesse, and resolving not to be wanting in his aid to the Prince of Conde, he presently with all his Cavalry sets upon the enemies Camp, which brought such a terrour amongst them, that thereupon the Queen Mother commanded the Prince of Conde to be set at liberty. And a few days after the Admirall assaulted Boience, and at the last took the Town, though with some losse of his men.

About this very time the Admirals eldest Son, called Gaspar, being a youth of nine years old, but of Admirable towardnesse, fell sick, and died at Orleance, which was an exceeding great grief to his Father.

In the mean time the Guises perceiving that they were forsaken by the greatest part of France, which now adheared to, and assisted Conde, they resolved to call in forraign helps, and thereupon, sending much Money into Swisserland and Germany, they hired from the former Foot, and from the latter Horse, to come in to their aid, which the Admirall used often to say, was a plain demonstration of their treacherous and hostile minds against France: And therefore that he might not be wanting to himself and Friends, who had committed so great a trust to him, he resolved to oppose Forraign by Forraign forces: And for this end he sent his Brother Andelot to the Protestant Princes in Germany, of whose good will to the French Churches he had good assurance, requesting aid from them, who accordingly within three moneths space sent him three Thousand Horse, and six Thousand Foot into France.

Whilst these things were transacting, intelligence was given to the Admirall that some Cannons, and a great quantity of Gunpowder was carrying to the Duke of Guise, who now besieged Biturg, guarded with six Troops of Horse and some Foot. Hereupon the Admirall taking some Horse with him, by long journeys hastened to meet the Convoy, and coming up to them, they scarce stood the first shock, but throwing away their Arms, fled, and left left the Booty to the Admirall, who wanting Horses to draw them away, by over-charging the Guns brake them, and blew up the Gunpowder, and so returned to his Camp.

Andelot returning out of Germany, brought with him three Thousand Horse and six Thousand Foot; So that the Prince of Conde having a good Army of French and Germans, hasted to Paris; Which the Guises hearing of, intended to meet him, having gotten a Regiment of Swissers, in whom they put most confidence, and so the two Armies meeting, a Battell was fought, but with a doubtfull event: For on the one side the Constable was taken prisoner by one William Steward a valiant Scots man; And on the other side the Prince of Conde was taken prisoner, which made many of his Foot to throw away their Arms, and fly: But the Admirall rallying the Horse, and encouraging them to prefer their Religion, Country and Honour, before their lives, he valiantly charged the Guissians, in which medly he slew Marshall Saint Andrew, a potent man at Court, and Prossaus, Collonel to the Duke of Guise, and divers other Noble men: The fight being ended, the Admirall carried the Constable to Orleance, where he made his abode for a while: But shortly after came the Duke of Guise to besiege the City, whereupon the Admirall leaving his Brother Andelot for the defence of it, flies into Normandy, and there besieged the Castle of Cadonius, where the Marquesse of Elbave, one of the D. of Lorrains Brothers was, and within a few days had it, with all the Arms and Ammunition surrendered to him.

The Admirals valour.

About this time there was one John Poltrot, a young man of a Noble Family, in the Army of the Duke of Guise, who having embraced the Reformed Religion, and served for some moneths under the Prince of Conde, took up privately with himself a resolution to kill the Duke of Guise, as a publique enemy to his Countrey, and a cause of all the present calamities: And, said he, If I had been bound to him by any Oaths, I must not have been perfidious; but being free, why should I not venture, as Scævola did, for my Countries safety? With this resolution he went to the Duke of Guises Camp, and watching his opportunity, shot him into the shoulder, of which wound he died within a few days after.

John Poltrot slew the D. of Guise.

The very same day in the morning the Duke of Guise being ready to give an assault to Orleance, wrote to the Queen Mother, that within twenty four hours he would send her word of the taking of that City, and that he would make the day very memorable by sparing neither sex nor age; and that after he had kept his shrove-tide there, he would extinguish the memory of the Town, by utter subverting of it. But man knows not his destiny, nor what shall happen to him; for that the same evening he was slain, as you heard before.

A wicked brag.

Presently after a Peace was concluded, and the Edi<sup>c</sup>t renewed for the free exercise of the Reformed Religion through all France, as formerly.

A Peace concluded.

Not many moneths after, the Admirall being sent for to Court by the Queen Mother, the Widow of the Duke of Guise comes in, and falls down at the Kings feet, crying out with many tears for revenge for her Husbands death, charging the Admirall as the contriver and author of it. The Admirall apprehending that this was but the device of others, which set her on to seek his destruction by fraud, which they could not effect by War, before the King and all the Councel he clears himself, shewing that Poltrot had at his death professed that he was set on by none but God; neither did he doubt but that he had done God good service in it, and freed his Countrey from a Tyrant that raged and thirsted after Christian Blood, and therefore he was not sorry for what he had done, &c.

The Admirall accused. He clears himself.

He also desired, that if they questioned the death of the Duke of Guise, he might have leave also to put in a Charge against him, for that he doubted not but that he could easily prove the Duke of Guise, guilty of murdering wickedly the Kings Subjects, and of violating all the sacred Laws and Decrees of the King; of taking up Arms of his own head without Authority, and thereby making himself guilty of Treason, and of kindling those flames in France, which had continued about thirteen moneths.

The contro-versie determined
by the King

Notwithstanding this resolute speech of the Admirall, his enemies ceased not for some years still to call upon the King for justice against him; Whereupon the King at last appointed a Convention of all the Peers of the Kingdom, at the City of Molineux, whither also he called his chiefeft Senators and Counsellours, commanding the Cardinall of Lorraine, and the Widow of the Duke of Guise, to produce what proofs they could, and the Admirall to defend himself against them. When both parties had pleaded their Cause, the King told them that he had referred the judgement to his Counsellors, and therefore asked them if they had any exceptions against any of them: they answered, No. Then he asked them if they would refer the determination of their Cause to him, and would stand to his judgment: They answered that they would willingly so do.

The Admiral cleared.

Whereupon Jan. 29. Anno Christi 1566. the King passed this sentence, That having heard both parties, and consulted with his Nobles and Counsellours, who were all unanimously agreed in the same sentence, he pronounced the Admirall clear and innocent from the murder of the Duke of Guise, and therefore absolved him from that crime, commanding this Proctor and all others, that they should never dare hereafter to accuse him for the same. He commanded also, that neither his present accusers, nor any other of his Subjects, should dare hereafter to make any mention of it. Nor that any of his Judges or Parliaments should ever admit any plea against him for it. He declared also, that seeing both parties had freely referred themselves to him, his will was, that they should live lovingly and peaceably together, never contriving any thing against each other; and that if any of them, their Friends, Kindreds or Partakers, should violate this Decree, that they should be held contemners of the Kings Majesty, as guilty of Treason, as disturbers of the publique peace: and lastly, that this his definitive sentence should be recorded in all the Parliaments of his Kingdome.

Treachery against the Admiral.

But to return to something that hapned before this, the Admirall had in his Family one Hambervilleries, born of a Noble house, whom he made use of in his most weighty and honest affairs; and it pleased God, that some Letters of his being intercepted, came to the Admirals hands, wherein he wrote to some great Courtiers, that he was ready to obey their commands in giving the Admirall a Soporiferous Potion. Our Admirall having read these Letters, called the man to him, Commanding him to write some verses in a paper that lay by, which when he had done, comparing both the writings together, he asked him whether he would acknowledge his hand in those Letters; which he looking upon, being stricken with guilt for his wickednesse, he presently fell upon the ground, and begged his Masters pardon. The Admirall told him that he was willing to pardon him, but upon condition that he should presently depart out of his house, nor should ever come into his sight again.

The Q. Mothers mischievous
counsels.

Not long after the aforementioned Edict of Peace was published, the Queen Mother took counsel to go to Baion to meet her Son-in-law the King of Spain, and to take her Children with her: This afterwards proved the cause of many Tragical events, though for the present things were kept very secret: And first she ordered her journey to Lyons, which hitherto had been in possession of those of the Religion, because of the great number of them them there: and as soon as she came thither, she presently set her Italian Artificers to work, to build a Citadell upon a neighbouring Hill, which commanded all the City. Her subtilty

A little before this, the plague began to be very hor, and now it had seized upon the Court it self, yet could not the Queen Mother be perswaded to remove her self and Children from the danger, till she had seen the foundations of the Castle laid. At last, making Loffius Governour of that City, a cruel and Barbarous man, and an implacable enemy to those of the Religion, and adjoyning to him some insolent Souldiers that might daily vex the godly Inhabitants, she departed. But this is very remarkable, that whithersoever she removed the Court, in Cities, Towns, Castles, &c. the plague still followed her, so that for three moneths together the King was in continuall danger, and was still forced to remove from place to place by reason of the infection. At last they came to Baion, where the Queen Mother met her Daughter the Queen of Spain, and Embassadors from the King, with whom she communicated her counsels. God follows her with the plague.

In the mean time the Marshall Monmorancy, whom the King had made Governour of Paris in his absence, had certain intelligence brought him that the Guises had imployed their Agents to the common people of Paris, to stir them up against those of the Religion in that City; He heard also that the Cardinall of Lorraine, intended suddainly to be there with a great number of armed attendants, though the King by several Edicts had commanded that none in their journeys should carry Harquebushes or Pistols about them. Therefore so soon as Monsieur Monmorancy heard that the Cardinall was entred Paris with his followers thus armed, he presently, taking his guard, went to them, commanding them to deliver up their Arms: This the Cardinall and his Nephew the young Duke of Guises, took as an intollerable affront to them; and were often heard to say, that that fact should cost Monmorancy his life. The Cardinall was very potent in this City, and could easily have raised sixty Thousand armed men to have slain the Governour; whereupon he resolved to call in some of his Friends to his aid, and in the first place he wrote to the Admirall to hasten to him who accompanied with three Hundred Horse, entred Paris, Jan. 22. which did so terrifie the multitude, especially the Priests, Monks and Canons of the great Church, that they began to think of flying thence. The Guises attempts against the Protestants.

The day after Monsieur Monmorancy sent for the Presidents of the Parliament, and the chief Magistrates of the City to come to his house, to whom he complained before the Admirall, of the audaciousnesse and factious counsels of the Cardinall of Lorraine, as also of the seditious speeches cast abroad in the City, as if the Admirall, taking advantage of the Kings absence at so great a distance, consulted about plundering that rich City; and therefore he thought fit to call the Admirall before them, that so he might clear himself from that aspersiion. Then said the Admirall, I have long since found out what my malicious and implacable Adversaries have aspersed me withall, as if I intended to seize upon this City, which is the Bullwark and Eye of France. But such counsels as these are fit for those that claim an interest (I know not how it comes in) the succession of the Kingdom, and contend to have certain Dukedomes and Countries restored to them. For my own part, I neither challenge any right to the Kingdom, nor to any part of it; which yet if I should do, I think there hath not been a Noble man in France these five Hundred years, which had the like opportunity to disturb the publique Peace as I. Ye remember after the Duke of Guise was slain, that I had the Constable Prisoner in Orleans and what a great occasion I had thereby of doing greater things if I would have embraced it: But on the contrary, I was never more earnest with the King and Queen Mother for peace, then at that time when our affairs prospered best. Who can be ignorant how solicitous and importunate Lies raised of him.

His speech to the Pharisiens.

fortunate I was for peace at that very time when many potent and flourishing Cities had delivered up themselves into my Hands: and divers other great Cities, both of Normandy and Britany sought my favour and protection? Who knows not that after Peace was concluded, instead of begging Honours and Offices ambitiously of the King, which happily I might have obtained, I retired my self to my own house, and there even to this time have lived a quiet and private life? But omitting these things, and speaking to the present occasion; Being sent for by Monmorancy, I am come hither, not to disturb the peace of the City, or to innovate any thing, but rather to preserve peace against the audaciousness of some that would disturb it. It is not unknown unto you how much confidence those of the Religion do put in me. These being stirred up with new rumours, and terrified with the counsels and factions of the Guises, do daily flock to me; bring me intercepted Letters of the meetings of certain Captains, who command their old Souldiers to be ready in arms, that when they have occasion to use them they may be at hand. What needs more words? Letters are intercepted written into Normandy, the Originall whereof is sent to the Queen Mother, and I will shew you a copy of them; wherein amongst others there is this passage: There is no readier means of restoring the Crown of France to those to whom it doth belong of old, than by rooting out the house of Valois, and by massacring all the Hugonots which are the chief upholders of it; for this end their woods are to be sold, that with the price thereof we may arm our selves and get money; and if the Hugonots sue for them, the businesse being once adjudged against them, they will never move for their charges of the suit.

Now also what should I speak of the daily plunderings and murders? It's sufficiently known, that after the peace was published, more then five hundred of those of the Religion were basely murdered in severall places, and yet not one of the Murtherers were ever punished by the Magistrates; and they which have complained of these things to the King or Queen Mother; have carried away either only words, or some empty paper or parchment instead of satisfaction. Who knows not that in the City of Turon lately and openly, many of the Religion were cruelly Massacred, even under the Ensign, and by the Souldiers of him who was sent thither by the Duke of Montpensier to settle the peace? These things being so, yet I hear that there are many of your Priests who are so terrified by my coming hither, that they consult about leaving the City, and yet there is no place in all France, no City, Town or Castle where the Priests live, and attend their services with more freedom and safety, then in my Town of Castelon.

His speech to the Parliament.

The Admirall having ended his speech, the company was dismissed; and two daies after there came to Monmorancy about thirty Delegates from the Parisian Merchants, and with them the Bishop and divers Priests, to all whom the Admirall spake very Friendly, bidding them be of good cheer, and fear nothing: and within few daies after, going to the Court of Parliament, he made a speech to them, and told them, That nothing was more desirable to him than the Peace and welfare of the City, neither did he come to them with any other mind then to advance it; and therefore he exhorted them that they also would do their endeavours that the Citizens might behave themselves peaceably and quietly: and so shortly after he returned home.

New trea-

At his return he was informed that there was one Mainus, who lived not far from him, a famous thief that was hired by the Duke of Aumale, the Brother of Guise, to lie in wait for him when he should ride forth on hunting; for which end he had given him an Hundred pieces of gold, and an excellent Horse: many also complained to the Admirall against him for his Thefts and Robberies; whereupon having gotten sufficient witnesses, he complained of of him to the Parliament at Paris, and a few daies after having apprehended him, he caused him to be carried to Paris. But when he came before the Parliament, this villain accused the Admirall as if he had dealt with him about killing the Queen Mother, and had promised him a great reward for the same: The Parliament after examination, finding this to be but a Calumny and proving him guilty of many thefts, condemned him to be broken upon the wheel, which accordingly was effected.

Shortly after the Prince of Conde had a Son born, to whom the King would be God-father, but because he could not himself be present by reason of his Religion, he substituted the Admiral to supply his room, which business was celebrated with very great pomp; For at the Feast a Table was prepared as if it had been for the King himself, at which the Admirall sat alone, and was attended like a Viceroy, which every one interpreted as a pledge of the Kings singular love and favour to him.

Not many daies after, news was brought that the Duke de Alva had, by the command of the King of Spain brought a great Army into the Low-Coun-tries to suppress and root out the Protestants, and this Army being to passe by the borders of France, the Admirall moved in the Kings Councel that Burgundy might be looked to; and lest any tumults might arise about the difference in Religion, he advised that a guard might rather be appointed of the Swissers then of the French men; and it was commonly reported that six Thousand Swissers should be ready to oppose the Duke de Alva, in case he attempted any thing against Burgundy. But a few daies after, the Prince of Rupisurias*, of the Royall Blood, wrote to the Admirall to send him some trusty Person to whom he might communicate a secret which would much conduce to his safety: He also being a Friend to the Prince of Conde, by reason of their propinquity in Blood, told him that there was secret counsell taken at Baion, for the utter extirpation of the Protestant Religion, and all the Professors of it, and for that end those six thousand Swissers were hired and brought into France, under pretence of opposing the Duke de Alva: The Admiral also was informed of the same by many Letters and Messengers from severall of his Friends.

These things coming forth, first the Prince of Conde, and presently after him the Admirall went to the Court, and told the King, the Queen Mother and all the Councel, that they saw no sufficient reason why so many Swissers should be brought into France, except it were to oppress them, and many other honest Families which embraced the Reformed Religion: But they should find more that had devored themselves to that Religion than commonly was thought of, an experience whereof they had in the late Wars. They told them also, that if their Adversaries attempted any innovations, they would not be wanting to themselves, nor like sheep, would suffer their throats to be cut by Murtherers. They therefore earnestly intreat and beseech the Kings Majesty, that he would be moved to pity so many honest Families, and the afflicted condition of his Countrey, and of the common people who suffer most in such Warrs. But they could get nothing at Court but scoffs and scorns, whereby they perceived their lives to be in great danger, which caused them to withdraw, and to consult about the preservation of themselves and the Reformed Churches: And hereunto they were earnestly solicited by many of the Nobility, and by multitudes of honest Citizens, who complained that they could no longer bear the manifold injuries wherewith they were daily oppressed by the Magistrates in every place.

The second
Civil VVar

These things being so, the Prince of Conde and the Admirall, knowing of how great Authority the Kings Name was through all France, which caused the Guises in the former Warres to get him into their power, communicating their counsels but with a few, they resolved to go privately to the Court, to see if by any means they could get the King away from the Queen

Queen Mother, that so by removing him from his evil Counsellours, they might the better establish peace; But being betrayed by one of their Society, this design was wholly frustrated, whereby they were forced openly to prepare for War.

The Prince with five Hundred Horse went to St. Denis, where some others arriving, in few daies made up the number of two Thousand Horse, and four Thousand Shor, and the Prince, considering that the Parisians were not accustomed to fast, hoped that if he could take their victuals from them, he should either force them to fight, or draw his enemies to a more assured peace: Whereupon he sent Andelot with five Hundred Horse to Poissy and Pontois, to seize upon the passages of the Seine beneath Paris, and other Troops to seize upon such passages as were above the Town. Some others he sent to joyn with the Forces that were coming out of Guienne, himself and the Admirall with about eight Hundred Horse, and a Thousand two Hundred Harquebushiers, kept St. Denis, to curb Paris on that side. But the Constable, who was the Kings Lieutenant Generall, hearing that the Prince had thus divided his Forces, issued out of Paris with about a Thousand six hundred Foot, and two Thousand Lances, and well furnished with Artillery, and having chosen a commodious place for the Battell, the next day he gives the Prince Battell, wherein the Constable was wounded, of which he died within a few daies after.

A Battell.

The Admirall wonderfully preferred.

In this Battell the Admirall had wonderfull experience of Gods goodnesse in his preservation: For riding upon a very fierce and head strong Horse, the curb of his Bridle being broken, his Horse ran away with him, and carried him twice through his enemies Army, yet did not the Admirall receive any one wound, though many Pistols were discharged at him; But when as his Horse had one Bullet shot into him, he suffered himself to be easily reduced into his own Troop.

The Royalists routed.

In this Battell many fell on both sides, especially on the Prince of Conde's, yet was the Kings Army routed and driven into Paris, whereupon, the Prince and Admirall thought best to retreat into Lorraine, to meet those Horse which were sent for their assistance from divers of the Germane Princes: For they again thought fit to oppose Forreigners against Forreigners.

They joyn with the Germans.

In their march thitherwards they were eagerly pursued by their Adversaries, especially by Henry Duke of Anjou, the Kings Brother, afterwards King, first of Poland, then of France, who taking all advantages to presse upon their rear, put them to many inconveniencies.

The Admirals prudence.

When they came into Lorraine and met the Germans, who were commanded by Duke Cassimire, the Son of the Elector Palatine, they met with new troubles, for the Germans began to mutiny for their Arrears, and to cry Gelt, gelt, according to their usuall custom; But how to satisfie them, or to raise the least part of that Money, the Prince and Admirall knew not: Yet in this strait our Admirall found out this remedy: He advised that a certain Tax should be imposed upon every man in their own Army, according to the rank and place which he held: and for example, himself disbursed five Hundred Crowns; and the Treasurers going through all the Regiments, collected the Tribute: Besides whatsoever Monies the Prince, Admirall, Andelot, or others had, was all put into the Treasurers Hands: so that in all, they collected eighty Thousand pounds, which was given to the Lanceknets, by which prudent advice, of our Admirall they were extricated out of that great strait.

These Forces being thus united, their Adversaries hastily retired, and by long journeys returned to Paris, which the Duke of Anjou looked upon as a great dishonour to him.

Caen besieged by the Prince.

But the Prince of Conde's Army being much encouraged hereby, went presently and besieged Caen: and having battered the Walls, and made a sufficient breach, just as Monsieur Andelot, was ready with his Brigade to have have given the assault, the Kings Trumpeters came upon the spur and proclaimed, that Peace was concluded, for the effecting whereof, Commissioners had been sent from both parties a few daies before to Paris, whereupon the siege was raised, and the Prince of Conde dismissed his Army. Peace concluded.

But some daies before this, word was brought to the Admirall, that his Wife, who together with her Children in the beginning of the War had betaken themselves to Orleanse, was taken with a violent disease; whereupon he presently posted to Orleanse, and sending for the best Physicians he could get, he performed the Office of a dear and loving Husband to her; yet it pleased God that she died. This was a very great affliction to him, and when many of his Friends came to comfort him, being overwhelmed with sighs and tears, he said, Oh my God, wherein have I sinned and offended thee, that thou correctest me so bitterly, and loadest me with so many calamities! O that I could live more holily, and be more exemplary in my life then I have been! Most holy Father, look upon me with the eyes of tender mercy, and ease me of these pressures. The Admirals Wife dieth.

Then being comforted by his Friends, he commanded his Children to be called to him, and told them, that by this loss of their dear Mother, they might see the instability of all earthly comforts, and that there was nothing here below which they could confide in; and that Houses and Castles, though never so strong, were not given them for habitations, but as Inns; and that therefore they ought not to trust in any of these frail and fading things, but only in the mercy, and goodnesse of God, and then they need not doubt but that they should find him alwaies ready at hand for their comfort; and so two daies after, calling Monsieur Grelleus his Sons Tutor, he told him, that he must needs return back to the Camp, where he knew not what might befall him, and therefore he required him to have a special care of his Sons, and as he had often requested him, to be carefull to bring them up in true Religion and the fear of God, as well as to instruct them in other Arts and Learning. His Wife had been alwaies very studious of the Reformed Religion, of an admirable courage and constancy in bearing the manifold afflictions which befell both her self and Husband; and amongst her other excellent qualities and vertues, she was alwaies very pitifull towards poor people and sick persons, to whom she was very liberall in relieving and assisting of them: and whereas many sick and wounded Souldiers were daily sent from the Camp to Orleanse, she frequently visited them, so that the Physicians judged her disease to proceed from the stench of them. His counsell to his Children.

Peace being proclaimed (as is before specified) in many places by the Kings Trumpeters, the Admirall had scarce been three daies at his own house before Letters and Messengers came to him from many of his Friends, signifying, that instead of peace, his enemies made great preparations for a more dangerous Warre; For they observed, that in every place such provision of War was made, that if the Prince of Conde himself, and the other associates did not timely prevent it, they would be circumvented by their cruel enemies, before they were aware; and this they gathered from the Garrisons put into Orleanse, Alstifodore, Blesà, and other Cities surrendered to them, as also by the Adversaries possessing themselves of all the Bridges and Passes over the Rivers, keeping the Horse together in the heart of France, and continuing two Regiments neer Paris, under a pretence of a guard for the King. His charge to Grelleus.

Our Admirall finding these things to be true, thought it most for his safety to retire into Tantellian to his Brother Andelos, and from thence he shortly after removed to Nuceria, a strong City under the Prince of Conde's Government, whither formerly upon the like occasion he had carried his Wife and Family. His VVives character.

A remarkable Providence.

In his passage thither there fell out this Memorable accident: Near to the Town of Molinus there is a great Lake in the passage to Aliffodore; when our Admirall came near it, there was in his company an old man called Gripperius, that had been a great traveller by sea, and one that loved the Admirall very dearly; This man observing a black cloud coming towards them carried with a violent wind, he called to the Admirall, desiring him to gallop to the next Town so fast as he could, lest he should be oppressed with the violence of the storm approaching; The Admirall hearkening to his counsell, spurred on his Horse, but before he had passed the narrow passages of the Lake, there suddainly came such a violent tempest, accompanied with a Whirlwind, that many Horses and men were quite overthrown, many were wounded with the great hailstones, and almost quite slain: The wind took off the Admirals hat, which afterwards could never be found, and one of his followers lent him his hat: But herein the great mercy of God did appear, that the Admirall scaped unhurt by the hail, only one hailstone hit and hurt him about the ankle; and had this storm taken him and his company a little sooner, whilst they were upon the Lakes Bank, in all probability it had made an utter end of them.

A Prediction.

The tempest being over, our Admirall comforted his attendants, and lifting up his eyes to Heaven, he said, O Almighty God, I thank thee, from whom I know this storm proceeds, to warn us of the tempest of danger that is approaching, by which we shall be sorely pressed, but not oppressed.

They send to the King

When they were met together at Nuceria, they sent divers Messengers with Letters to the King, signifying, that they had daily intelligence of the snares that were laid for their lives, and therefore they beseeched his Majesty to pity his Kingdom wasted already with two Civil Warres; and that he would not ruine his Kingdome, but rather by his clemency and wisdom quench that fire that is kindled by the Guises.

The third Civil War.

Our Admirall also wrote to Margaret, Daughter of King Francis, and now Dutchesse of Savoy, whom he believed to have great power with the Queen Mother, intreating her to improve all her Authority and interest for the diverting of the storm that was approaching to the ruine of her Native Countrey. But when he perceived that no arguments nor intreaty could prevail for peace, and understood that Tavannius, who was a little after made Marshall of the Kingdom, was secretly drawing his Forces towards Nuceria, there to compasse them in, he advised the Prince of Conde that they should presently depart from thence, and make all the hast that possibly they could to Rochel, which City by reason of their ancient priviledges, had never hitherto admitted of any Garrison. By the way, they were to passe over the River Liger, and in the train there was the Prince of Conde's Wife, and six little Children, whereof one was but a year old; and two daies after followed the Admiralls, and Monsieur Andelots Children, whom the Admirall had sent for to come to them: At which time this strange Providence fell out; When the Prince of Conde thought to transport his company in two or three little Ships privately over the River neer unto Sancerra, it pleased God that a Foard was found, whereby fifty Horsemen that were of the Princes train rode over, and in the mean time the Ladies, Women and Children were ferried over in Boats, and no sooner were they gotten all over, but, though the day was fair, the River suddainly rose so high, that the Inhabitants of Sancerra took notice of the wonderfull Providence of God, praying heartily for the safety and welfare of those little ones who had escaped such a danger.

A special providence.

The King hearing of this their going to Rochel, by the advice of his Courtiers, presently commanded all his Horse, especially those that were in the Countries of Xantone and Poitiers, to hasten to Rochel. He sent also his Brother Henry, the Duke of Anjou, to raise all the Forces he could, and presently sently to march thitherwards. In the mean time those of the Religion, who relying upon the Kings promise and Proclamation of peace, staid in their own Cities, were every where basely murdered.

The Protestants basely murdered.

About this time Joane Queen of Navarr, who in the former troubles had kept her own house, abhorring such abominable treachery and perfidiousnesse after peace so often renewed, getting what Forces she could together, advanced with them to Rochel, carrying with her, her Son Henry, who after her death was King of Navarr, and her only Daughter.

The Queen of Navarr assists them.

These things being thus settled, the Admirall drew some great Guns out of Rochel, intending to besiege Niort, and within a few daies had it surrendered to him. Then he led his Forces to Engolisme, which stands upon an high and steep hill, having only one passage to it, and therefore the enemies had a little before strongly fortified it, but the Admirall planting his Ordinance on that side where it was futable, within a few daies space had it surrendered to him.

Niort taken. Engolisme besieged.

Presently after the Van of each Army met at Fasenullius, and fought together, the Admirall commanded that of the Protestants, who charged the enemy so Gallantly, that they were presently broken, and scattered, flying to Lusignan for safety, leaving all their bag and baggage behind them, so that the Booty which the Admirall gat, was estimated to be more worth then fifty Thousand Crowns. Two daies after they intercepted Letters from Fizius, the Kings Secretary, to the Queen Mother, much bewailing that losse.

A Battell. The Royalists beaten.

Presently after the Admirall going to the Town of Jarnac, fell into great danger, and without a speciall providence had become a prey to his enemies. For the enemy understanding that he purposed to transport his Forces over the River in that place by a Bridge of Boats, they secretly laid an Ambush on the other side, and observing the Admirall where he was, they let fly all their Harquebushes at him, and others endeavoured to break the Bridge; of the Admirals side there was one Harquebushier that had often shot at the enemies, and at last was by a bullet slain, whereupon twelve more ran to his aid, so that a tumult arising, the Admirall ran with his naked Sword, not having time to put on his arms, and endeavoured to cut in sunder the cords wherewith the Boats were fastened; all which time the enemies ceased not continually to shoot at him, yet God wonderfully preserved him; and from that time forwards he resolved never to be without a Life-guard for his assistance in such suddain accidents.

A special providence.

The Admirals danger.

Two days after, the enemies having passed over the River Charenton, the Prince of Conde feared lest they would compass him about; having lately joyned to them three Thousand German horse, and six Thousand Swissers, yet being of a very resolute and couragious mind, he resolved to stop their course; yet withall, if possible, to avoid a set Battell. In the mean time word was brought to the Admirall, that some of his Forces which were quartered in a neighbour village, were circumvented by their enemies, and yet valiantly defended themselves; our Admirall hastened therefore upon the spur to their succour with some Horse, whom as soon as the enemies espied, they compassed round about, which being told to the Prince of Conde, being more valiant then advised, he brake into the midst of them, where being oppressed with the multitude, and his Horse killed under him, which also fell upon him, he lifting up his Bbeaver, rendred himself to some of the Kings Captains, who gave him their faith for his safety; But presently after came Montisquius, Captain of the Duke of Guise his guard, not without the secret command of his Master (as it was believed) and setting upon Conde behinde his back, as he was talking with the Captains, dispatched him with a dagg shot into his neck. He was a Prince inferiour to none that lived in that age for courage and courtesie; He was eloquent in speech, liberall, affable to all; and a most excellent Commander in Warre. After his death his Body was basely abused, and at the last in scorn laid upon a Shee-Asse, and carried to Jernac.

His valour.

Prince of Conde basely slain.

His Character.

The Admirall being exceeding grieved with this great losse, and suspecting the issue, made a retreat, together with his Brother Andelot, into the Town of St. Jan de Angeli; and whereas he might have revenged the indignities done to the Body of the Prince, by shewing the like to the Bodies of many of his great Adversaries whom he had slain, yet he would not do it, but afforded them decent buriall, which thing he also did during all the time of the Warres.

The Prince

His Authority to take up Arms.

The Queen of Navarr being at Rochell, and hearing of this great losse, hastened to the Camp, comforted the Captains, and exhorted all the Souldiers not to be disheartned, nor to forget their former valour, telling them that she had brought her only Son Henry, that was to succeed her in the Kingdom, to be their General, professing that she preferred the safety of the Army before the life of her Son. To him was also Henry Prince of Conde, Brother to Lewis that was lately slain, adjoynd in this honour; But the whole care for managing the Warre, by the joynt consent of all the Commanders and Officers, was wholly divolved upon the Admirall, none having the like credit or authority amongst those of the Religion as he: For it was well known, that, besides his singular skill in military affairs, his justice and temperance, there was none amongst all the Peers of France that had so openly embraced and professed the Religion as he. He was the first that reformed his Family according to the Rule of Gods Word: He was the man that presumed to prefer their Petition to King Francis the second, that was nearly allied to the Guises by affinity. He gave the first example to the Nobility of France of Piety, who were grown extream loose by reason of the dissolutenesse of the Court: And after he had once embraced the Reformed Religion, he never gave the least occasion of scandall to the Churches. And whereas many Delegates repaired often to him from the Churches, he always gave them wholsome and prudent counsel. He first took up Arms, not to fight against the King, as some misreported, but at the request and Prayers of the Queen Mother: Neither yet did he it, either by his own private counsell, or of the Queen Mother, but by the Authority of the Parliament of Orleanse, the King being not yet twelve years old: As also after the Kings Edit for Peace, established and promulgated by the advice and consent of all the States of France, because it was so notoriously violated by the Guises, to the utter undoing of many honest Families, and almost the ruine of many flourishing Cities, and to the losse of the lives of many famous Captains, to the great prejudice of the whole Kingdom, and to the oppression of many flourishing Churches dispersed almost in every Town of France. By all which that poor Kingdom was laid open to be a prey to any forreign Prince that should invade it.

Andelot's
death.

After these things a grievous affliction befell the Admirall by the death of his Brother Andelot, who in the City of Xantone died of a violent disease suddainly, not without suspicion of poison; and the rather, because it was a usuall saying of Biraguus, shortly after made Chancellour, That the War was not to be finished with so much hazard by Armed men, but rather by Cooks and Kitchen Boyes.

Upon his occasion the Admirall wrote a Letter to his own and his Brother Andelot's sons, who were with their Tutor at Rochel, for comforting of them, the tenour whereof was this:

The Admirals
Letter to his Sons and Nephews.

Although I believe that the death of my Brother Andelot is very grievous unto you, yet I thought fit to admonish you that you have great cause to rejoyce that you had so good a Father and Uncle, of whom I dare affirm that he was truly Religious and eminent for his valour and skill in military affairs, the remembrance of which vertues ought to be dear unto you, that as much as may be, you may be imitators of them; yea I believe I may boldly affirm this of him, that there is none in all France more skilfull in warlike affairs then was he; and I doubt not but even forraign Nations will subscribe to the truth hercof, especially those which have had experience of his vertues; and this credit he got to himself, not by idleness and sluggishness, but by undergoing the greatest labours for his Countries sake. Truly I knew no man that was more devout to God-ward, nor more just to men than he. Neither am I ignorant that it were unfit for me thus to boast of him to strangers; but I mention them more freely to you, because I would have you to be imitators of his vertues; For I even propose him for my own imitation; and I pray God from my heart, that when I come to dye, I may with the like piety and assurance resign up my spirit to God, as I saw him to do. And that my grief for him may be the more extenuated, I earnestly desire that I may see his graces and vertues to live in you: Which that it may be so, I exhort you with all your hearts to embrace Piety and true Religion, and wholly to apply your selves to your Books, that thereby you may (through Gods grace) be led the way of vertue: and though I willingly allow you to recreate your selves in those houres which your Master allots you, yet I charge you take heed that in your play you neither speak nor do any thing whereby you may offend God: Be very carefull to reverence your Master, and obey him no otherwise than you would obey me; for I am perswaded that he will give you no other counsel than what may be for your honour and profit. In short, see that you love me, or rather that you love your selves, so that I may hear nothing of you but what I may rejoyce in; and as you grow in years and body, so you may grow in Piety and Vertue. The Lord bleß you all, and the holy Spirit preserve you for ever. From Xantone, May 18. 1569: Castellonius.

The courage and magnanimity of our Admirall did exceedingly appear in this; For that, though he had lost such a Brother as was second to none in Piety, Justice, Vertue, and the glory of his military actions, insomuch that the Admirall called him his right arm; and yet he told his Friends often, that he wholly relied upon the divine providence, and knew assuredly that the Church of God was not administred by humane counsels, nor this Christian Army, led by the providence and valour of its Commanders, but by God: Ade speaking concerning his Brother to his Friends, he brake out into this expression, O blessed Anselot, who hast finished the course of thy life so holily and happily!

His faith.

About this time news was brought him that Wolfgang, Duke of Bipant, had brought a strong Army out of Germany into France, for the aid of the Protestants, and that he had already passed the Loir, and had taken Charisy, where was a Bridge over that River; and when he understood that they were advanced as farre as Chalons, he intended to joyn his Forces with them, and that very day on which he came to them, Duke Wolfgang died of a violent disease; whereupon the German Army unanimously chose Wolradus, Count Mansfield, to be their Generall. This conjunction of theirs, exceedingly troubled their Adversaries, and every one deemed that the Kings Army would not be able to stand before them, but that the Courtiers would hereby be brought to stoop to them. Yea all good Patriots that studied the publique Peace, did abominate the perfidious Authors of these Wars, publicly saying, that God never suffered such perjury to escape long unpunished; and it was verily believed, that if the Admirall had led this gallant Army strait to Paris, many great Cities would willingly have yielded and put themselves into the Admiralls protection: Which opinion was much confirmed hereby, for that the Duke of Anjou pitching his tents near to them, and adventuring a Battell, he was easily overthrown, most of his foot being either strain or taken, together with their Commander in chief, Strossius, cosen German to the Queen Mother.

The Germans Ade the Protestants.

The Admirall having so prave an Army, hoping that now at last the Kings heart would be inclined to Peace, he sent an humble supplication to him (the Duke Duke of Anjou not suffering him to send Ambassadors) in his own and the Armies name, intreating and beseeching him no longer to harden his heart, but to pity the afflicted condition of the common people, and also to consider, that if the Warre should be protracted, it would turn to the great prejudice of all the States of France; there being twenty Thousand Auxiliary Souldiers of both parts; and that things were brought to this passe, that by these Civil Warres mens minds were so farre from union and love to their Countrey, that every one sought the Blood, ruine and destruction each of other. They therefore humbly intreated, that he would spare his poor Subjects that had so long groaned under these heavy pressures, and that he would no longer be led away by the Cardinals and Italians, who had too much power over him, and could not have the like fellow-feeling of the miseries of France as the French men themselves. They suggested also, that this was the fittest time for a Treaty, when both parties were so confident of their own strength; and that the conditions which he and his Army would propose were very easie, viz. That they might enjoy that Peace and Liberty for the exercise of their Religion, which was often confirmed to them by the Decrees of all the States, and by the Kings own Proclamations; That it was extream madnesse in those Italians and strangers; to think that those of the Religion, whereof they were at least two hundred thousand men, could so easily be rooted out, the truth whereof the experience of the former Warres might easily demonstrate.

The Duke of Anjou having received that disgrace which we spake of before, by the advice of his Council dismissed a great part of his Army, especially of his Horse, for a moneth or two, bidding them go home and refresh their Bodys.

Things standing thus, the Admirall called a Council, wherein it was determined, That seeing Rochel and divers other Maritime Cities and places were wholly in the power of the Protestants, That therefore they should take care for the fortifying of them, and then should attempt the taking in of the City of Poitiers, which would be as a Bulwark to all that Countrey; But to this there seemed a main impediment, which was, the taking in of the Castle of Lusiniac, the strongest piece in all France: yet after they had besieged it a few daies, it was surrendered to them; and so also was Castelherant about the same time. Then they proceeded to besiege and batter Poitiers, but within a few daies, the Admirall being quite tired with watchings and labours, fell sick of a Flux, which held him so violently for thirty daies together, that he could neither assist them with his Counsels nor presence; so that by this means the City was relieved with much provision, and three Hundred fresh Souldiers, which encouraged them to make divers sallies: The King also wrote to them to hold out, promising speedy aid, which animated them valiantly to defend themselves. But it was evident, that if the Lord had not laid that affliction upon the Admirall, the City had been theirs.

About this time there was one of the Admirals Servants called Dominicus Albio, who having been taken prisoner by the Kings party, and stayed some moneths with them, returned to his Master, where after a while he was suspected by reason of some words that fell from him, and therefore being strictly examined, he brought forth a box of poyson which one Riverius, a chief man about the Duke of Anjou, had given him; together with one of his Secretaries, both of them promising him two Thousand Crowns if he would poyson his Master. Upon this his confession he was condemned to death; and though some would have had him tormented, yet the Admirall caused him only to be hanged, for the terrour of others.

The Admirall being not yet fully recovered of his Disease, news was brought him that Castelheraut, being about seven miles off, was besieged by the enemies; whereupon in his Horselitter, he presently advanced thitherward, and having relieved the place with fresh men he easily raised the siege, and drave away his enemies, killed many, especially of the Italians, neither gave he over the pursuit till they had passed the River, which for the depth of it is called Creusa. In the mean time the young Duke of Guise, who was Governour of Poitiers, in the night time removed out of the City with a great company, putting a fresh Garrison into it, and the Duke of Anjou having recruited his Army with many French, Germans and Swissers, came to Chinon; whereas the Admiralls Army was tired out with the long siege of Poitiers, and much wasted with want of provision, and with great tempests; and of those which remained there were very many sick, especially of the Germans; and most of those of Xantone were gone home to refresh themselves. Many also were gone to La Charity, and Sancerre, which were in the Protestants hands: For which causes the Admirall judging it best to protract time, restrained the eager mindes of his Souldiers from fighting; yet both Captains and common Souldiers would not be satisfied, threatening to go home and provide for their own safety if he would not fight. They also judged it farre more fit to fight there in their own Countrey, where they might be supplied with necessaries, than in their enemies; especially considering that they had divers strong Towns in Aquitaine, the Delphinat and Leige, into which they might retreat, and from whence they might make excursions for the depopulating of their enemies Countreys. The Germans also cried out, that having wanted their pay for divers moneths, it were better for them to fight, then to be so long from their own Countrey and relations.

The Royallists beaten.

Thus it being resolved that they should come to a Battell, both Armies advanced to Monconture, striving which should possesse the place; and the Van being led by the Admirall, was suddainly set upon by the enemy; The Admirall seeking for his Armour-bearer, could not find him, yet unarmed as he was, he rushed into the midst of his enemies; Count Mansfelt seconded him, so that they forced them to give ground: Hard by, there was a rivolet which the enemies contended earnestly to passe over; whereupon the Admirall taking some Harquebushiers with him, hastened to the Rivers-bank to oppose them, where he continued all that evening; in the mean time, the enemy continually shot at him both with great and small shot, who if they could have gotten the passage, might have brought great detriment to the Army; For the enemies exceeded the Protestant Army by a third part, besides they were fresh and in good plight, the other were weary and harrassed out; But this help them only for two daies space, for on the third day, six Hundred Germans set upon the Admirall, who had only two Hundred French horse with him, and in the fight, the Admirall being often shot at, at last received a wound on his face by the right side of his nose, the bullet piercing into his mouth, which wound bled so fast that he could not spit out the Blood: His sword also by many blows fell out of his hand, and the buckles of his Breast-plate were so broken that it hung by very little: But in this extremity, by the assistance and faithfull help of one Florinerius a young Norman, whom he had brought up from a Child in his Family, he was rescued and conveyed out of the crowd, and his Forces being overthrown, he was by his Friends conveyed to Parthenay. Here we might wonder at his constancy and Magnanimity: For whereas in this great calamity most men gave way to despondency, he laboured to comfort and confirm each of them; He also caused his Secretaries presently to write into all the parts of France to the Protestants that were in arms, not to be discouraged, or to think that he had received so great a blow which might not be repaired within a few daies.

The very next day he removed to Niort, where, having settled his affairs, he went into Xantone, and there stayed seven daies for the cure of his wound, which could not be perfectly healed in lesse then twenty five daies space. Being thus tossed up and down with various afflictions, word was brought him that the Parliament of Paris, September 13. 1569. had made a Decree, wherein they had declared him guilty of Treason, and had proposed a reward of fifty Thousand Crowns to any one that would bring him alive to the King. At the same time he had intelligence that one Martinegus, an Italian, banished his own Countrey for treason, being made by the King, Commander of some Troops of Horse, had begun at Castellion, and surprized his Castle, and plundered it of all his rich Furniture which for divers ages had remained there, the value whereof was not lesse worth then one Hundred Thousand Crowns, besides he had so burned the whole Town adjoyning to the Castle, that there was scarce any footsteps remaining of it; which sad tidings were so farre from causing any dejectednesse in him, or disfitting him for his employments, that he did not so much as shew the least change in his countenance: And when as his Friends and kindred flocked to him to comfort him, he told them, That through Gods grace, he had this frame of spirit given him, that for those things which are usually called Goods, he possessed them, and not they him; and that his Fortunes were subjected to him, not he to them. And whereas in those Civil Warres, Princes, Peers, Nobles, Knights, Horsemen and Footmen had large allowances from the King, whereby they maintained themselves, he on the contrary was alwaies carefull to discharge his quarters, both for himself and Family, whereby he contracted great debts, taking up money upon use to enable him to it; yea he pawned his very Wives Jewels, Bracelets, Rings, and other rich furniture, thereby to furnish himself with money; by which means he did so weaken his estate, that in the end of this third Civil Warre, he was forced in a Council of the Princes; to move for some allowance wherewith to sustain his Family.

About this time he wrote another Letter to his Sons, and the Sons of his Brother Andelot, who were still at Rochel, under the same Tutor, the tenour whereof was this:

Truly it would be very gratefull unto me if I had opportunity to see you, and to speak face to face: but seeing I am deprived of that happiness, I thought fit by this Epistle to admonish you alwaies to set Piety and the fear of God before your faces, especially at this time, when you find by experience that there is no trusting to those things which are called Goods. Our hope must be placed elsewhere then in this world, and other things must be sought after then those which we see with our eyes, and handle with our hands: but because to do that is not in our own powers, we must earnestly pray unto God that he would lead us in that way which is most sure and safe; neither yet must you expect that that way will prove pleasant and delicate, and abounding with worldly felicity: For Christ himself, who hath gone before us, and is our Captain and Ensign-bearer, must be imitated by us. Men indeed have dispoiled us of those things which are fading and transitory, but if we be willing and carefull to submit to the will of God, we shall be happy, and it shall be well with us at the last; for those men have wronged you, not for any injury you ever did them, but out of a hatred against me, which also proceeds from hence, because the Lord is pleased to honour me by being an Instrument of assisting his afflicted Church; and therefore if for this cause we suffer losse and inconveniences, we have no reason to grieve for it, but rather to assure our selves that he will give us such a reward as men shall not be able to take from us. I have many other things to write to you of if I had leasure; but for the present I have said enough, if I may admonish and request you for Gods sake, that you go on valiantly in the study of vertue, and that in all your words and actions you shew an abhorrency of all

all vices; be obedient to your Master, and your other Governours, that though I seldom see you, yet I may hear that you increase in Piety and good Manners: To conclude, I pray, if it be the will of God, that whatsoever further befalls us, either in our estates or persons, we may have it sanctified to us for our spiritual good; and I heartily pray to God that he will be a refuge and help unto you, and a defence in this your minority; Fare you well. From Xantone, Octob. 16. 1568. Castellonius.

The Admirall and all the Commanders of his Army having often consulted about their future proceedings, resolved to strengthen all their Garrisons, and so with their light Horse to go into Tholouse, where they of the Religion held Montalban, a place very strong both by Nature and Art, who also had gotten together a good sum of money for paying the German Auxiliaries: Besides, they hoped by passing over the two Rivers of Garone and Lotter, to joyn to themselves those forces which were under the command of Mongomry, a man of great authority by reason of his skill and experience in military affairs, who also had lately by the assistance of his forces quieted Berne, that belonged to the Prince of Navary.

This journey, by reason of the roughnesse of the way proved very difficult and painful, especially considering that the enemies had Garrisoned all the Cities, and broken down all the Bridges where they were to passe; yet at length with much difficulty they came to Montalban, from whence the Admirall sent to the King and Queen-mother in his own, and in the names of all that were with him, humbly intreating them, that they would not suffer so many valiant and gallant men as were in both Armies, mutually to shed the Blood each of other; but that rather out of their Clemency they would put an end to those mischiefs; that the contrary was the counsell of some Cardinals and Bishops that never came into the field to try the miseries of Warre; or else of certain Italians that rejoyced in the ruines of France; and that it was extream madnesse to suppose that two Hundred Thousand Protestants, to whom so many of the Nobility had joyned themselves, could so easily be suppressed and destroyed. Besides also, it could not be but in those Warres many Papists must be great sufferers as well as the Protestants; some in their persons, and others in their estates and Families. That the speeches of the Courtiers were unworthy the Kings Majesty, who used commonly to say, That the King would not spare his Popish Subjects, so he might destroy his Adversaries: For it was the voice of a Tyrant, not of a King, to say, Pereant amici, dum una inimici intercidant; Let my Friends perish whilst mine enemies fall together with them: That the conditions of Peace were easie, viz. That the Decrees made by the States of Orleanse, and the Edicts of Paris might be renewed and established, whereby the Protestants were allowed certain places for publique Worship.

These Messengers being dispatched away, they presently resolved to passe the River Oaronna, which was between theirs and Mongomries forces, but the passage seemed very difficult by reason of the breadth, depth, and swiftnesse of the River; whereupon the Admirall resolved to take in the Town of Marian, which stands upon the Rivers bank, which he also did, and Mongomry coming to the other bank, the Admirall intended to make a Bridge, which also with admirable art and industry he effected, and so in two daies space passed the German horse over it: But the night after, a Ship coming swiftly along the stream, brake down the Bridge, so that they were forced to make a new one of Boats, whereby Mongomries Army came over safe to them, and the German Horse also which brought up his rear, and so having stayed there two daies for the refreshing of his men, he led his Army to Tholouse, and took in all the neighbouring Towns, either by storm or surrender, though he had only two great Guns in his Train, which he brought with him from Montal- ban. And the Protestant Army was the more incensed against them of Tboloufe, because (say they) they have been violent to burn them of our Religion: They beheaded Captain Rapin who carried them the Edict of Peace from the King; They have also committed many other insolencies which now cry for vengeance, and God hath put an opportunity into our hands, which we must not neglect, &c.

Having dispatched these things, he resolved to march to Vivaret, and to the bank of Rhodanus, and understanding that some were up in Arms for him in the Delphinat, who also had taking some Towns, he sent part of his forces to them, to assist them in taking in some Cities of greater consequence, committing the government of them to Count Lodwick of Nassaw, who arriving in the Delphinat, struck such a terrour into the Inhabitants as caused them to fly into the Cities; But he having no Guns for battery, only wasted the enemies Countrey, and so with honour returned within few daies to the Admirall.

The Admirall falls sick

Shortly after the Admirall, worn out with cares, watchings, and incessant labours, fell sick; and though he was greatly afflicted with his disease, yet conceiving that was of great concernment for him to get to the River Liger, he made no stay, but in his Horse-litter marched with his Army thitherward; For he was informed that about La Charity and Sancerra, there were about two hundred risen in Arms for him, whom he thought to be of great concernment to adjoyn to his Army, the rather because Cosseus, Marshall of the Kingdome, after the Battell in Xantone, by the King made Generall of the Army in the room of the Duke of Anjou, as he understood, advanced with his Army that way, and began to approach near him: And whereas there came a Trumpet from him to the Admirall about exchange of Prisoners, the Admirall sent him word by his Trumpet, that he should not need to be at so much pains to seek him, for that he himself was hastening towards him, so fast as he could.

Ambassadors from the King.

When he was advanced so far as the Forrest, behold new Ambassadors met him from the King about a Peace; For when the Courtiers heard that the Admirall, whom they thought to be utterly broken by his former overthrow, had in so short a time gotten so gallant an Army together again, they were extremely terrified, lest he should march directly towards Paris, and there should plunder and destroy the brave Countrey Houses of the Courtiers, Senators, and rich Citizens of Paris, the like whereunto they had heard that the Senators and Citizens of Tboloufe had already felt.

The great esteem of the Admirall.

The Admirall by his march (though in his Horse-litter) had his disease much increased upon him, and the Physicians gave their judgement, that if he continued still to be pressed with so great cares, and multiplicity of businesses, he could not hold out long; whereupon the Treaty with the Kings Ambassadors brake off for a time: but some Nobles that were aweary of the Warres, complained that there was no reason that the Treaty should cease, because the Admirall could not be present at it, affirming, that though he should die, yet there were men enough of honour and interest that could carry on the Treaty, to the establishing of Peace. The Ambassadors answered them, We wonder that you do not consider of how great authority the Admirall is amongst you, who if he should die to day, we would not offer to any of you to morrow, so much as a cup of cold water. What? do you not yet know that the only name of the Admirall can prevail more for you, than a great Army without him?

The Treaty goes on.

Within a few daies the Admirall being refreshed, and in a good measure recovered, the Treaty began again, and at last it was concluded, That certain Commissioners should go along with the Kings Ambassadors, to signify to his Majesty in the name of them all, That they of the Religion desired nothing thing more then Peace, neither was any thing more grievous to them then Warre, yet was there none of them but would undergo greater miseries, yea and death it self, rather then to deny the truth which they had embraced: That if the King pleased to grant them Peace, and the exercise of their Religion upon the former conditions, and to put some cautionary Towns into their power for their security, they would willingly, and for ever lay down their Arms.

These Messengers being dispatched, the Admirall advanced forward, and in his way took in the Town of Reneducium, to which some of the Vancurrers of Cossaw were come, and from that day forwards there was no day passed without some skirmishes between the two Armies, and one day the minds of the Souldiers on both parts were so far inflamed, that it had near come to a generall Battell, there being only a little Brook between the two Armies, Monsieur Mongomry having already broken the first Battell of the Adversaries, wherein were Valetius and Vasco, men of great authority amongst the Royalists. But presently came new Messengers from the King, desiring a Cessation from Armstill the Treaty was finished; And after great debate an Edict was sent from the King, by which certain places were allotted to the Protestants for the exercise of their Religion in, for the performance whereof they had for two years four cautionary Towns put into their hands, viz. Rochel, Montalban, Cognac, and Charity: and the Kings Proclamations hereof were sent all over the Kingdome; and so an end was put to the third Civil Warres.

Peace concluded.

The Admirall bringing the German Forces to the borders of their Countrey, dismissed them courteously, and so taking the two young Princes of Navarr and Conde, he went with them to Rochel, where the Queen of Navarr was, purposing to stay there till the Peace was fully settled in every place: and after a few Moneths, trusting to the Kings promises, and to the oaths of the Kings Brethren, and Parliaments, having been tired out with so many and great labours, he betook himself to rest; and at the intreaties and perswasions of his Friends, inclined to dispose of himself again in Marriage, the rather because he was earnestly solicited thereto by the kindred of Jacoba Monbella, the widow of the Lord Anthony Monbell, who was Daughter of Count Intermontanus, of whose modesty, piety, and holy life he had heard much formerly. She therefore being brought honourably to him to Rochel, he solemnly married her; and not long after he disposed his own Daughter [Ludovica] in Marriage to Monsieur Teligni, a young man of great Nobility and vertue. Of all the Nobility of France none seemed more acceptable and dearer to the King then this Teligni, by reason of his Admirall ingenuity; and therefore being much about the King, it was he that did afterwards perswade the Admirall of the great esteem and hearty good will of the King towards him.

The Admirals second marriage. He marries his Daughter to Teligni.

But God quickly mixed sorrow with the joy of these Marriages, news being brought about that time, of the death of Odet Coligni Cardinall of Chastillon, who had been some time in the Court of England, as the Procurator for the cause of the Protestants with Queen Elizabeth, who much favoured him for the amplitude of his Family, and the opinion of his vertue and integrity. But the Protestants affairs being composd in France, his Brother Gasper sent for him: Whereupon, coming to Queen Elizabeth, he obtained leave for his departure; but being taken with a suddain disease, he died Feb. 14. 1571. not without the suspicion of poyson, and was buried at Canterbury, being about fifty years old. He was a man of rare courage, candor and faithfulness, of a sharp judgement, so that few were to be compared with him in managing great affairs. Guillin his Chamberlain poysoned him with an Apple, at the instigation of the Queen-Mother, as he confessed at the time of his death, when afterwards he was taken as a Spy at Rochel, for which he was hanged.
